NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE New Year opens with one subject of engrossing interest possessing the minds of all good citizens, and during January the claims of the General Election may somewhat disarrange church work. But the new hope of progress now stirring in many hearts must eventually react upon every form of unselfish effort and bring new vigour to all beneficent activities, which centre in the churches, no less than to the more general movements of our social life.

THE attention of our readers both at home and in Australia and New Zealand, is called to the series of articles on Eucken's Religious Philosophy by the Rev. Dr. Tudor Jones, the first of which appears in our present issue. Of Dr. Jones, who is going out to New Zealand next month to take charge of the new Unitarian Church at Wellington, some personal notes will also be found in another column.

A FIRST notice of the volume of the Memoir and Sermons of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, published this week, on the first anniversary of his death, appears in our present issue, and also a New Year's Sermon of his, preached in Hope-street Church, Liverpool, two years ago.

PROFESSOR ESTLIN CARPENTER's course of six lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and Experience" is to be given at two centres during the coming term, at Liverpool, where the course begins on Wednesday, Jan. 24, at the Institute, Mount-street, at 8.30 p.m.; and at Sheffield, in the Channing Hall, beginning on Thursday, Jan. 25, at 8 o'clock.

IN estimating the influence of the orthodox Congregational churches as a force in the religious life of the community we need constantly to remind ourselves of the many schools of thought which go under the one name. From time to time, that very vigorous personality, Dr. Forsyth, who is also so voluminous a speaker and writer, stands forth as protagonist in the great struggle of the old creeds, clad indeed in a changed phraseology, to maintain their ancient dominance. Dr. Forsyth is always clear, perhaps because he neglects so many elements of the theological problem. But so far as he means, he means without hesitation, and we know that we disagree with him. But we often imagine him as a representative of Congregationalism, and with right. But the complex of faiths linked together in these churches cannot be adequately expressed by one man. Another tendency is represented by Dr. J. R. Campbell, the depths of whose thinking is sometimes accompanied by some lack of precision.

A RECENT sermon at the City Temple was in response to the request of a member that the pastor would explain "What is truth?" Bacon in one of his pregnant sayings has summed up the Pilate incident: "What is truth? asked doubting Pilate, and stayed not for an answer." Now the audience at the City Temple did wait for answer while Dr. Campbell talked round the question. In doing this he said several striking and suggestive things; but whether the difficulties of people who wish to remain "orthodox" were met is another question. We notice a certain theological vagueness, which is very characteristic of modern evangelicalism, and which may very well be nearer the truth than Dr. Forsyth's utmost precision of certainty. Some sentences from Dr. Campbell's sermon may serve to indicate the position. For the rest, it needs only to remark that the preacher relied largely on the poetry of Tennyson, that great resource of religious agnosticism. Dr. Campbell imagined that his questioner wished to know "if I could tell him where religious truth was to be found, or in other words, he meant to ask the preacher to say which is the true religion. If he did he has set him an impossible task, and if that is his own quest he will be a long time, all life indeed, before he arrives at a satisfactory solution. There is no true religion, but religion is true. All religions are but attempts at religion, and religion is man's quest for God and his experience of Him when he finds Him. All religions are true so far as they help man to face Godward. . . In your quest for religion, and in your despair of ever finding the one true religion, you are perhaps all the time in possession of it." There is obscurity here, but that is not necessarily a condemnation, for probably men must necessarily pass through dark ways on the road to the completer religious synthesis of the future.

THE Motto Card of the Sunday School Association for 1906, bears, together with its picture of evening peace upon the river, and sunset behind the village church, the words :—

"Let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us."—Psalm xc. 17.

"Every day is a fresh beginning,
Every morn is a world made new;
You who are weary of sorrow and sinning,
Here is a beautiful thought for you—
A hope for me and a hope for you."

On the back of the card is the usual list of Bible readings for each Sunday of the year.

THE Motto for 1906 is made the subject of a New Year's address by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, President of the Sunday School Association, published in the January number of Monthly Notes for Sunday Classes (S.S.A., 3d.). With this number, which begins the third year of the issue, the Rev. Charles Roper takes up the Editorship of the Monthly Notes in succession to Miss Marian Pritchard. There are, as before, notes on the Bible readings for the four Sundays of the month, and the Rev. Cobden Smith contributes Lesson Notes on two subjects, "Quit you like Men," and "A Good Soldier." Among the Editor's Notes is the announcement of another summer session for teachers, to be held at Manchester College, Oxford. This, we understand, will be from Friday, June 29, to Saturday, July 7.

OF the triennial meeting of the National Conference of our churches, to be held this year at Oxford during Easter week, the Rev. James Harwood, the secretary of the Conference, writes in another column.

A MEETING to commemorate the 22nd anniversary of the death of Keshub Chunder Sen is to be held at Essex Hall on Monday evening at 7 o'clock. Sir Roland K. Wilson, Bart., will preside, and addresses are to be given by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, Dr. B. C. Ghosh, and Professor B. Nath Sen on the life and work of the great Brahmo leader.

DR. W. TUDOR JONES.

ON Thursday, Feb. 8, Dr. Tudor Jones and his wife are to sail by the R.M. s.s. Gothic for New Zealand, having accepted from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association the commission to organise and minister to the first Unitarian Church at Wellington. The church at Auckland, under the care of the Rev. W. Jellie, has made most gratifying progress, and when the Rev. Charles Hargrove returned from his visit to Australia and New Zealand in 1904, his report was that there was a fine opportunity at Wellington also, and urgent need that a cultivated and capable minister should be sent out as pioneer of that work also. Dr. Tudor Jones and his wife deserve the gratitude of our whole community for accepting this honourable charge.

We are glad for our own sake, and for the sake of friends in New Zealand, that during the present month we are to publish a series of articles by Dr. Jones on Eucken's Religious Philosophy, and will add here a few notes concerning the writer, which will be of special interest to those to whom he is about to minister.

William Tudor Jones was born Sept. 8, 1865, at Strata Florida, in Cardiganshire, and was educated there in the village school, where he remained until he was eighteen as a pupil teacher and assistant master. He was the leading spirit of all literary meetings in the village, and tried his wings in poetic flight, which to the ardent Welsh temperament has such natural attraction. He had been brought up in the strict sect of the Calvinistic Methodists, and when in 1885 he went as master of the Cwmrheidol Board School to Aberystwyth he became a preacher in that Connexion. At the end of 1889 he entered the University College of Wales, Aberystwyth, and had there two years of study, during which time the teacher who helped him most was Dr. C. H. Herford, now Professor of English Literature in the Victoria University of Manchester. The year 1892 was spent at Trefecca Theological College. Having passed the synodical examination of the Calvinistic Methodists, Mr. Jones was ordained to the full work of the ministry, and held pastorates in that Connexion at Caerphilly and Whitchurch, near Cardiff. While at the latter place he attended the lectures in Philosophy of Professor J. S. Mackenzie, at the Cardiff University College, and by him was introduced to a new field of thought. Now he made acquaintance with the works of the brothers Caird, T. H. Green, and Martineau, and his hold upon the traditional theology became very difficult to maintain. It was a period of stress, and when during the last month of 1898 he was in London, preaching in Calvinistic Methodist churches, he found his way to Essex Hall, and received from the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie the help and encouragement he so sorely needed. He had found his way into the clearer light, and so it came that on the last Sunday of January, 1899, he preached for the first time in a Unitarian pulpit, at Swansea. A few months before that he had heard Professor Estlin Carpenter, at Cardiff, and was wonderfully impressed by his personality and the address in which he was discussing the miraculous elements in the Gospels. "Are these things true?" was a question of which he could not rid himself; but the scales were falling from his eyes, and after a time of very sore trouble the victory was gained. Henceforth for him the spiritual took the place of the supernatural and miraculous in religion. The visit to Swansea led to a very happy settlement with the Unitarian congregation there, and during seven years Mr. and Mrs. Tudor Jones have worked with great devotion and success. His ministry, so admirably sustained by her help, has been richly blessed, and it is grievous for our friends there that the connection must now be broken; but the call to go out to this pioneer work in Wellington, to one who had himself suffered so much in his struggle towards the clearer light, and feels so deeply the privilege of the new freedom of spirit he has gained, could not be refused.

For three summer terms, with help from the Hibbert Trustees, and through the great kindness of his congregation at Swansea, Mr. Tudor Jones was able to continue his studies in the philosophy of religion at the University of Jena, under Eucken, Wendt, and other teachers, and made there life-long friends. Last summer he took his Doctor's degree, and for his dissertation on "The Idea of Personality in the English Thinkers of the Present" received the warm commendation of Professor Eucken. This dissertation is now in the press, and will be published, we hear, in a fortnight.

From these notes it will be seen with what eager persistence the boy who began his learning in the village school has held to the pursuit of knowledge of the highest things. An enthusiastic servant of the Truth, unselfishly devoted, with his wife, to the work of the ministry, Dr. Tudor Jones will go out to Wellington taking with him into that new field the warm regard of many friends in the old home, and their earnest wishes that his efforts may be crowned with an abundant success.

THROUGH love to light! Oh wonderful the way,
That leads from darkness to the perfect day!

From darkness and from sorrow of the night,
To morning that comes singing o'er the sea.

Through love to light! Through light, O God, to Thee,
Who art the love of love, the eternal light of light! R. W. Gilder.

TWO TRUTHS.

"Darling," he said, "I never meant To hurt you;" and his eyes were wet.
"I would not hurt you for the world:
Am I to blame if I forget?"

"Forgive my selfish tears!" she cried,
"Forgive! I know that it was not Because you meant to hurt me, sweet,—
I know it was that you forgot!"

But all the same, deep in her heart,
Rankled this thought, and rankles yet,
"When love is at its best, one loves
So much that he cannot forget."

AT THE ACADEMY.

THIRTY-SEVENTH WINTER EXHIBITION.

LAST winter's Exhibition was largely devoted to the works of George Frederick Watts; this year the Black and White Room is filled with the studies and drawings which he bequeathed to the Academy, and which are of great interest, and the Exhibition, as a whole, is devoted to Old Masters and other deceased members of the British School. There is a very striking and amusing Franz Hals among the Old Masters, a portrait group of his own family, and a fine Cornelius Jansen (107); but the pictures are chiefly British, and among the portraits Raeburn makes as powerful an impression as Reynolds and Romney. Hogarth also appears as a portrait painter. The two portraits of Sir Joshua, by himself, one in spectacles (5 and 86), are very interesting, and there is a companion to his famous picture in the National Gallery, of the child Samuel praying. In this picture (31), lent by the Earl of Darnley, the boy has one open hand raised as he looks up to the light. Of more recent portraits there is Millais' "J. C. Hook" (137).

There are fine landscapes by de Wint and Constable, and David Cox, and some fascinating Turners, both among the oils and water-colours. Here one may see again Rossetti's wonderfully beautiful group of faces, "The Beloved" (117), lent by the trustees of the late George Rae (let them give it to the nation), and Burne-Jones's "Love among the Ruins" (128).

In the water-colour room there is a very interesting picture of "Old Westminster," by de Wint (164), with the Abbey there, of course, but no bridge or great pile of the Houses of Parliament. If one wishes to laugh at the extravagance of overwrought sentiment, there is Simeon Solomon's "Prelude by Bach" (180), but his reputation is redeemed by the "Mystery of Faith" (191), dated 1870.

Altogether the exhibition is delightful in its variety (even Caldecott and Birket Foster are there) and its wealth of beauty.

ON New Year's Eve, 1672, the deed was signed, transferring to a merchant and lawyer of Leeds the land on which Mill Hill Chapel was built. In the public square, looking towards the chapel, is a statue of the Black Prince, and his motto, Ich Dien, the Rev. Charles Hargrove took for the title of his sermon preached in the chapel last Sunday, and published as the January number of the Mill Hill Pulpit. It is an anniversary sermon on "Divine Service," which should be widely read.

WE sometimes smile when we hear men decrying human nature, and in the same breathing exalting religion to the skies; as if religion were anything more than human nature acting in obedience to its chief law. Religion and virtue, as far as we possess them, are ourselves; and the homage which is paid to these attributes is in truth a tribute to the soul of man. Self-crucifixion, then, should it exclude self-reverence, would be anything but virtue.—Channing.

EUCKEN'S PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION.

I.—INTRODUCTORY AND GENERAL ASPECTS OF THE SYSTEM.

In a series of four articles an attempt will be made to present before the general reader some of the most important aspects of the religious-philosophical teaching of Professor Rudolf Eucken, of the University of Jena, in Germany. The subject is so vast that nothing more than an outline of it can be attempted, but it is of such importance as soon to demand attention in England. Eucken's Philosophy of Religion is but little known in England at the present day, if we are to measure its extent by references to it in English books on philosophy and religion, although during the past ten years attention has been called to it in several prominent journals. In 1896 there appeared in Mind an important review of one of Eucken's great books, "Der Kampf um einen geistigen Lebensinhalt," and in later issues of that quarterly, as well as in The International Journal of Ethics, attention has been called to later important books of Eucken:—"Der Wahrheitsgehalt der Religion," "Gesammelte Aufsätze," "Geistige Strömungen der Gegenwart." Several writers in "Baldwin's Dictionary of Philosophy and Psychology" have emphasised the importance of the idealistic aspects of the writings. An introduction to Eucken's philosophy may be found in Dr. Smith's "Truth and Reality" (T. & T. Clark) although in many senses the writer seems unable to apprehend the deeper meaning of the purely religious significance of the great author. The first edition of "Grundbegriffe der Gegenwart" was translated and published in America a few years ago; "Das Wesen der Religion" was translated and published by myself in 1904, in a monthly magazine, in connection with my church at Swansea, and is now out of print; a new edition of the "Lebensanschauungen der grossen Denker" will in the course of 1906 appear in English, translated by Professor W. S. Hough, and will contain in addition a chapter on "English Philosophy of Religion," with which Eucken is so well acquainted. In addition to the above it may be mentioned that during this winter Professor W. R. Boyce-Gibson has delivered a course of lectures in the University of London on Eucken's Philosophy.

As far as Germany is concerned it may be stated that outside the theological faculties of the Universities Eucken stands as the leading religious idealist. Pfeiderer calls him the "Emerson of Germany," and the name has deep meaning. What Emerson was to America and England in days when philosophy was barren in so far as it gave no help to the ethical and religious life, so is Eucken amidst the German philosophers of the day. There is an important sense in which Eucken must be seen, and heard, and known, before he can be understood. And once he is known he remains for ever a permanent possession of one's life. Generations of students are taught with him to face the problems of life and existence, in ways quite different from those of any other modern philosopher. Coming under the influence of Eucken means bringing philosophy into the realm of religion, and attempting to solve the deepest problems by the union of thinking and living the problems. This he tells us is the only true philosophy and the only true religion.

Rudolf Eucken was born on January 5, 1846, in Aurich, East Friesland. He was educated at the Universities of Göttingen and Berlin. He is Doctor of Philosophy of the University of Göttingen, where he studied under the great Lotze. He is also Doctor of Theology of the University of Giessen, and is, since 1874, Professor of Philosophy in Jena.

What are some of the characteristics of this philosophy of religion, which is having such a great influence in Germany at the present day, and which does more than anything else in reconciling knowledge and religion? That the influence of Eucken's system on religion is great in Germany to-day, and is destined to become the main current of the future, is the conviction of men so able to judge as Wendt, Troeltsch, Falkenberg, Siebert and others.

Eucken's system starts from the standpoint of the individual life. Here there are no "Kantian Categories," which precede experience, and which are necessary in order to have experience at all; here there is something quite other than the "Thought Process" of Hegel. Both of these belong to the reason, and have no direct relationship with life as a whole. Eucken at the very start emphasises the fact that life in its entirety must be considered before any satisfactory philosophy becomes possible. He cuts himself away from all philosophies which are simply satisfied with physiological and psychological relations or metaphysical speculations, or of supernatural revelation. Philosophical systems have often attempted to discover reality in the union of subject and object, in spite of their dualism, or in the union of mind and body in spite of their dualism. Eucken has an antithesis quite other than these, or of any others which are found in the history of philosophy. His antithesis lies within the soul itself. It is here that the beginning of philosophy, religion, reality, God is to be found. He would start as Descartes started by an introspection into the soul and its meaning, for it is there that the key which opens the door to the deepest meaning of religion and life is to be obtained. And when this introspection into the nature of our soul or our life is made, what do we discover? We discover a double aspect in the life itself—Nature and Spirit. On the one hand, life is a piece of the mechanism of the universe; much in it is natural, is connected with the physical universe, and with man's physical needs. There is no effort needed to keep oneself on the level of these things, for one's pleasure consists generally in satisfying them. But on the other hand, there is another element in the soul or life besides this natural one.

The first is a subjective kind of life which demands no effort and no sacrifice; the second kind of life establishes connections with things outside itself. One kind of life is recognised as belonging to a higher realm of being than the other. Man must recognise this distinction, and with the recognition of the distinction begins a never-ending striving in the life.

It is a striving against Naturalism, against a bare Intellectualism, and a striving for the spiritual life, religion, and God. Eucken emphasises the truth that it is a striving against Naturalism, against conceiving as real that alone which is an object of sense. Even here it has to be emphasised that the mind that knows is greater than the material things which are known. Mind, even as the knowing part alone of the soul, has a superiority over every physical thing, and a recognition of this makes Naturalism impossible. This superiority of the knowing mind lands us in a kind of Idealism which is a great gain for us, but it is only an Idealism of Knowing, and this, as Eucken perpetually points out, covers only a fragment of life and not the deepest fragment. Knowing has a superiority over the physical things that are known, but the main issues of life and religion remain untouched on this level. What may be known of the universe and of human life plays only a secondary part in religion. Aspects—the most important aspects—of man's nature will remain untouched for ever unless something deeper than knowing takes hold of it. So that Eucken insists on our recognising the truth that there is a deeper dualism than that between the mind that knows and the things that are known to it. It is in the failure to recognise this clearly that the weakness of Kant's philosophy from its religious point of view becomes evident. It is true that Kant emphasised the fundamental distinction between the "is" and the "ought," but even the "ought" was still something subjective for him, and God was something other than the "ought." Eucken, on the other hand, states that we carry a spiritual life within ourselves. He does not hold this in the sense of the Monadology of Leibnitz, but finds a cleft in the very soul itself, and it is in the recognition of this cleft that Religion becomes a necessity and God becomes the one Reality. The distinction in the two kinds of lives cannot be held without a struggle issuing. The man finds himself on the one side surrounded by the natural life with its ordinary, every-day existence, its impulses, and its passions, and on the other side he becomes conscious of a life also within himself, as yet caught in the entanglements of the natural life, and his whole existence depends upon his freeing this life from its natural environment. It is in an insight into this all-important truth that a truly noble and religious life can be found. This insight is not a fact of knowledge, but a kind of energy made up of knowledge and experience, as well as the efforts which take place in linking the life with things which are beyond itself. The higher life holds before itself its own special kingdom—Ideals of Perfection, Goodness, Love, &c. This higher life asserts its superiority over the natural ordinary life, over the mere understanding and even over reason, whilst it feels its dependence on ideals which it has of a state of existence above itself. It recognises its own accomplishments as fragmentary, and recognises the completeness of life as in the Ideal. It is this Ideal which man recognises but does not possess completely that constitutes the one reality for the self. This Ideal is external to itself, and constitutes the very core of things as they ought to be. It is by communion with the Ideal that man is able to give the Ideal the reality of God. It is the presence of this which is above ourselves, and which demands our deepest nature in all its strength to realise that constitutes Religion. Man gains his freedom in this manner. The great alternative "Either—Or" now presents itself at every step in the life, and it is in the right decision that a creation is going on and a new piece of reality sticks in the depth of the soul.

Here it is clear that the evidence of religion has nothing to do with the senses. The sole evidence of God and religion lies in the fact that man is creating new qualities within his own soul, that a new world has opened up to him, a world of independent inwardness, a world founded on unseen relations, lifting him out of his own small natural self, out of his logical self, into a region where Ideals and Values rule and make up the one great Reality—Gcd. All else is insufficient for the life. The claims of Naturalism are claims which do not touch the life in its upward march. Naturalism emphasises the world that is known; it seeks to combine the various factors which have entered into the making of the physical universe and of human life, but in so far as human life is concerned Naturalism ignores entirely the validity of those factors when they are united, and when they come into contact with the mind that knows them and the spirit that experiences them. Naturalism would make us believe of creation as something which is already completed, but, as Eucken points out, creation continues as long as man gets out of his own small self and unites the spiritual part of his nature with qualities which are absolute and eternal.

Naturalism further emphasises the evidences of the senses quite as much as the church in Middle Ages emphasised them, but it forgets the fact that the conceptions of natural science are creations of the human mind, and that we have no warrant in asserting that these qualities are in the things themselves.

When we pass from Naturalism to Intellectualism the same failure to satisfy life is found. Knowledge and culture have their place; the more man knows and is conscious that he does know it the better. In this manner the meaning of the physical universe becomes clearer, and the facts of the mental life reveal themselves to us. But this level can be reached without ethical and religious struggle. And unless there is a struggle of this very nature to get out of the lower into an ever-higher, the life revolves in the circle of its own smallness and self-sufficiency. Everything becomes purely subjective in its origin and its validity. Eucken calls this state of mind and spirit the "small self," and throughout his great books shows that man is unable on this road to penetrate into the depth of his own nature, and unable to become the possessor of the "world life" or "spiritual life." Without this kind of life he is unable to experience what deep sorrow means, and what the opening of a new world, in which infinite perfection and holiness personified as God is enclosed. Religion, according to Eucken, is not a normal development and refinement of the mind of man. No, a time must come when the two kinds of lives within the soul are seen to constitute two different kinds of Reality—a higher and a lower. In fact, the point is a break in the ordinary development of life; the ordinary development cannot produce anything higher than itself; it is incapable of touching the life at the deepest and lifting it to a region of an Ideal which is Perfect, Infinite, and Eternal. But the experience of a personal religion which does this and which deepens the cleft in the two kinds of lives brings along with its sorrows and convulsions and birth pangs the opening of a new world, a world of independent inwardness, which now stands over against the ordinary every-day life and every-day world as the one great Reality; and the man who has had such experiences is never more the same kind of being. The struggle will continue, and often the higher finds itself entangled in the meshes of the lower, but an insight into the meaning of reality has been obtained, and the man "falls to rise, is baffled to fight better, sleeps to wake."

It is evident that in all this something besides Thought has played a part. It is in reality, as Eucken points out, neither logical nor psychological nor even in the main metaphysical, but noological; it is a kind of energy which is a piece of the highest life of the Cosmos, and is something which is not caught in the meshes of space and time. It is above both; it is eternal. It is, as we shall see, none other than the Divine entering into Time and rendering it timeless.

NIGHT THE CONSOLER.

FROM THE GERMAN OF KINKEL.

Night heals the wounding day's distresses,
When, with the calm stars' jewelled
She diadems her royal tresses, [sheen,
And enters opulently in.

A lulling fragrance softly rises,
The garish glare of colour pales,
In softened outlines' deep disguises
The cliffs' oppressive edge she veils.

So, too, with tenderness maternal Enfolds the soul all-healing Night,
Transmuting, by some touch eternal,
To sorrow sweet each bitter spite.
And tears, long sleeping, rush unbidden,
In full, deep torrents, rich and rare,
And from the heart's dull ache deep-hidden Upsprings to heaven a saving prayer.

TROST DER NACHT.

Es heilt die Nacht des Tages Wunden
Wenn, mit der Sterne buntem Schein
Das königliche Haupt umwunden,
Sie still und mächtig tritt herein.
Die milden, leisen Hauche kommen,
Der Farben grelle Pracht erblasst;
In weicher Linie liegt verschwommen
Der scharfen Zackenfelsen Last.

So legt die Nacht mit Muttergüte
Sich um die Seele schmerzenvoll:
Es läutert still sich im Gemüthe
Zur Wehmuth jeder bittre Groll.
Die Thränen, die vergessen schiefen,
Nun strömen sie in mächt'gem Lauf,
Es steigt aus wunden Herzentiefen
Ein rettungsahnend Beten auf.

LITERATURE.

IN this week of the first anniversary of Mr. Armstrong's death we have received the promised memorial volume, which contains, in addition to sixteen of his sermons, and some passages from other sermons, a full Memoir by his eldest son, and an introductory letter by his closest friend, the Rev. Philip Wicksteed. There is also, as frontispiece, what friends will gratefully receive, a portrait, beautifully reproduced in photogravure. It is of a quite recent photograph, by Mr. Julius Kay, of Southport and Liverpool, a full-face portrait, in which we seem to see the man himself in his prime, as he stood in the pulpit, strong and resolute, and yet in the eyes those possibilities of tenderness, deep and true, which his friends knew so well, as an essential part of his nature. One other photograph there is, also by Mr. Kay, to our mind even more beautiful than this, but not so well adapted for reproduction in a book. It is that of which we spoke a year ago, of nearly the whole figure, sitting at ease in a study chair, and the face turned to one as if in friendly talk, with the light of a dawning smile in the eyes. But we are more than content with the portrait in the book, and are delighted to think that with the Memoir it will carry so true an impression of the man to those who never saw his face. To those who knew and loved him it will remain a treasured possession.

Here are five books which will stand side by side upon our shelves, among the works of the best modern teachers of religion. First, that masterpiece of philosophical and religious exposition for earnest thinking people, "God and the Soul"; then "Agnosticism and Theism in the Nineteenth Century," the last course of public lectures Mr. Armstrong gave; and with these an earlier course, "Makers of the Nineteenth Century"; and the volume of Children's Sermons, "Come to me, O ye Children." ("Faith and Doubt in the Century's Poets" should be there too, but it is of smaller size). And now this final volume of the "Memoir and Sermons." It makes one feel, remembering the strenuous work of the preacher and the public man, how rich was the endowment which, in addition to all else, could leave such memorials of abiding value in this most enduring form of personal influence. Of the complete achievement of his life Mr. Wicksteed speaks in his Introductory Letter, in a passage which we must quote:—

"Yet, when I think of the close of his life—closed prematurely if counted by the number of his years, but rounded and complete in august achievement—the simile that I have used reverses itself. I have never known so uniform and so overwhelming an impression. We all felt that a great moral force was gone. Each one of us felt as if called to the bar of judgment, compelled to face the question, 'What have I done? What do I mean to do? What use have I made of my talents compared to the use he made of his?' He seemed to have got the last ounce of effective work out of the body which housed his soul, and so to have husbanded his intellectual effort and his moral influence, as to have made every stroke tell with its whole weight for the establishment of the kingdom of God in the institutions of society and in the hearts of men."

Rather more than a third of the volume is devoted to the Memoir, and the rest to the sermons. Mr. Wicksteed's letter contains some delightfully vivid impressions of his friend, though a stranger will for some time ask in vain, when and where it was that they became friends. From its fourth and fifth pages he will gather that it was in their student days. Only when he is well on in the Memoir will he learn that it was at University Hall, in London. We must not quote Mr. Wicksteed's amusing holiday picture of their camping on the Thames, but there is another passage, telling of the time when failing physical powers precluded Mr. Armstrong from such holidays:—

"To be a drag on the party, the man who had to be considered, and whose limitations measured the possibilities of the day's doings, was to him utterly intolerable; and so he had to scheme holidays of his own, holidays in which he often made himself so popular amongst those with whom he was thrown, into which he often worked one kind of mission or another so effectively, that they became a kind of royal progress, and left a trail of grateful memories behind them. All over his holiday resorts you may trace the deep impression of love and veneration that he created. He instinctively found, even when he did not seek, those to whose spiritual nature he could minister. No one knows, but some can partly guess, the number of drifting lives outside his own country, to which he has flung a life-buoy or an anchor, the spiritual wants which he has satisfied, the lives which he has confirmed, the souls which, while he lived, could say that they knew where to go for counsel, for support, for sympathy, and who feel his death as a challenge to them to live nobly in the strength which he confirmed, testifying to the life he gave them by strength to live without him."

Mr. George Armstrong has fulfilled his task in the Memoir most admirably. He speaks of it modestly in the preface as mainly compiled from contributions sent by others, who knew his father best at various stages of his career, and expresses keen regret that manifold professional preoccupations (Mr. Armstrong is editor of the Northern Echo) prevented him from doing more; but he may be satisfied that he has produced a living picture of his father's life, the more vivid perhaps from the very simplicity of his record. One might wish, perhaps, that the earlier pages, telling of Richard Armstrong's father, could have been somewhat condensed, but only for the sake of giving more room for a fuller narrative of his own life, for in itself the earlier story is of great interest; and, as Mr. Armstrong says, it does foreshadow the leading characteristics of his father's life.

We have only two small criticisms of the Memoir to offer. To speak of the High Pavement Chapel at Nottingham as "a magnificent Gothic building" (p. 50) is surely something of an exaggeration, though the interior of the chapel is doubtless, on a modest scale, of noble proportions and impressive as a place of worship. And there is no mention of one of the chief of Mr. Armstrong's books, his Life of Dr. Crosskey, written in 1894, the preface to which is dated "Off Cape St. Vincent, February 5, 1895," on that memorable trip to Egypt, Palestine, and Italy to which there is reference on p. 114.

We shall not attempt here any brief epitome of the Memoir, being well assured that it will be eagerly read as a whole. The successive ministries at Banbridge, in the North of Ireland, at Nottingham, and Liverpool are well described, with their chief incidents, and a record of the preacher's progressive thought. When he comes to the Liverpool period, Mr. Armstrong speaks from more direct personal knowledge, and we shall conclude this notice by quoting the passages in which he refers to his father's work for Social Purity in that city. The story is told for him in detail by a friend who was closely associated with the reforming efforts of those years, and there are quotations also from the special article on the subject, contributed by Sir Edward Russell to these columns, and since issued separately in pamphlet form.

This is Mr. George Armstrong's own record:—

"To vast multitudes of men and women in Liverpool, and indeed throughout the North and throughout England, my father will be remembered not at all for his preaching, not at all for his efforts by voice and pen to lead his fellows to a purer and closer realisation of the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, but by the service he did in removing from her fair name 'the Deadly Shame of Liverpool.' When my father took the lead in the 'Liverpool Purity Crusade,' and carried it to its triumphant conclusion, 'I was a youth just leaving his 'teens,' newly launched on the profession of journalism, and my duties took me over all parts of Liverpool at all hours of the day and night—the police-courts, the coroners' court, the theatres and music-halls, and the gas-lit streets, crowded with promenaders of good intent and evil. And for all my joy in his work for a true and rational Theism, I am tempted, whenever I look back on those stirring days, to hold with those who knew him not as a preacher that this, more than all else, is the finest and greatest work he did" (p. 97).

Then, after giving the friend's detailed narrative, Mr. Armstrong adds:—

"To me the nobility of my father's action in this matter lay almost less in the work he actually accomplished than in the risks he faced. He was warned beforehand that he risked his whole character and reputation by entering upon the investigation and public discussion of such a theme. There were the denunciations to be faced not only of those directly or indirectly interested in the system he attacked, but of those who honestly believed that pure-minded people should hold themselves apart from thought or speech on such matters. His newspaper scrap-books show the vituperative violence of his direct opponents throughout the campaign. Their words, spoken and written, were such as must have caused in my father a sense of personal contamination loathsome to bear by a man of his high integrity, and for a time, at any rate, the startled, shocked surprise of many whose esteem he valued must have only been less hard to bear. But for all that he suffered in this cause he had 'now in this time' his abundant reward. His part in the 'Purity Crusade' gave him an influence in the affairs of his city which, had his health allowed him to follow it up, must through the years have given him a unique ascendancy. Even as it was, his well-timed interventions decided many issues" (p. 109).

To the sermons in this volume we shall return in a further notice. Here, remembering those quiet hours of the early morning of January 4, last year, until at seven o'clock "his release came," we will simply add the last sentences of a remarkable passage from a sermon of Mr. Armstrong's with which the Memoir concludes. It was written some three years before the actual end, picturing very vividly the experiences of a last illness, as he imagined it. The fear of death had died away, and he described the change which came after the intense longing for rest, when he seemed to be gradually becoming detached from his body and its pains, and the very room in which he lay seemed to be getting dim and shadowy.

"It was that that began to seem the ghostlike thing, while another world all about him, which he had never seen before, seemed looming up slowly as the more real of the two. And he was conscious of presences—beautiful presences, some of them, and loving ones—round about, which he had not known were there. And all the while it seemed as though he were saying within himself, 'I am getting free, I am getting free, power is coming to me, life is coming to me, I am rising into a more real world.' And a wonderful new sap of youth seemed flowing through his veins. But, above all, the cramping, weakening, painful bonds of flesh were breaking, and he was at large and free. Then he just looked down for a moment on the body that lay there, and saw gentle hands closing its eyes; and then he lifted up his head, and seemed to draw a great breath; and behold! he had begun to live."

FORWARD.

God's glad New Year be thine and mine,
With sweetest thoughts of auld lang syne,
And brightest hopes within the breast
To speed us forward in the quest
That makes the human lot divine.

Come pain or pleasure, shade or shine,
Let courage true be mine and thine,
We'll find though travelling east or west,
God's glad New Year.

And when doubt prompts us to repine,
If Christ-like faith and love combine
To urge us on our high behest,
We'll know, with those who serve him best,
God's glad New Year.

ALL that John Wilhelm Rowntree was to his own religious society no collection of his essays and addresses can tell, but to the greater world beyond the limits of Quakerism such a book may stand for the man and for his work. Snatched out of a life, of manifold usefulness at the age of thirty-seven, he had already accomplished not a little, and there is more than one monument built at his bidding whose bricks and mortar tell how earnest was his zeal for human betterment. Such, for example, are the village Institute at Acomb, near York, to whose establishment he led a band of followers fired by his enthusiasm and sustained by his constant aid; a second, is the Woodbrooke Settlement for Religious Study near Bournville, in which his ideal was realised through the generosity of others; a third is the little Rest Home for tired workers at Scalby, to which he devoted some of his latest thought. Besides these now stands the volume which Mr. Joshua Rowntree has so wisely and sympathetically introduced. It contains much of its writer's more mature thinking on social and religious subjects, in part reprinted from Present Day Papers—in which many of the essays appeared in 1899-1902—in part from other Quaker periodicals, but taken principally from his manuscripts. As lectures or addresses they, naturally enough, lack literary finish, and are marred by emphasis, repetition, and merely local or passing allusions which the writer would doubtless have removed had he contemplated their publication in permanent form. But they are full of keen thought, inspiration, and vitality. It is singular that a man of the power and virility which are shown in these pages should have given his energies so exclusively to the service of one of the smaller religious organisations; doubtless his concentration brought its own reward, but as we read we feel that he ought to have spoken to a larger circle, and doubtless, had he lived, his appeal would have been much more widely felt. It is easy to understand the influence which he exerted in the Society to which he devoted his talents; and those who care anything for the autobiography of George Fox and the writings of the gentle Woolman and Penington can hardly grudge the church of their friends and followers the service he lavished upon her.

The literary remains here published do not include the lectures on Dürer, Holbein, and other artists whom Mr. Rowntree loved with a devotion of careful study only second to that which he bestowed on Quakerism. This omission is to be the more regretted since it leaves an essential side of his genius unrepresented in the volume. But certainly much remains. First there is the study of The Rise of Quakerism in Yorkshire, which stands for one of the main interests of his later years, and is drawn from the materials he was collecting for a history of the Society. Then there are the discussions of Quaker needs and Quaker policy, and plans for the co-ordination of the several branches of activity to which the Society is officially pledged. Again, there is the fragmentary but heroic attempt to set forth the true basis of Quakerism, summed up in the words: "This hidden life, this inward vision, this immediate and intimate union between the soul and God—this, as revealed in Jesus Christ, is the basis of the Quaker faith." Mr. Rowntree was painfully conscious of the weakness of modern Quaker apologetics. In one of his latest and ablest papers—that on The Present Position of Religious Thought in the Society of Friends—he wrote, with searching insight, which yet permitted him to hope for the future: "We stopped thinking in the seventeenth century. The thought-stuff of Fox, Penington, and Barclay was never properly worked out. We never understood the Inward Light. We fell back from the advanced positions, set up an idolatry of the past, grew into formalists as ritual in temper as the Anglican with his crosses and processions, repelled fresh thought by discipline instead of argument, and finally accepted a compromise with mid-Victorian evangelicalism. . . . What do I mean? I mean this: First, that we have never properly established the basis of belief; second, that we have never properly outlined the spiritual truth of the Indwelling God and its relation to sin; third, that we have wanted consistency and courage properly to express in conduct and life, in social relations and ideas, the large practical consequences which that truth involves."

He proceeds to discuss the doctrine of the Inward Light, saying: "Apart from the thought of God as we see Him set forth in Jesus, and the common consciousness of truth as revealed in lofty souls who have been touched by his spiritual fire, it is not evident how the faults of individual interpretation are to be corrected. It is at least significant that as the doctrine of Biblical infallibility has weakened, the interest of the thoughtful world has centred with strange fascination upon the prophet of Nazareth. It may be that the loss of an infallible book is a shock to faith intended to drive us at last into real and effective union with him."

This brings him to make some direct reference to "what is usually understood as the Unitarian position."

"I use the label with diffidence, partly because it implies a reproach I would not utter, and a prejudice I do not share, and partly because the Unitarians have done much to rescue from a truly shocking theology the great Gospel conception of the Fatherhood of God, nor do I forget that when Christian ministers called upon a Hebrew Jehovah for a bloody vengeance upon the wretched and ignorant farmers of the Transvaal, many Unitarians upheld, in striking contrast, the practical teaching of the Prince of Peace. None the less, it appears to me that in insisting that Jesus was merely man all the real beauty and significance of his life and our own is missed. If I give up external authority, I do not want to know only what man can be, but what God is, and I want to see, within the limits of human consciousness, an identification or meeting-place between the soul of man and the unseen Spirit. If Jesus is that meeting-point of identification—a movement not merely of man towards a God who never answers, but of God towards man—then, with Jesus as the Gospel, witnessed in the conscience of a civilisation infected by his Spirit, I see the balance-wheel to the doctrine of the Inward Light."

These passages, whether or no they necessarily traverse the Unitarian position, give the key to the writer's general conclusions on the matters which most deeply interested him. They are further elucidated in a course of five lectures prepared for delivery in the larger Quaker centres, intended to appeal both to Friends and thoughtful people outside their borders. Under the titles of What is Worship? May We Believe in God? What has Jesus to Say to the Individual? What has Jesus to Say to the State? and Faith and Life, he had digested the materials gathered for his special message. In some respects it may be lacking in originality and novelty of thought, it hardly plumbs the depths or reaches the heights known to the inspired imagination, and there are modern affirmations of which, perhaps, it is ignorant; but it is strenuous, human, and dynamic in the power of its conviction, and will prove itself to be of real positive value to not a few who linger too long among the negations of doubt. It is the work of a man widely read in many fields of thought, and of a man baptized into the mysteries of the Spirit. As such it will doubtless appeal to many readers of THE INQUIRER.

THE January Seed Sower is a capital New Year's number, with abundant exhortation and good wishes. Hargrove, Jacks, Freeston, Austin, we note among the names of contributors.

THE new number of the Hibbert Journal, continuing the series of impressions of Christianity from the points of view of the non-Christian religions, has an article of great interest on "Christianity from the Islamic Standpoint," by Ameer Ali, M.A., C.I.E., late a judge of H.M.'s High Court of Judicature, Bengal.

Young Days begins the New Year with a good number and a smiling face. Mrs. Norwood begins a story of the time of Monmouth's rebellion, and the Rev. H. M. Livens contributed a charming article on "Darby and Joan (like Mr. and Mrs. Lichen)," the first of a series on "Listening to the Nature Folk." We would call the special attention of our young people to the Young Days' Guild Work, which is to be this year on "Scenes and Stories from the Life of Jesus."

THE Rev. L. Jenkins Jones, with the January number takes up the editorship of the Christian Freeman, in which will be found some interesting portraits. Cordial acknowledgment is made of the work of Mr. A. H. Biggs as editor during the past two years. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant writes on "Our Duty, as Young People, to our Church," and there is a New Year's Message to the Guilds from the Rev. F. K. Freeston. The account of Mr. C. F. Pearson, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, is of special interest.

It costs more to revenge injuries than to bear them.—Bishop Wilson.

OBITUARY.

THE REV. HENRY WEBB ELLIS.

ON the 27th ult., the Rev. Henry Webb Ellis, of Guildford, passed away, after a short illness following a long period of pain and weakness. Mr. Ellis, who was in his seventy-fourth year, was always frail and delicate, and for nearly twenty years had been retired from active service. Prior to his retirement, however, he rendered good service to the causes of humanity and religion. Born in 1832 at Artington, near Guildford, the son of Isaac Ellis, tanner and farmer, a life-long member of the Meadow Chapel, Godalming, and a brother, therefore, of Mr. Edwin Ellis, J.P., of Guildford, and Miss Ellis of Sidmouth, he early determined to devote himself to the ministry. His grandfather, the Rev. John Ellis, was a Unitarian minister. After some training with the Rev. John Robertson, Mr. Ellis took charge for two or three years of the little congregations of Gulliford and Topsham, near Exeter (now extinct). Ever of a studious temperament, and from a child marked by strong religious characteristics, it became certain from this early ministry that his was a mind that would profit by college training; and in 1860 he became a student under the Unitarian Home Missionary Board. After two years spent thus, he held another short pastorate at Diss, and then from 1865 to 1875 he was minister at Hinckley (having the care of Atherstone also). Here he did hard work and made warm and life-long friends. But probably his most memorable services were those he rendered in the Peak district, at Great Hucklow and Bradwell, from 1877 to 1886. Among the miners of that bleak but romantic country he found a congenial field. "His isolated work," says one who knew him, "was beautiful in its simplicity, and he really loved those sturdy miners, and thought them the most honest and independent workers he ever knew." In turn, both he and his wife, a true helper in all his work, were greatly beloved among those scattered villages. The chapel at Great Hucklow was improved and the village library commenced with 300 volumes in 1877; and the following year saw great improvements in the Bradwell chapel also. A long period of depression in the mining industry followed, during which he proved a friend to many a family in their distress, and his little dilapidated old parsonage was a centre of light and comfort in those dark times. When his feeble health necessitated retirement, and he took up residence in the Guildford district, he still maintained his ardent interest in the labouring poor, helping to the best of his ability at the Womersley Liberal Working Men's Club and in the local Institute Library. Truly, in his slight body lived a strong and eager spirit. He was not afraid of being an extremist in politics, and had but scant patience with moderate men. A lover of poetry, and a keen observer of nature, he had quiet joys, which he was ever willing to share if friends were near, content, if alone, that such blessings had come to him. At the funeral service on Monday, conducted by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, the note of reverent thankfulness prevailed, for a life of truthful devotion and a death of peaceful hope.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR to all the children who read this column or have it read to them!

It is a happy thing to feel that we have got all the unspoiled days before us, that we can really make a new beginning, and do better than we have ever done before.

So many things we are ashamed of when we think of the past year; but we are to get rid of them, for we can grow up into something better.

It is no use pretending that we did not make those mistakes and do those wrong things, that we were not unkind or deceitful or silly and conceited, or selfish and greedy; but now we can turn our backs on that ugly old self, and say we will have nothing more to do with it, except to feel ashamed when we think of it. We are going to begin again, and, like a good runner in a race, keep a straight course, and take deep breaths of the pure, fresh air, and be strong and brave.

But many of you, looking back at the past, will have happier thoughts, and it will give all the greater eagerness to your looking forward into the New Year. Perhaps you succeeded last year in overcoming some old fault, and had the delight of feeling how much more beautiful life was without it; or you learnt some good lesson of helpfulness, and are eager now to do still more; or you had the happiness of feeling that you were really getting on with your work, and the future is full of the light of hope, because there is so much more to learn, and you know now you can do it.

Whichever way it is with you (and in most lives there is probably a blending of both) it is good to think of the New Year into which we are now entering, and it makes the best beginning to have all the happy memories of Christmas to take with us as we go. For in them we have the secret of unselfishness, and thoughts of the holiest and most beautiful life, in which all trustful, loving hearts are called to have a part.

And now let me finish what I was saying last week about angels. They are the messengers of God, those who tell us about Him and about our life and His will for us.

They come with their messages, not because God is far off and cannot come Himself. He is always with us, and they come to make us understand that.

Their great work is to make us feel how near God always is to us, with His great love and His holy will; and to make us hear for ourselves more clearly what He is saying in our hearts, telling us of what is right and true and good, and that we must always trust in His love.

That is why I said that we feel it best at home, and that they are for us the best and dearest angels who are with us there.

So the baby Jesus came as an angel indeed, a messenger of God into his home at Nazareth, because, having him there, his father and mother understood more clearly than ever the meaning of love, and how perfectly the love of God was blessing them in the gift of their little child; and then, as the boy grew up, they in their turn were to him the angels of God, making him feel how God was with them in their home, how great was His truth, how it was righteousness which mattered most of all, how perfect the love which gave them that perfect love of their home life. They made it a natural and beautiful thing for Jesus to speak of God as our heavenly Father.

And so we have to learn the same lesson in our homes, and find our angels, and let them teach us, so that we may all feel together how we are with God, and He always with us in His perfect love.

I want, if I can, during the next few weeks, to help you to understand more clearly how God is with us in our homes, and how in knowing that, and being glad to think of it, and earnest to do what is His will for us, we find the true strength of our life, and true religion.

He has many messengers who help to tell us about this; angels who are all about us in His world. There are, as I have said, the best and dearest angels of our home, and there are those who once were with us here, whom God has called away to the heavenly home. They still are ours, because we know what their love is and that it cannot be taken away from us. And you remember, I dare say, the beautiful thought of the hymn, "Lead Kindly Light";—

"So long Thy power has blessed me, sure it still

Will lead me on

O'er moor and fen, o'er crag and torrent, till

The night is gone;

And, with the morn those angel faces smile Which I have loved long since, and lost awhile."

But really, while we look forward in that way to a happy meeting face to face we may learn to feel even now, that just as God in His great love is always with us, so we still have the love of those who have passed from our sight. They remain with us, though in a different way from the others, a new and deeper way, angels of our home, who in the quietness of our own hearts help us still to be more pure and brave and strong, and to grow always in the love of goodness, that we may be fit to be with them afterwards in the other home. So a little child who has died, becomes an angel presence in her mother's life; and the mother who has been called away from her home, the angel of her children's lives. If only they will not forget, but pray always to be true to her love.

And that is how Jesus must be to us, to help us in our life and make our religion more real and true. We must not think of him simply as a name in history, or a memory of long ago, but as a friend and helper, whom we also can understand and love, one who is still living, with those others whom we know and love, in the great Household of God.

So we should have happy thoughts about our life, and look forward with a good courage to the coming time, because we have so many helpers, and we are all together folded in the care of God, our heavenly Father.

WITH NEW COURAGE.

THE New Year comes always with fresh opportunity, and for men of faith with a renewal of hope for the accomplishment of better service and the achievement of something more for the Kingdom of God on earth. With an act of resolute will new courage is brought into the field of service, and with it a spirit of rejoicing to be so used in arduous endeavour for worthy ends. Always for the churches there is the call for fresh consecration, and for every member of the great brotherhood for more devoted loyalty and more of the spirit of lowly trust, eager helpfulness and loving kindness.

We are happy to have in this New Year's number another sermon of Mr. ARMSTRONG's, and here will add a few words of counsel from another honoured teacher.

On New Year's Eve the Rev. STOPFORD BROOKE preached, morning and evening, in Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead. The morning text was from Luke xii. 35, 36: "Let your loins be girded about, and your lamps burning; and be ye yourselves like unto men looking for their Lord," and the preacher urged his hearers, in the watch night before the New Year, to light the lamps of Memory, and Meditation, and Sincerity, and, looking without self-deception upon their lives, to put off regrets for the past, and, girt as for a strenuous race, to be ready to enter upon the new time. Then in the evening the text was from John xvi. 20: "Ye shall be sorrowful, but your sorrow shall be turned into joy!" And the exhortation was to look forward with faith in God, who is justice, truth, and love, and as followers of JESUS, believing in humanity with undaunted hope. There must be no morbid dwelling upon past failure. A man must forget his own pains in helping others. Set the lame upon their feet; love the sorrowful till they know joy again, and then you will redeem your sin, and transmute your sorrow into spiritual power. As you help in love, faith in the Fatherhood of God flows into your soul, and you understand how He is educating men through all the struggles and sorrows of the world.

The great question is, Do we mean in the coming year to live for ourselves alone, or for other folk, as JESUS did: for self-interest or self-forgetfulness? If that question is answered aright, we can rid ourselves of the burdens of the past and go forward to a better future. Through love of men we find the love of God, our Father. As the grace of JESUS CHRIST descends upon us we are brought closer every day to the heart of God, more strong for righteousness, more tender in love, more akin to truth, more akin to the eternal Life.

Such was the preacher's message. Let us take it thankfully with us into the New Year.

GREAT ISSUES.

THE General Election to which the people of this country are to be immediately called is the first of the new century and of the present reign. The issues before the country are momentous, and it must be the earnest hope of all good citizens that they may not be confused by party passion and unscrupulous misrepresentation. The last General Election was held in the autumn of the year 1900, while the South African war was still in progress; and what was said then in a leading article on "An Appeal to the People," which appeared in THE INQUIRER of September 22 of that year, may be repeated here:—"A General Election may be an occasion merely for the embittering of party feeling, unscrupulous perversions of truth, and the lowering of the tone of public life; on the other hand, it affords a great opportunity for lifting vital questions into prominence, and demanding for them a rightful consideration. When we are told that politics are to be kept apart from religion, our reply is that we will not so degrade the ideal of citizenship as to listen to such a plea, but will rather use every effort to bring a worthier tone into the discussion of all public questions." Those words, if we mistake not, were written by the late Richard Armstrong, and they carry an appeal to every working and fighting politician, needed in the present conflict no less than in the past.

We would plead that during the coming weeks a true ideal of national life may be kept as the paramount thought of every strenuous worker, an ideal in which freedom, justice, and brotherhood shall be the ruling principles. Means must be found to lighten the crushing burdens of poverty in this country, the chief city of which is said to be the greatest and wealthiest of the world, and at least to mitigate the miseries of honest Unemployment, to improve the conditions of life in great cities and in village communities and country districts, to use to the best advantage for the welfare of the people as a whole the great resources of our country. And if, to this end, long-standing privileges of the wealthy must give way before the needs of the masses of the people, and the holders of great possessions have to make great contributions—not of charity but by the way of social reform—towards securing fairer opportunities for all alike, and a more general sharing of the best gifts of life, those who hold their wealth as a trust for the highest ends will rejoice that it should be so, and be thankful that the way should open for a better ordering of the Commonwealth. And in questions of industry and commerce and international relations we would plead for the ideal of co-operation and of amity between all the nations, not of jealous hostility and an exclusive Empire selfishly armed against the rest of the world.

With such thoughts kept steadfastly in mind, the immediate questions of the hour must be judged, and every citizen must accept the responsibility of his own conviction and his vote.

The Archbishop of CANTERBURY has publicly acknowledged this, in a New Year's message honourable to himself as the chief representative of a great Church, and worthily expressing what the whole people, without distinction of political party, ought to feel. Thus he puts it:—

"The people of England are called upon in these opening weeks of 1906 to make thoughtful and deliberate choice of representative men for the legislature of the land, after ascertaining on what lines the men so chosen will endeavour in the ensuing years to construct or reconstruct our laws. The making of that choice is a sacred trust; it can only be discharged aright by those who recognise its gravity. And we who believe that the Divine guidance of national life and action is as real now as it was in the far-off days of Hebrew prophet and Psalmist will shape our prayers accordingly in these eventful weeks, and will ask that both to those who send and to those who are sent the Father of Lights may vouchsafe the spirit of wisdom and understanding, of counsel and strength, and that thus our common life may be uplifted to a more healthy level than ever before, and enriched with all the elements which contribute best to the maintaining of what is pure and straightforward and true.

"If the people of our country—a Christian country, after all, whatever our failings and shortcomings—were unswervingly loyal to the large principles of the Gospel of CHRIST, it would of necessity come about that, in spite of our political differences, we should steadily advance from strength to strength. Each General Election would then ensure a higher standard in public life, a loftier ideal of what is attainable, and a firmer resolve to make that ideal come true. But we are still far short—is it not so?—of that unswerving loyalty, and it behoves us to fall determinedly and hopefully to effort and to prayer."

That is the New Year's message, and the Archbishop, with his brother of York, has also issued a prayer which they commend to the churches for use during the coming weeks in the place where prayer is offered for Parliament while in session:—

"Most Gracious God, we humbly beseech Thee, as for this Kingdom in general, so especially at this time for all electors of Members of Parliament, that, remembering their vote to be a trust from Thee, they may faithfully and wisely make choice of fit persons to serve in the great Council of the nation, to the advancement of Thy glory, the good of Thy Church, the safety, honour, and welfare of our Sovereign and his dominions; that all things may be so ordered and settled that peace and happiness, truth and justice, religion and piety may be established among us for all generations.

"These and all other necessities for them, for us, and Thy whole Church, we humbly beg in the name and mediation of Jesus Christ, our most blessed Lord and Saviour. Amen."

The spirit of that prayer also is to be warmly welcomed, and we could wish that in all assemblies for public worship in this nation during this season of testing, one or other of the prayers from Dr. MARTINEAU'S "Ninth" or "Tenth" Service might also be offered—as, for instance, this which follows here:—

"Almighty GOD, of whose righteous will all things are and were created; who liftest the islands out of the deep, and preparest not in vain the habitable world; Thou hast gathered our people into a great nation, and sent them to sow beside all waters, and multiply sure dwellings on the earth. Deepen the root of our life in everlasting righteousness; and let not the crown of our pride be as a fading flower. Make us equal to our high trusts; reverent in the use of freedom; just in the exercise of power; generous in the protection of weakness. . . . To our legislators and counsellors give insight and faithfulness, that our laws may clearly speak the right, and our judges purely interpret it. Let it be known among us how Thou hatest robbery for burnt-offering; that the gains of industry may be all upright, and the use of wealth considerate. May wisdom and knowledge be the stability of our times, and our deepest trust be in Thee, the LORD of nations and the KING of kings. Amen."

OF this character is the peace of religion. It is a conscious harmony with God and the creation, an alliance of love with all beings, a sympathy with all that is pure and happy, a surrender of every separate will and interest, a participation of the spirit and life of the universe, an entire concord of purpose with its Infinite Original. This is peace, and the true happiness of man; and we think that human nature has never entirely lost sight of this its great need. Channing.

ENJOYING GOD.

A NEW YEAR'S SERMON.*

BY THE LATE REV. R. A. ARMSTRONG.

"What is the chief end of man?"

"To glorify God and enjoy Him for ever."

The Shorter Catechism.

I REMEMBER standing in the inner chamber of one of the mighty Pyramids of Egypt. A low and narrow gallery led from the outer surface to this inmost secret place of the ancient monument, a gallery only to be traversed with bent head and stooping limbs. But at last there it was, this silent chamber of the dead, with the mystery of five thousand years entombed in its awful gloom. And when the magnesium light of our modern art revealed the walls of the sombre shrine, lo! they were lined with vast slabs of granite, quarried from the hills, six hundred miles away, looking almost blood-red in the gleam of the flame. Great slabs of ruddy granite, but smoothed to a surface incomparably fine. And wonderful was the workmanship of those masons of the beginning of the world. For slab was so set to slab that the surface seemed all unbroken, and it was hard to discover rent or seam in that olden lining. Slab met slab without the interval of a pin-point, and the red granite flowed like a stream, the whole wall's length.

So is the joining of our mortal years. These great slabs of time that line the chamber of our life are numbered in their order, as doubtless those masons numbered those huge blocks as they laid them ready for the setting. But as it is hard to find joint or division in the sweep of those slabs within the penetralia of the desert Pyramid, so none who was not apprised of the numbering of the years would find juncture or fissure between the block of time registered as 1903, and this new block registered with the succeeding figure. So smooth is the masonry of God; so without jar or jolt the passage of the years; so identical the form and colour of time in this new slab of months with that of the twelve-month gone.

But though in the lining of the chamber of life there is no shifting of shape or turning of tint marking off year from year, yet to us the mere change of the registered number means a thing not small, and it is the inveterate habit of all men to count up the days in bundles, and when passing to the untying of an untried bundle to take stock of the things of life.

And so to us on the threshold of the year, comes with fresh importunity the questioning which ever lies at the back of our minds, ready to start out into significance at a suggestion, what is life—this human life of ours—what its purpose, what its meaning, what its destiny and goal?

And thus we find ourselves putting to ourselves the solemn question set in the fore-front of their Catechism, two hundred and fifty years ago, by those grave and reverend divines who met in the famous Westminster Assembly: "What is the chief end of man?"

And ten generations of Scottish catechumens have made answer: "To glorify God and enjoy Him for ever."

What say you to the answer? Shall

* A Sermon preached in Hope-street Church, Liverpool, January 3rd, 1904.

we this new year's Sunday consider how far those venerable words strike home to mind and conscience in us now?

"What is the chief end of man?"

"To glorify God and enjoy Him for ever."

To glorify God: to the Calvinist preachers who set down that answer it meant a different thing from any purpose to which we can whole-heartedly set ourselves to-day. For those men drew a sharp and cleaving line between the secular and the sacred, which we have ceased to trace. To them the secular necessities were one thing, the duty of the soul to God another. Affairs and business were necessary, but regrettable intrusions in the proper occupation of Christian prayer and praise. It was George Herbert, Anglican Episcopalian, who sang "Who sweeps a room as for his sake, makes that and the action fine." The Calvinist thought that such worldly business belonged more to the devil than to God. And the only way to glorify God was to make very long prayers indeed, and above all to hold heart absolutely willing to accept the dealings of God, which might have the element of love in them but were much more likely to be full of the element of wrath.

And so the glorifying God in the Calvinist's sense we pass by, and turn rather to the second member of the answer—to glorify God—"and enjoy Him for ever."

To enjoy God for ever.

Yes, that would surely be the perfect life. For God is the Power behind all things that are. From the vast sweep of the stars to the trembling of a dew drop on the grass, his is the energy, the living force, creating, maintaining, thrilling through the fibre of the worlds. We are always bathed in that viewless power. It shapes our days. It controls our lives. It stirs in our spirits. It is always there. We cannot be where it is not, or escape to where it does not dominate. And so the supreme thing for these lives of ours is to be in harmony with God, to have no cross-currents of being vainly setting themselves to traverse the all-encompassing Will, but to have wills that flow with the great tide of God, like little rills that, emerging from their channels between the moss and ferns, enter into the strong current of the mighty river and are borne on its bosom to the sea.

Yes, it were our wisdom in any case to make our peace with God, for we can strike no bargain with Him, nor choose some other government than His. And so, on the most prudential scheme of life, submission would be our wisest way. But vital religion, the Christianity of Christ, means much more than that. And there rings out upon our ears from Paul the glorious news that it is not the spirit of bondage, but the spirit of adoption to which we are called, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. "For the spirit himself bears witness with our spirit, that we are children of God; and if children, then heirs; heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ." It rings out upon our ears, that cry, echoing the sure and steadfast message of Jesus, the experience and conviction of all men of spiritual joy, that though the fundamental being of God is Power, which might be awful, terrible, and nothing more, his fundamental nature is love,—love best likened to the love of a perfect father for his child.

"God is Love." To say that, to sing that, is little, for it may be mere sound; and even if not mere sound, but sincere as far as it goes, it may be without deep-down conviction, still more without full and living realisation. For, indeed, full and living realisation of the truth packed in those three syllables, "God is Love," would be consummate religion, the perfect and flawless life, the eternal bliss flooding and possessing the soul.

But it is so tender, so lovely, this eternal truth, that God is Love, that a preacher must almost fear to handle it, as you fear to hold a butterfly or a little bird in your hand lest you should soil the marvel of its plumage. "God is Love." Let us try very simply, very reverently, very gratefully, to say what that in its essence of essence means.

All love is an affection going forth from the heart of the lover to others. So essential is this otherness to the very notion of love that multitudes of theologians base their belief in the Trinity on the necessity that God should comprise a plurality of persons within Himself, that these may have eternal objects to love within the Godhead—especially Father loving Son, and Son loving Father. It is a theology which to most of us seems almost monstrously irrational, but it is a homage to the truth that in all love there must be subject and object, self and other than self, lover and that which is beloved. And a simple religious faith sees in God's love, a love which is poured out on all creatures of His which are capable of receiving love, an eternal energy which is for ever engaged in cherishing the universe of creatures, bestowing gifts of well-being and of joy.

And "God is Love." That means that the atmosphere in which we live, being filled with God, is filled with love. There is no infinitesimal atom of all the worlds which is not filled through and through with the energy of God. Without that, such atom would collapse and cease to be. But our doctrine is that the inmost nature of this universal energy which is God, is love. It is love, and nothing but love, eternal, infinite, unexhausted, that pulses through all the structure of things and spirits. For every bit of the energy, the power, is God, and God is love.

There are many things that cause us now and again to hesitate and doubt whether that is really true. There is so much which we cannot understand, so much which we would fain have otherwise, so much which to our confined and limited observation seems unjust, so much pain and sorrow; nay, more appalling than all, so much sin, that our reason and our faith are often staggered. And yet, if we are living with God, the soul harks back to the conviction that through all, in spite of all, still God is love now and through eternity.

I suppose, however, that nobody ever yet, in all the history of the world, was convinced by argument alone of this supreme and all-encompassing truth. There is but one way by which conviction can flash upon the soul and pass with transforming power through the recesses of our being. And that is by conscious touch of the soul with the love of God. Such conscious touch comes as often through sorrow as through joy, as often through the mediation of pain as through that of peace. Hushed to stillness, made aware of its own emptiness or weakness, the human spirit lies passive under the hand of God, and lo! there steals into it all silently a sense of a love that fills and penetrates, a love in which it lies wrapped round as surely as the body is covered by the unseen air. This experience may come and be withdrawn, or to some rare souls, it may be the habitual state of consciousness. But that felt love, that realisation of a love through everything, must be within the record of the soul's experience if the faith that God is love is to be strong, and clear, and sure.

And yet all the deepest experiences of life point to this faith as true. It accords with the vital constitution of the soul. There is none here who has not now and again been filled with the spirit of love—love not merely concentrated upon one, or upon a few, but that kindly love which embraces all men in its sunshine. You have had moments when your spirit breathed forth loving kindness and good will on all the world of men. Now I ask you whether it is not just in those times that you have felt yourself most full of power. Have not all tasks seemed easier, all duties lighter, all difficulties less formidable, all purposes stronger for fruition? It is because there was more of God in you, and God is love. The divinest of all energies has been generated in your being, for that is love, and love is God. When you are borne up by that strength all pessimism has been powerless to touch you. You have known that the sum of things is good, and you have been filled with the love of God.

"What is the chief end of man?"

"To glorify God and enjoy Him for ever." To enjoy Him for ever.

What is it to enjoy? Wherein lies the essence of enjoying in the physical sphere? Think of the things you have most deeply enjoyed. They are not, I think, planned and purposed fruitions. As a child what penetrated you with joy was not the deliberate treat, but the subtle atmosphere about you—atmosphere of sunny spring, or glowing summer, or crisp and frosty winter. You thought it was the toys or the games, but these were but the material objects; what really worked within you was more the air that fanned your cheek. What is the essence of your enjoying now in summer holiday or winter fellowship? It is less the arranged objective than the physical or mental atmosphere in which you seek it—scenes of natural beauty or comradeship with friends. The deeper enjoying always lies in this surrounding and penetrating atmosphere, whether material or spiritual.

And so this "enjoying God," "enjoying Him for ever." It is not a deliberate and purposed laying hold of God as an object to be contemplated and defined. It is an inward sense, an under-consciousness, of the atmosphere about you and within, which always and everywhere is love; for God is love and love is God. And that is an enjoying which may go on quietly and steadfastly through all the tasks, and struggles, and purposes of life, withdrawing us from no honourable labour, distracting us from no continuous effort, but rather giving us steadiness and quietness, and inward strength to persevere. For when we breathe that atmosphere then God is in us, and we share some of the strength of God.

So, in this new lease of time, young men and maidens, old men and children, be full of varied purpose, gird you to your life-tasks with good heart, do not think that religion is to withdraw you from the world, but pray God to reveal to you the energy of love in which the universe is held and bathed. Pray that the silent music of its harmony may sing itself in your inmost soul. Pray that there may be revealed to you the all-embracing love. And know, as surest of all sure truths, that that love is God.

THE SHEPHERD AND HIS FLOCK.*

By MRS. EDWARD LUMMIS.

"The Lord is my Shepherd."—Psalm xxiii. 1.

NOTHING in the Old Testament, and except the words of Jesus himself nothing in the Bible, has been dearer to the hearts of its readers in every age than this psalm. Men and women, young and old, hale and sick, good and bad, Jew and Christian, have loved it, and made it a resting-place for their thought. It is one of the earliest of the sacred writings to make a nest in our memory, and its charm remains eternally fresh. We know it by heart, and yet as we turn a musing page, and our eye falls on it, our hand is stayed: we read the familiar words as pleasantly as a wayfarer drinks at a well-remembered fountain. What is the secret of its persistent beauty and power?

It is a beautiful poem, simple and full of deep feeling. But that will not account for its power. Many souls which no ordinary poetry can touch are touched by "The Lord is my Shepherd."

It is an expression of faith, not of creed, of religion, not of theology. When dying people ask the watcher or minister to read to them, whatever else is chosen this psalm is chosen too: but whoever desired in his last moments, or what friend by the bedside would select to read, such a passage as the Athanasian Creed? It is our faith, not our belief, that saves us; it is our faith that unites us; the faith that goes deeper than belief finds in this psalm a voice for its own utterance; and so it comes about that those who accept Christ as Messiah, and those that reject him, Calvinists and Methodists, Catholics and Unitarians, are all one in their love for this psalm. All say "The Lord is my Shepherd."

And it is an expression of personal faith. Not merely "The Lord is a Shepherd to his people," but "The Lord is my Shepherd." Let us be quite honest with ourselves: is not our trust in God sometimes selfish and mean? We know that there is want in the world, that in this country alone millions are very poor, and many thousands are at this moment hungry; that many a poor worker, who, if he could but be sent away for a few months to a suitable climate would recover from sickness, is doomed by his want, his poverty, to work on in weakness until he drops, and then die in the "Union." We know all this—and is it manly or womanly to blind our eyes and harden our hearts to it, and say—"It is all right, the Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want?"

God has much selfishness to forgive in His children. Let us remember that God is love, and that those who love are the genuine children of God. And yet we cannot believe that this psalm is an expression of selfishness and greed. Do not those whose lives are most loving and unselfish love this psalm better than any? It means something much purer, deeper, and better than mere self-congratulation, that though others suffer hunger, at least I shall not want.

"The Lord is my Shepherd." Who ever heard of a shepherd with only one sheep? Where there is a shepherd there is a flock. I rejoice in my Shepherd the more because I am a member of a great flock, none of which shall want. The Shepherd knows every sheep, loves and tends them all, and cares also for the whole flock. Whatever threatens the flock threatens me who am a member of it; whatever threatens me, or any least little lamb in the flock of the Good Shepherd, threatens the whole flock. The sheep nestle lovingly together, and are at peace with one another; if ever two members of the flock begin to quarrel and fight the flock is so far broken up, and its welfare, which lies in its unity, is impaired. The same hand which wrote the parable of the Good Shepherd wrote also "Little children, love one another." If ever you are tempted to make strife and disorder in the flock, look up to your Shepherd and be ashamed. We who love God love each other. If we love not each other, neither do we love God. Unless we are willing to be true members of the flock, how can we dare to boast "The Lord is my Shepherd"?

Who is this Shepherd of the flock? Who is the Lord? God Almighty and Everlasting; God that created the heavens and the earth, and supports, directs, and nourishes them continually; God, whose glory, like His peace, is beyond all understanding; He who shepherds the wild birds in their great migrations, who shepherds the flocks of budding blossoms in the spring-time, who shepherds the snowclouds about the great icy rocks; He who guides the winds with His crook; He who leads the planets in their orbit; He who shepherds the innumerable burning suns in the illimitable fields of heaven—He is our Shepherd.

It is a high dignity, is it not, to be tended by a hand so mighty? And yet there is another side to the matter. Take a great, splendid, blazing sun, too glorious to gaze on, huge enough to warm a hundred worlds, and take a little gutter child that can walk, and speak, and love its baby brother—which is the greater? Which is it harder to create? God, whose glory flames in sun and star, is infinitely more glorious yet as the Father of the little, dirty, ignorant gutter child. Consciousness, thought, understanding—these are greater things than suns and stars; will is greater yet; and greatest of all are faith and love. This flock to which we belong, this flock whose members love each other and trust their Shepherd, is the chief glory of God. It is a privilege which cannot be measured to belong to it; it is a folly too great to be reckoned if, belonging to it, we try to break away from it, to misuse our fellow-members, to disobey our Shepherd.

For our Shepherd is the Lord of Righteousness, and conscience is the crook with which He guides us. We know whither He would lead us. If for a moment we are in doubt, we have but to look up, and there are His loving eyes fixed on ours, there is His kind hand beckoning us on our way. To look up and see Him—that is prayer. To trust and follow His guiding—that is faith. To be a true member of His flock—that is love.

If, then, we would understand and enjoy the perfect sense of peace and safety which breathes through this lovely psalm, we must try to take upon us the easy yoke of Jesus, and to obey his two commandments: Thou shalt love thy Shepherd with all thy heart, and soul, and strength, and thy fellow in the flock as thyself.

COUNSEL FOR THE YOUNG.

MANY readers, both old and young, will be grateful to Mrs. Creighton for consenting to publish this volume of extracts from her husband's letters to young people,* for which frequent request had been made. The majority of the letters have already appeared in the Bishop's "Life and Letters," but in this separate collected form they will reach many fresh readers, and they are warmly to be commended to the attention of thoughtful people, and especially to such young people as those to whom they were originally addressed. The first letter was written by Dr. Creighton, when he was an undergraduate, to the monitors of his old school; there is another to a friend about his debts at Oxford; and a very interesting series of extracts is given from his letters to "L. von G." whom he married in 1872. The first is dated from Merton College, April 18, 1871, evidently soon after they were engaged. In 1888 there is a letter to his son, Cuthbert, on his first going to school; in 1894, when he was Bishop of Peterborough, he wrote to his daughter Lucia at Newnham. Next year he became Bishop of London, and the last letters are dated from Fulham Palace in 1900. We cannot better commend these letters to our readers than by giving some extracts. His widow, in an interesting Introduction, dwells upon his great love for children and his insight into their nature, and adds:—

"So it was that he approached with the deepest reverence each human being who had anything childlike in his nature. It was no perfunctory hand that he laid on a young man's shoulder, no merely professional interest that he felt in a curate's life, no stereotyped sympathy that he offered. It was the individual that he cared for, each soul was precious to him, and he wished not only to help each individual soul, but to hear its message to himself. 'You do not know how much you do for me,' he said. He never troubled to calculate how much he did for others, but he gave them freely of himself, because to him life was but an opportunity for loving, since it is only through love that we can know God."

Here we will add three extracts from the Bishop's letters.

To a Niece, in 1897.

"Don't make efforts to write to me, but brabble on as if you were talking, and tell me all that you are thinking about. . . . The process of life is to get us to see things clearly. We can never do this except by writing. Even talking is nothing compared to writing. Ideas when put into shape stay with us, and we can recall them and correct them. So please write to me very fully about yourself. . . . Success in life means making one's life large. We all live in the same world, but each of us lives in that part of the world which we choose to make our own. Your danger is to live in a small world because you cannot take the trouble to explore. I want you to feel, and think, and struggle into more and more ideas. I am glad you enjoy Stevenson; he is a perfectly wholesome-minded writer, which many are not. His world is a nice world, and this makes all the difference."

To a Friend on the illness and death of her Father (1885).

"It is heart-rending to watch the slow ebb of vigorous life, especially when the sufferer is unconscious. But I find myself, year by year, growing less and less sorrowful for those who pass away. My pity solely is for the blank they leave in the lives of others. I have no feeling of sadness for the life that ends, whenever and however it ends. More and more I feel that this world has no measure for the preciousness of an individual soul. All that a man is, he is to himself and God. His work is in himself, all else is accidental. Life seems to me to consist in becoming more than in being, and in being rather than doing. I should wish for my own part to pass away while I was still active, and to leave to others the memory of myself at my best, before bodily frailty had dimmed my mind or wasted my faculties."

To C. D., on her engagement to be married (1887).

"There is nothing that I can say that will not seem very dull. You will be busy in discovering a great deal about yourselves which you did not know before. For love is the supreme revealer, and therein testifies that it is the holiest and most divine of all God's gifts to us. The months that are before you have a teaching peculiarly their own, which stands one in good stead in the future. The problem of life, after all, is to find one's ideal in the real and weld the two together, so that the consciousness of a larger meaning and a more enduring purpose streams through the small actions of life. It is one thing to feel, another thing to let one's feelings find expression in words; but greatest of all is to embody one's feelings in one's life and actions. Love is the great master."

The letters abound in wisdom and gracious sympathy such as these extracts reveal, and there is much more that we should have been glad to quote, e.g., the letter (p. 121) on the text "all nice-minded people are attractive"; but we must be content with one more remark, and if we end on a note of dissent, it is only because we ought not to pass it over. The Bishop wrote in 1897 to a friend in mental difficulties: "If Jesus was not God, Christianity is not a religion, but a contribution to moral philosophy"—which surely is not so discriminating a remark as we are accustomed to expect from Dr. Creighton. A little further on he says that the Incarnation declares the distinction between the divine and the human to be not insuperable, and adds: "This is the most important, practical point. Think it out, consider the difference between saying, 'I wish to be a very good man' and 'I wish to be like God.' The Unitarian says the first, the Christian says the last. But the motives appealed to are worlds apart." On which we remark that the Unitarian wishes to be a very good man just as much and no more than the Bishop and Christians who take his view. He further suggests that there may be another kind of Christianity than the Bishop's, and possibly nearer to the mind of Christ, and not simply "a contribution to moral philosophy"—but such a Christianity as makes him desire with Jesus to be a true child of God.

By A MINISTER.

XXXII.

I WONDER that in our deprecating moods we do not pray to be delivered from the great peril and danger of logical conclusion. The risk lies in the tendency of inference to act for conscience. Formal argument interferes with moral judgment. The unfeeling precepts of good men in past ages would be unintelligible if we did not suppose that they were arrived at by hard reasoning only. Conviction justified itself as deduction. To the disputant that which was valid was true, and that which was true was just. Aristotle's influence on the Middle Ages is well known. For the sake of his method, heathen philosopher though he was, much was forgiven him. His logical formulæ regulated Christian thought, and if, with the revival of learning, they lost something of their fame, they lost nothing of their power in the "theological age" which followed, the age of Augsburg and Westminster Confessions. There are few extreme doctrines which do not really rest on supposed logical necessities. A passage in one of Kingsley's letters comes to my mind in the way of illustration. He speaks of the "catch": "All sin deserves infinite punishment, because it is against an infinite Being," but the "catch" was once to serious minds a serious syllogistic argument. Man, we may assume, would not of his own free choice invent against himself a doctrine of endless punishment. Must it not have forced itself upon him as a necessary logical conclusion? So with other doctrines, given two propositions as premises, a third will establish itself by inevitable sequence. And it is worth noting that extreme logical conclusions have come more from the brains of individual thinkers than from the deliberations of councils. No church, I believe, has ever laid down a definite doctrine of inspiration, though definitions have not been wanting, and as for doctrines of election and reprobation, the Articles rejected by the Church of England in 1562, and again in 1595, show how far Calvinistic divines were prepared to go beyond Catholic tradition. Nor is the tyranny of ideas only a religious tyranny. For positiveness of statement commend me to the votaries of certain modern cults. This danger of opinionativeness, mistaking itself for logical certainty, is a danger from which wise men may well pray to be saved.

I also wonder that in our supplicating moods we do not pray for readiness to accept logical conclusion. This is not the contradiction it may seem to be. It often happens that in matters of speculation we trust argument too much; in matters of conduct too little. The common warning against pressing principle to logical conclusion shows a leaning towards timidity in practical affairs. Yet who can doubt that most of the social troubles of the day would disappear if we had—not the courage of our convictions—but the courage to be convinced? Questions which might almost be settled out of hand are hung up as "problems" for posterity to solve. Rather than commit ourselves to the open sea and a fixed course, we tack from point to point, and hug the shore of indecision. Compromise is a harbour into which we can always run. It is true, of course, that logical consistency is not everything, and that in small matters arguments may be pressed to the point of absurdity. But what of the arguments in great matters which are not pressed at all? We have a horror of cast-iron legislation, but can it be said that the cause of reform suffers, and has suffered, more from the doctrinaire than from the opportunist?

Logical conclusion is as much, then, to be prayed for as prayed against, but a better way is that of the old collect which leaves these nice balancings, and asks at once for light to know and power to fulfil.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me, through your columns to remind our friends of the triennial meetings of the National Conference, which are to be held at Oxford next Easter? The arrangements are in a forward state, and there is every prospect of profitable and attractive gatherings. Invitations with full particulars will be sent out in a few weeks. But, as some congregations hold their annual meetings and the committees of some District Associations hold their quarterly meetings in January, I would suggest that they should anticipate their invitations by appointing the delegates whom they wish to represent them.

JAMES HARWOOD, Secretary.

Marychurch, Torquay, and died there on June 3, 1905, in her thirty-sixth year. Our readers may remember several earnest and thoughtful letters which she wrote to the INQUIRER, and especially the essay on "The Moral Aspect of Heredity," published in three parts in the INQUIRER of September 9, 16 and 23, 1899. The following notes are a further testimony to the earnestness with which she pondered the deeper questions of life.—ED.]

STRANGE how we awake each day to the same consciousness, the same self! It speaks of the indestructible nature of character.

Insanity, delirium, sudden passion, may for the time distort the moral vision, but eventually we emerge the same self. Nothing but the voluntary action of our free-will leaves its impress upon character.

And as each day we awake to the consciousness of the same faults to be amended, the same evil tendencies to be grappled with, the same weaknesses to be overcome, so from that long sleep we shall emerge still ourselves, the same work before us—the building up of our own character.

Unless we cleanse our own hearts of the germs of evil, unless in our inward life we are fighting each lower impulse, of what use is it that we give our vote on the side of progress or make battle against social wrongs? It is only pouring water on one side of the flame whilst we feed it with oil on the other. Whenever we permit ourselves in any indulgence our conscience disapproves we are traitors to the cause we profess to serve. For just in so far as we are unfaithful to the truth that is in us—even though it be known only in the secret of our own hearts—in just that degree do we give support to the powers of darkness.

We regret no suffering, however painful, if through it we have risen to something higher; no failure, however humiliating, if it has made us more quick to feel for others. We would not sacrifice the greater blessing for the less. We would not realise our brightest dreams at the cost of blunted feelings. Rather than that, let us know the bitterness of disappointment, so that our hearts be kept humble towards God and tender towards our fellows.

There is hardly one of us but would acquit himself better as a hero than a drudge. For it is quite possible to think fine thoughts, to be filled with enthusiasm for noble ideals, even, in moments of emotional exaltation, to compass the heroic and yet be lacking simple, ordinary Christian graces. Heroism is far less rare than many qualities accounted more prosaic; such as scrupulous honesty, faithfulness in drudgery, patience under small vexations. How easy to lose one's self in a passion of adoration for the sublime. How difficult midst the dull routine of every day to forget self and crucify desire.

It is significant that momentous occasions which seem to lift the soul to some great altitude frequently leave it, when they are passed, no whit advanced. How often after times of spiritual exaltation have we been humbled and dismayed to find ourselves sunk again to our former level, to find within the same petty strife, the same irritabilities, discontents, envyings. We must test ourselves not by our high-flown aspirations but by our humblest deeds.

It is pleasant on the Mount of Transfiguration to reflect a glory not our own, it is unspeakably hard in actual experience to eradicate one single failing or practice cheerfully the smallest act of self-denial.

There are few of us but have come near to heroism at some moment or other of our lives; though none knew it, maybe, but ourselves and God. Conscience has called us to some painful task and we have tremblingly risen to obey. Actions, slight, and insignificant enough, to outward seeming; but in the secret of our own hearts we know that we have forced ourselves to the performance of some unpleasant duty against which all our nature shrank. To so tread self under foot is the noblest of all heroisms, and foreshadows that selflessness into which we must one day grow.

I had far rather be assured that our God is a just God, than that He is merciful or gracious. It is not in the benevolence or compassion or loving-kindness of its Creator that the soul anchors its faith, but in that greater attribute which includes and overlaps all three. As man in his social relationships desires neither favouritism nor privilege, but equal rights, so from His Maker he demands no act of condescension or unmerited clemency, but simple justice. Not forgiveness, but justice is what we crave. Not to be saved from the consequences of our sins, but to be saved from sinfulness. We are content to suffer any penalty so that it be a just one. But vengeance and vindictiveness have no part in true justice. Its motive is ever reformation. Thus may we confidently leave our future destiny in God's hands, assured that He will deal justly by us. We ask no more than this; and He can give us no less.

How often does it happen that the consolations of religion, which in all sincerity we have offered to others, fail us in our own hour of need. The hope of redemption, the promise of mercy, the assurance of forgiveness, which we have confidently held out to others, we cannot appropriate ourselves. We dare not extend to ourselves the same clemency we feel to be the just right of another. We are over-weighted by a sense of personal responsibility, which, while acting as the strongest moral incentive, incapacitates us from judging of our own case.

An experimental test is not always the surest. Because our convictions fail us in the stress of actual experience that does not prove them false. That which we have seen in our most exalted moments is still there though clouds come between and obscure it. In our darkest hour of despondency we may take this comfort to our hearts, that that compassion which we have felt for sin-tortured souls was of God's implanting, and that if in our self up-braidings we fail to apply to our own hearts the consolations we have administered to others, then we are harder on ourselves than God is.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LONDON.

IF, next year, viz., 1907, a great company of Unitarian and kindred ministers visit Boston, U.S.A., it will be primarily due to the energy and courage, not to say audacity, of the ex-president of the Laymen's Club, Dr. G. Herbert Smith. His native zeal appears to have received such reverberating enforcement in the society of his fellow clubmen that nothing short of the biggest scheme of the kind on record among us will satisfy his ambition. To every reader of THE INQUIRER that scheme appeals. "Send us" (says Dr. Smith, in effect) "your contributions, large or small. We want £3,000, and we will send as many parsons, splendid fellows, but tired or undeveloped, but capable men, all good preachers and pastors, over to the American meeting of the International Council"; and I understand Dr. Smith engages that every man, nearly, among those sent will return vastly rejuvenated or developed, as the case may be, so that our whole movement shall be lifted up by the good done to them, and, through them, to the churches. Well, those of us who remember the inspiring effect of the London Council—and who does not?—can easily believe it would be an incalculable benefit if this scheme were carried out. It is not my business to discuss it; I only mention it because it happens to emanate from London if not directly from the London Laymen's Club, just one of the pregnant ideas started in the ranks of the younger men.

And now, the ladies, who are all and ever young, are starting a Ladies' Club! I have been privileged with a glimpse of the letter now being sent to the elect, or potentially elect. It is drawn in terms becomingly modest; but a womanly determination shows in every line. In sober earnest these signs of closer fellowship among our scattered congregations are most welcome. There is plenty of good work to do, and a fairly numerous band of workers, once they are knit into a band. Best wishes for a Happy New Year to the ladies!

Church work amongst us has, I believe, gone forward cheerfully, and in many respects successfully, since we recommenced in the autumn. There have been several distinct points of special interest, among them the welcome given to the Rev. Charles Roper, at Kilburn. Mr. Roper is beginning his first "forward movement" appeal to the neighbourhood at a time when men are thinking mostly of other elections than the kind written of by St. Paul. I am not sure how many candidates may be in the Kilburn congregation, but I know of three at one of our places. The turmoil and unsettlement of these next weeks, however, will soon be over; and we must hope that when men have wakened up for politics they will not soon slumber again. There are considerations of permanent and paramount importance, affecting the well-being of every community in the nation and of every man in every community. It is the duty of the leaders, officers, and rank and file of our churches to bring these vital considerations before the too often unthinking masses.

If I lived at Kilburn I should be inclined to urge just here that till the new church is built "the masses" will find scant accommodation in the present chapel-hall. It is true; nevertheless, the hall is a comely place enough, and till the church is built will serve a while longer. Our friend, the ex-Mayor of Woolwich, and his pulpit neighbour of Lewisham, are in worse case, I think, as to this matter of a new church; and of the two, I think (but I expect to be well scolded for saying so) Lewisham's immediate needs are most pressing. The "Three-Church Fund" having raised about enough for one church, what is to be done? That is the problem now being most seriously considered. I hope it will prove to good result finally. Meanwhile, if anyone wants to get to "the masses" more effectually with our Gospel, now let him give, and give freely. The treasurer of any of the congregations I have named will have a happier New Year thereby.

One mournful note must be sounded over the loss at Peckham of its brave and ardent young minister, the Rev. A. F. G. Fletcher, whose coming among us (with his fellow-collegian, the Rev. A. Hurn, of Acton) from the Wesleyans we hailed so gladly a month or two ago. I deeply regret that Mr. Fletcher's physician forbids him further work at present—we must all hope that extended rest may restore him to the active service he so much desires. The congregation is sorely disappointed; but courage! The good time will yet come.

I must not now enter upon a detailed chronicle of the various beings and doings (and sufferings) of our score and a half of churches. "All along the line" let the word of fraternal greeting run. It is a trying world to live in, but at present we have no other, and if we tried more the world might prove less trying. Let us but use our means to the full, sing and say our best, rally round the leaders, hearten the followers, comfort the mourners, look after the young people, succour the poor, read our books and get other people to,—and, in general, adorn the Gospel we profess.

W. G. TARRANT.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Chichester.—Sunday last completed the twentieth year of the pastorate of the Rev. C. A. Hoddinott. In the morning he gave a special address to the young. In the afternoon he took charge of the workhouse service, and in the evening gave a special discourse on the past, present, and future of his work in the city. There were a number of attendants from "outside," including Alderman Holt and family. At the close there were congratulations, with hopeful expressions with regard to the future.

Dover (Appointment).—The Rev. C. A. Ginever, B.A., has accepted the unanimous invitation of the congregation to become minister of the Adrian-street Free Christian Church, and will enter on his ministry to-morrow, on the first Sunday of the New Year.

Horwich.—An interesting and impressive ceremony took place last Sunday evening. Ten young men and women in the Sunday-school having recently joined the church, at the close of the sermon, the minister, the Rev. R. C. Moore entered the communion rail and in a few words formally welcomed the young people into religious communion. After speaking of the significance of the step they were taking, and offering prayer, he extended to each the right hand of fellowship. The concluding hymn was Longfellow's "Go forth to life, O Child of earth." A wish was generally expressed that such simple services of recognition should be oftener held. The year which has just closed has seen a substantial increase of membership. The service being over, a large portion of the congregation made their way to the schoolroom, where an interesting presentation was made to Mr. C. E. Reed, who, for the space of three years or so, has been active in the school as teacher, and latterly as superintendent, and who has preached with much acceptance not only to the congregation at Horwich but to many of the congregations in the district. Mr. Reed is about to leave the town to take charge of the congregation at Ringwood. Mr. C. J. P. Fuller, the honorary organist and chairman of the church committee, presided, and, after speaking words of appreciation and hearty congratulation, called upon the minister to make the presentation of a beautiful oak writing desk with rolled top from the church and school. Mr. Reed feelingly replied. The singing of the Doxology closed the proceedings. Mr. Reed carries with him into his new sphere of work the best wishes and confident expectations of all who know him.

Iford: Seven Kings.—At the Central Hall a series of special Sunday evening services will be held, commencing on Sunday next at 6.30., when the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards will give an address on "The God we Worship." The presence and sympathy of Unitarians living in the neighbourhood will be appreciated. The name of the preacher and his subject will appear in the Calendar each week.

Liverpool District Missionary Association.—Religious services are to be held in a room at the Public Hall, West Kirby, on Sunday mornings at 11 a.m., beginning on January 14. The Rev. H. W. Hawkes will conduct the first five services. Former members of Unitarian and kindred congregations and liberal thinkers desirous of unfettered worship are cordially invited to support this missionary effort.

London: Blackfriars Mission.—The sum of £37 15s. 7d. has been handed to the treasurer of the Mission, being the net proceeds of the dramatic performance arranged by Mr. H. B. Lawford, of "A Snug Little Kingdom," on December 13 last. All those who had the trouble and pleasure of disposing of tickets are to be congratulated on the excellent result, and Mr. Lawford and the ladies and gentlemen taking part on the stage are thanked for their part in the entertainment.

London: Essex Church.—To-morrow evening, at Essex Church, the Rev. Frank K. Freeston will begin a short series of Sunday evening addresses on "Old Truths and New Meanings." The subjects will be respectively:—I., "A Religion for To-day"; II., "The New Old Bible"; III., "The Christianity of Christ"; IV., "The Life Eternal—Here and Hereafter." Young men and all members of guilds are especially invited to attend.

London: Hampstead.—The Rev. Stopford A. Brooke preached at Rosslyn Hill Chapel morning and evening on New Year's Eve, the service being conducted in the morning by the Rev. V. D. Davis, in the evening by the Rev. Henry Gow. To the sermons there is further reference in our leading article. Mr. Brooke is to preach again to-morrow (Sunday) evening, the last time for the present.

London: Stepney.—Our East-end churches lost a good friend and former faithful worker through the death, on New Year's Day, of Mr. Richard Darlison, in his fifty-ninth year. Brought up in the Congregational communion, he early came under the influence of Mr. Corkran, and began Sunday-school teaching at Spicer-street. From this time his love of work found its opportunity. He was the first superintendent of the Sunday-school at Stepney, and a member of the church committee; thence, at the desire of the Rev. Robert Spears, he transferred himself to the Limehouse Mission. Later, removing to Forest Gate, he became a member of the committee of the then newly formed church there. Being keenly critical, he performed a useful part in keeping the other members alert, that there should be no slackness or lack of energy. As his health declined his retirement became necessary; but he retained his interest in the doings of our churches to the last. As a politician he was an ardent Radical, and at one time was secretary of the Bow Liberal Club. Mr. Darlison had lately lived at Leigh, Essex, and died of heart failure, consequent on asthma, at the residence of his daughter in Ilford.

Pudsey.—The largest Christmas gatherings in the town were on Dec. 26 and 27, when the Victoria Hall was crowded to witness performances by the Unitarian Dramatic Society (engaged by the Committee of the Mechanics' Institute). On Saturday the ladies' sewing Society held their annual sale of work, which was opened by the Mayoress, supported by the Mayor, the Rev. Chas. Hargrove, Rev. E. C. and Mrs. Jones, Mr. and Mrs. Verity, and the Rev. Alfred Amey, and with Mr. W. J. Noble as chairman. There was a large attendance, the sale proving the most successful yet held.

Yarmouth.—The Old Meeting has lost a strong supporter through the death on Dec. 23 of Mr. Bruce Leach, at the age of 35. Mr. Leach, who was the only son of the late J. J. Leach, J.P., resided at Gorleston, and was an earnest advocate of the anti-vivisection cause, being local hon. secretary. The funeral was conducted by the Rev. John Birks at the New Cemetery, and on Sunday there was also a memorial service at the Old Meeting.

Our plea for help in sending copies of THE INQUIRER to Free Libraries throughout the country has not met with the response for which we hoped. This New Year, perhaps, will prompt friends to fresh generosity.

A Foundation of Strength.

The Medical Magazine says:—
“For strength, purity, and nourishment, there is nothing superior to be found to Cadbury's.” This high testimony is endorsed by all regular users of Cadbury's cocoa, which is a strength-giving and sustaining beverage, suitable alike in infancy, prime of life, and old age. The purity of Cadbury's cocoa is a great point with the manufacturers and no deleterious ingredients are used to flavour or thicken the beverage. Cadbury's is cocoa, and the best cocoa only, manufactured amid pure surroundings in the heart of England.

No other cocoa is prepared in the Cadbury way, none yield a beverage so pure, so wholesome, and so delicious. Choose it for economy, for fine flavour, for digestibility, and because it is the finest cocoa.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE General Election is upon us, and during the next three weeks great issues will be decided. It is a time not for speculation, but for strenuous work, that the forces of freedom and progress may be fully marshalled and directed to the end of the true honour of our country, and the welfare of the people as a whole. This declaration the workers in either political camp may take to themselves as they are able. Politics, says "J. B.," in an article in this week's Christian World, in the final view "will be regarded as the form in which the common human life is to express itself, while religion will be accepted as the inner spiritual force by which that life is developed, purified, and lifted to its highest term. But these two things are one—one as inner and outer, as the convex and concave of a circle, as the body and soul which make the one personality. In this sense, to be truly religious is to be truly political, and to be truly political is to be truly religious."

PROFESSOR B. NATH SEN, who gave an address at Essex Hall on Monday evening (reported in another column) at the meeting held to commemorate the death in 1884 of his distinguished relative Keshub Chunder Sen, has published an interesting illustrated pamphlet, with title "The Pilgrim. I.—Experiences in Europe and America," telling of his coming to Europe for the International meetings at Geneva last August, and then of what he saw and did in America, at the National Conference in Atlantic City, at Meadville, Pittsburg, Buffalo, Toronto, Boston, Concord, Harvard, &c. The pamphlet is published at the Christian Life Office, 5, Fetter-lane, and may be had also at Essex Hall for a shilling. We understand that after his return to India Professor Sen may issue further numbers of The Pilgrim.

His message in The Pilgrim Professor Sen addresses in the first instance to his friends at home; but the new friends he has made in this country will also read it with interest, and they should not grudge the shilling, though it seems a good deal for what is only a twenty-page pamphlet. In a brief introduction, before taking up his story, Professor Sen writes:—"Will the East and the West ever understand each other? Will England, and Europe, and America ever understand India? Never, except on the sanctified heights of thought and life and character. Not without much cost must the ascent to those heights be made by each; nay, not without much conflict even, and collision. Long, and hard, and strenuous must be the struggle before India—i.e., her millions, her people—can realise what her soul is. Then alone will she know what to live for and what to die for. In this process others can and will help her as much by positive assistance as by positive, deep, and radical contradiction. Let her be thankful to the West, so far, at least, for giving her the idea of a common soul and a common destiny for the millions, the people. Will not the West help her still further to carry out this idea? Is it not a law of the expansion of its own inner life that the West should say to the East: Live and know thyself, and glorify God with me; as it is the mission of the East to say to the West: Live in order that thou mayest love God and find peace? Verily, verily, it is true of both of them that they can neither live nor fulfil the law of their being till they have learnt to pray together: Thy Kingdom come, Thy will be done!"

Professor Sen, we note, is to preach to-morrow (Sunday) morning at Wandsworth.

WITH the New Year's number the Methodist Times completed its majority, and entered upon its twenty-second year. The paper was established by the late Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, to promote the Forward Movement in Methodism, and it had an eminent success. "If we ask," the editor writes in the New Year's number, "for the secret of the success of the Forward Movement, it has lain first in energy and determination, in a strong faith and a fervent will. But also it lies in the democratic policy which is steadily growing among us; it has preached the equality of believers: the true equality of all men. Hence its war against pews.

Hence its broad popular preaching. Hence its club-feeling and inculcation of joy and confidence. All these were characteristic of Mr. Hughes in a high degree, and they are enshrined in his movement. His monument is inscribed not only with the name of our own Church. The spirit which animated Mr. Hughes spread to the other Churches. In view of this great social work, this revived, rather than new, presentation of the Gospel, the divisions which severed the Free Churches fell into the background and their union came prominently into view as an obvious policy. Mr. Hughes was the real founder of the Free Church Council."

WITH some aspects of the policy of that Council we can have no sympathy. It set up a dogmatic division between the "Evangelical" Free Churches and our own, destructive of much natural sympathy and co-operation in good work, and the success of the policy from the point of view of organisation, put many men on the "Evangelical" side of the line in a false position. At the same time over the beneficent work of the Methodist Forward Movement, in ministering to the neglected of our great cities, we must unfeignedly rejoice. "Christian social service" says the Editor of the Methodist Times in his anniversary article, is "the hope of our times," and concludes his article:—"We shall urge on our Church, in all its departments, to the work of social service, and we wish every one of our readers to help us by getting another to take in our paper. Look at the original message of Jesus Christ, 'Repent,' said our Master, not 'because the pit of hell is at hand,' but 'because the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand.' Repent, for without repentance you are worthless for spiritual purposes. Repent, for a new era has begun. Repent, for you are wanted, and your Father calls you into the Kingdom of His Son. Repent, for our very enemies show that without Christ life is vapid and leads only to a universal despair. Repent, because in Christ the world is good, is improving, and will, if you will help, be transformed into a new heaven and a new earth."

ON the last Thursday of the old year the thousandth number of the British Weekly appeared, and it must therefore be nearly as old as the Methodist Times. That number contained a remarkable number of tributes to the value and success of the paper, and the services it rendered in introducing new writers, such as Barrie and Ian Maclaren to their public.

BY A MINISTER.

XXXIII.

I AM not sure that in these enlightened days superstition is always quite fairly judged. It is often confused with ignorance. Ignorance is a blank; superstition is] active thought, misdirected, perhaps, but still thought. A superstitious man may be without knowledge, but he is not therefore without mind. Superstition has a literature of its own, and a history; half the world's art has been inspired by it; its errors are as much studied as the truths of science. It may be the religion of fear, but it is also its poetry. It has added a whole world of ideas to our conceptions. I have a schoolboy friend who, with all his bright intelligence, is just a little dull. He has no illusions. No weird fancies ever carry him away. He thinks to the ends of his five senses, and no further. In an African forest he would be full of lively interpretations. Fire and wind and gathering cloud would touch in him a sense of wonder and awe. He would be observant, receptive, responsive; he would be conscious of presences and agencies about him; and, being all this, what good company he would also be!

I do not wonder that country people flock into towns. Their solitudes are no longer crowded with mystery, and enlivened by surprise; the night is as void as the day; there are no omens to be watched for, no spells to be broken, no tricks to be averted, no alarms to be laid; they cannot even frighten one another from chimney-corners with fireside tales. There are no tales to tell. Folk-lore has come to an end. Who could now add a link to that fantastic chain? Who could reinvent the old inventions? Yet they came from the brains of the unlettered, unable to write their names. There is no countryman to-day who cannot write his name, but what proof can he give of imaginative mind? I am not lamenting the decay of superstition, but I cannot say that the result of that decay is not a certain poverty of thought.

I have been turning over the pages of three weighty volumes. They have for their title the one word, Superstitions. If truth be actual fact, then there is not a word of truth in them from end to end. But neither is there a word of falsehood, for here are no denials, only conjectures and surmises, gropings and questionings, ventures and experiments, theories of cause and impressions of fact—all showing that truth, after all, was the object sought. Superstitions are the wrong guesses of a religious mind. And this leads to a disquieting question. What if superstition be more alert, more vigilant, more sensitive than that which passes with us for the love of truth? It is a common thing nowadays to speak of the immanence of God in nature. But this immanence is more recognised than realised. To the Hebrew poet it was an ever present fact; his God was in the wind, though more than the wind, and in the fire, though more than the fire; He came flying upon the wings of the storm, dark waters and thick cloud made His pavilion round about Him; light was His garment, and the heaven His curtain, His voice it was that broke the cedars of Lebanon, and shook the wilderness of Cades; His way was in the sea, and His paths in the great waters, and His footsteps were not known. The primitive savage has the same sensitiveness to outward occurrence, and almost arrives at the same explanation but he cannot think of his god as both immanent and transcendent, and so glides into nature-worship. But we of to-day, though we speak of God in nature, do not easily, at the time of happening, refer natural phenomena to supernatural action, and it may be asked whether the savage does not more keenly realise in concrete fact that which to us is little more than abstract doctrine. The remedy, I take it, is the cultivation of direct modes of thought and speech. Why interpose any philosophic or scientific medium? If a process of nature is the handiwork of God, if form and colour and movement are manifestations of His presence, and every coming to pass an expression of His will, let us say as much in the language we use. I hope to save my young friend, later on, from unthinking and too frequent use of the word "law." I shall also try to make him understand that religious fear is not the same thing as a religion of fear, and that, in view of the awful realities and solemnities about him, and before him, he need not be afraid of being afraid. Finally, I shall do something, if I can, to prepare him for the humbling thought that his own superior belief will never be anything more to the unbeliever than—superstition. If there is still a last word to be added, it shall be the warning which Bacon gives: "There is a superstition in avoiding superstition; when men think to do best, if they go furthest from the superstition formerly received; therefore care would be had that the good be not taken away with the bad; which commonly is done, when the people is the reformer."

PREACHER AND PROPHET.

SIR,—In the criticism of Professor Harper's book on "Amos and Hosea" by Mr. Addis, in the recent number of THE INQUIRER (December 30), Mr. Addis thinks the modern preacher and his sermon not only widely different from but far inferior to the Hebrew prophet and his message. He says "inspiration and reflection enter in very different proportions into Hebrew prophecy and the best of modern sermons." That the Hebrew prophet "had to speak the message directly communicated to him from above," but that the modern sermon "is natural," and the preacher not a prophet but a scribe, and that therefore the modern preacher "cannot, without unreality, lay claim to the prophetic office." The minister, according to Mr. Addis, is neither prophet nor priest, but scribe.

If Mr. Addis thinks the message to the Hebrew seers was direct in some supernatural way, was not the message just as direct and supernatural to Jesus, Peter, and Paul? Why draw an arbitrary line between "the Word of the Lord" as it came to Isaiah, Amos, and Hosea, and that same "Word of the Lord" as it came to Jesus, Peter and Paul; Wesley, Robertson, Parker, and Emerson? God is not dead, nor inspiration ended with ancient Bible seers. For us, especially, who hold no clerical priesthood, and no finally authoritative text-book, who also see that God did not enter history only once and then quite exceptionally, does it not in reality follow that, if Mr. Addis is right, we Unitarians have no raison d'être for our ministry.

Dr. Martineau thought differently from Professor Addis. He says that while the prophet and his work always relate to the future, the Hebrew prophets belong to a class scattered over every nation and every period—Jesus being in the line of the prophets, the Christian minister is the reproducer of that prophetic life—a prophet, one in whom the primitive and everlasting relations between God and man have been so realised as to move him to communicate that realisation through his personality to his fellow men. Therefore, Dr. Martineau speaks of John Hamilton Thom as "a prophet of Him who is a Spirit," and adds that the world needs but prophetic voices of the Spirit like his to wake response from every side and "wider spread the spiritual family of God."

Preaching is the direct communication of truth through personality; it is not necessary for man to know more, but he must be better than others, living in closer relations with God, if he is to be a preacher or prophet. Dr. Martineau says a theological training is simply critical, not dynamic; it can restrain, correct and purify; it cannot empower and inspire that inward spring on which all but the whole depends. That prophetic gift, which alone makes the preacher, is not intellectual, but ethical and spiritual, entirely depending on the fidelity of the individual conscience. "Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God." If, then, true eloquence is essentially ethical, and Christianity pre-eminently personal, it is the dynamic of the preacher that is of the utmost importance. And is it not remarkably strange that while we, Unitarians, can produce philosophers, scientists, theologians, and Biblical exegeses second to none, we have few preachers? We, the church of the Spirit, have little or no dynamic in the pulpit. And does not this arise from the fact that we foster an intellectual rather than a spiritual type of preaching? Instead of the idea of the preacher and his message as given to us by Mr. Addis, which is at the root of all our feebleness, we, Unitarians, have yet to learn that the preacher and prophet are one—his message ever being:—

"What I have felt and seen

With confidence I tell."

The future of the Christian Church entirely depends on the direct inspiration of its preachers or prophets.

G. V. CROOK.

EVERY man is born for his fellow man. We are all intended to be members one of another. The law of self-sacrifice for the good of others, wherever and whenever occasion calls, is an integral part of the constitution of true humanity. Hence the selfish and self-seeking are essentially inhuman. Hence Christianity, which prescribes such self-sacrifice, which was based upon a great act of self sacrifice, is a true development of humanity.—George Brown.

EUCKEN'S PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION.

II.—THE SPIRITUAL LIFE AND ITS CONTENT.

IN the first article it was pointed out that one of the chief foundations of Eucken's system of Religious Philosophy consisted in the fact that a cleavage is to be found in the very nature of the soul itself. On the one hand, we found the qualities to be those which pertain to the natural subjective life of man. They constitute a piece of reality in so far as they are necessary for the continuance of life. For example, eating and drinking and caring for our own interests are necessary not only for ourselves, but in a sense for the welfare of others. But such a natural life makes no demands upon the whole of our nature; many of the powers which man possesses lie quite dormant in the very act of accomplishing these natural things. The higher animals perform many of these functions, and perform them often with a kind of instinct which puts man to shame. Man is put to shame in this respect for two reasons at least: first, he is capable of knowing that such actions do not constitute the highest reality, and secondly, he is aware that higher qualities are dragged down to the level of the sensuous, and so produce the diabolical aspects with which many human acts are saturated. In connection with such actions, the mistake is made of taking our own pleasure and the satisfaction of various subjective states as the criteria of reality. Instead of lifting up the lower to the level of the higher, to the level of the demands of the higher life, the higher, as already stated, is dragged down until it becomes entangled in the net of the lower. The maxim of Kant has been forgotten in such a mode of action, viz., that we should always act as if we desired our action to become a universal rule. The standard, then, is not our own subjective states of mind or feeling, it is not a kind of equilibrium which the self has reached within the narrow limits of its own interests. The standard now must be something which is objective to us in so far that we have not realised the whole of it; it is now something which has fallen into a higher scheme of things, a higher order of being, than any subjective desires or sensuous impressions.

Here Eucken starts out in several of his great works to explain the meaning of this higher reality, which he names the Spiritual Life on the one hand, and God on the other hand. What is this Spiritual Life according to Eucken? At a later stage we shall see what he means by God. The Spiritual Life has no ready-made content, but it has the potency for a content. It is the higher nature of the soul—the side which has to take outside burdens upon itself and outside ideals as well. In order that the potency may be possessed by the life more and more, it must become convinced of the fact that the only way reality can be reached is by taking things outside itself into consideration and weaving these into the web of the existence of the higher life. It is, in fact, a process which may be termed a macrocosm and a microcosm. It is a macrocosm in the sense that the life is related to the cosmic life around it; it is a microcosm in the sense that it includes the potentiality of the cosmic life within itself. If life is to grow, if it is to change its first impressions of things, it has to struggle to get out of its lower level to an ever higher one. It has to leave behind itself the level of sensuous impressions as well as the level of its own subjectivity. If either the inward or the outward aspect of life is ignored, the life will suffer and it cannot rise. But the higher self must hold itself as capable of finding its reality in the two—the outward and the inward—and in the overcoming of the two in a higher unity. If the object alone gains superiority, the life sinks into a barren realism or naturalism which simply rests satisfied with the factors which have operated in the history and behaviour of things; and if, on the other hand, the subject is lifted out of its relations with the object, the higher self has broken its connection with the source of its life and with the possibility of receiving fresh content. In fact, in this latter way the self attempts to live on its own capital without increasing it, and the whole of its content is bound sooner or later to come to an end, and so the staleness and emptiness of life set in.

There is, then, an all-important sense in which the wholeness of the higher life and the wholeness of things have to be taken into account. By this wholeness is meant that the reality now consists of that quality which has fused by the union of subject and object. This reality is quite other than each of the two placed separately by itself. This fusion takes place on various levels. Most philosophers would admit that it is true on the intellectual level, on the level of knowing anything at all. Eucken carries this further, and states that it constitutes not only knowledge, but a higher thing—religion. As already pointed out, the whole of man's nature is not in the mere act of knowing. But on this level of religion all the demands which thought has made, yea, and the demands which are made when the element of thought has passed into the needs and aspirations of the higher life, when moral needs present themselves—all these demands are to be possessed by man. It is evident that these demands and aspirations of man's nature, when viewed in man's highest and noblest moments, are something quite different from what occurs on the natural or intellectual level of existence, or on either the objective or the subjective side of things when either of these sides is held separately. This combining quality of the two sides of existence is called by Eucken Inbegriff—i.e., it is the totality or aggregate of all things. It is a new reality; viewed externally it is the Cosmic Life; viewed internally it is the Spiritual Life. It is not a perception, although perception has contributed its share to its existence in us; it is not a thought or a thought process, although these also have entered as factors into its constitution. It is both together, with the aspirations and the demands of the higher life united, which constitutes this new reality. On one side this new reality is a thought aspect; on the other side it is a pragmatic aspect. And Eucken insists that they cannot be separated without the greatest injury to life and religion. He unites both in his system. The reality is not speculative ideas about the Absolute, for in all these ideas the Absolute remains something quite other than ourselves in its nature; and it is not the practical aspect of life working in the direction of its desires, and considering these alone as real and true. It cannot be the first, for that would rob the self of its own potency for reality; it cannot be the second, for that would rob the self of its absolute standard. It is true that Eucken's Inbegriff has not a ready-made reality, but it has the germ of it—i.e., in it is something of the very nature of the absolute standard itself. Although it has to hold fast to the truth that the absolute standard is other than itself, yet it has to hold quite as fast that there is enclosed within itself the power to be at one more and more with this absolute Perfection.

That such conceptions have much to do with objects of sense or with the history of things does not alter one iota the matter, in the sense of lowering the values of such conceptions. They cannot be explained by evolution except in so far as their history is explained. Evolution is an account of the process, of the passing and transformation of things from stage to stage, from the lowest elements up to man, and as Eucken says from the natural man to the spiritual man, or, if we like Nietzsche's term better, to the Übermensch, to the Overman. But Nietzsche's Overman is not that of Eucken. With the former the Overman has carried many of the coarser and most brutal elements of the lower self into the higher region of activity without altering the nature of these elements. With the latter the spiritual man is he who has struggled, and evermore will struggle, and has undergone, and will evermore undergo, pain and sorrow and tears, for so alone can he be lifted out of his own small self, can be purified of all that is merely personal and subjective, can be raised from the bondage of sense-impressions, and the rule of a secular culture which becomes empty and vain when it is raised to the throne of life, and can become the partaker of the cosmic life.

Eucken insists that the timidity of so many philosophers to pass from the purely subjective mental life which is entangled in so many sense-impressions should be fought against with the greatest courage. In England and Germany to-day, philosophy is made to rest either on a pure physiological and psychological analysis, or on a construction which seems utterly unaware of more than half the needs and aspirations of human life. In so many of these philosophies the problems of life are barely touched from the point of view of the religious consciousness. And with all due respect to men of eminence like Professor Wm. James, even a small man is able to see that he is outside his province when he deals with the deepest questions of religion. He admits himself that he has never experienced many of these phases of the religious consciousness, and that he writes as an outsider. Our philosophers will have to live through these experiences if they are ever to give us anything of permanent value. Philosophy must pass from the realm of mind to the realm of life as a whole, and trust that the passing from the understanding and even from reason to the life of the spirit constitutes the road on which the highest reality may be found—that which opens out the infinite possibilities of life.

It makes a world of difference whether man is ready to take this step or no, whether he is willing to hold as the one reality that which is the whole of life in union with the highest aspirations of the spirit. Such a reality is a fact of the spirit, and so its foundation remains unshaken. Such a foundation exists in the very nature of things and in the very life of the spirit of man. It is in this transition that life gains its greatness and its goodness; it is thus that fresh problems force themselves upon the spirit of man and exercise such an enormous pressure upon it. These are problems other than those of the bare intellect. The intellect has done its share to make them known to us, but when they sink to the depth of the spirit they become problems of morality and religion and of the one thing needful—the ever-upward march of man. For now it becomes clear to the man who has viewed life in a manner such as this, that it is in some solution of these problems that life in the only real degree becomes possible. He has now the spiritual insight to see that the permanent possession by the soul of these demands, which come in the forms of ideals, constitute the very core and pith of life itself. Such a state, with all who have experienced it as Eucken so grandly paints it, is none other than an entrance into a new world, and the establishing of a connection with a higher order of existence than before. This is the true existence. As previously pointed out, this New World is, even when it is entered, no ready-made one. It has to be possessed after it has been discovered. But here we wish to emphasise the discovery of it, and leave the possession to a later article. In the discovery of this new world life is conceived as not belonging to the natural existence and everyday experience, to the impressions which are made upon us without any reaction, but in a new greatness and goodness which stand over against these, and which make such a difference between the natural man and the spiritual man. It is, therefore, out of this fact of the spirit that a fundamental distinction must be made—and it is a matter of life or death to make it—between these two kinds of lives. And holding the difference between the two kinds before ourselves, there is the affirmation of the fact that the spiritual life belongs to a higher order of things than the natural one. This is one of the most distinctive notes in Eucken's teaching. "If," he says, "the spiritual world which this idealism brings forth, with its enclosing of a deeper truth, and of a more original nature of things, is not a higher grade of reality than the natural existence which it shows as belonging to a lower order, then the whole fails and all courage is lost. This idealism issues the proclamation of the whole, and of the ground of existence in one encircling fact. It means something quite other than the beautiful colouring of the given; it means the opening and the development of a higher and more definite reality enclosed within itself. It means a new world as the kernel of all. In the fact of the great creations of idealism—as, e.g., in Plato, in the beginnings of Christianity, in Luther, in Kant—existence is not made lighter, but more difficult; all these have recognised the pressure of mighty problems upon our existence. To lighten existence and to embellish it belongs to a pseudo-idealism. Against this, as did the men of yore, have we to-day to fight; if we are to be idealists in the true sense of the word, we have to work before all other things for the substance of life, for a spiritualisation of existence out of the whole and out of the depth, and we may at no moment forget that we can work and conquer only under the delineation of the truth, of the strong, inexorable truth."

These words are needed to-day. When the "roots" of the tree of life are offered as a sufficient nourishment for the human soul, and the "fruit" is ignored and even treated as non-existent, it is necessary to call attention to the half-heartedness and nervousness with which philosophy and even religion prepare the table of life for us. The true idealism, as Eucken insists, must be concrete, that is, it must not mean that an ideal world is prepared for us, and that we can enter into it with half our nature asleep. The necessity of this true idealism which takes into account the whole of our nature must be recognised and welcomed, and this necessity points out the need of the recognition of the smallness and pettiness and selfishness of the natural life, and a struggle of the whole life must issue in order to possess the things of eternal value, and such a struggle and such a possession are to be ours throughout life. In this manner problems ethical and religious open in front of us, new and ever greater demands are made upon the whole of life, and it is in the realisation of these in however humble and toilsome a way that the meaning and significance of the new world becomes clear to us; it is thus alone that a permanent piece of reality sticks for ever in the life. How this reality works we shall see in our third article

W. TUDOR JONES.

THE NEW THEOLOGY AND SOME OF THE OLD.

THE two books named below* are from the pens of American divines whose former writings are well known and highly appreciated in this country, and who admirably represent that liberal movement in theology which is transforming the thought of so many churches on both sides of the Atlantic. The works before us do not, of course, cover the whole field of theological study, but they go a great way towards doing so by the very fact that they deal with matters of such fundamental and far-reaching significance as the Scriptures and the doctrine of salvation.

* "The Use of the Scriptures in Theology." By William Newton Clarke, D.D., Professor of Christian Theology in Colgate University. (T. & T. Clark, 4s.)

"The Christian Doctrine of Salvation." By George Barker Stevens, Ph.D., D.D., LL.D., Dwight Professor of Systematic Theology in Yale University. New volume of the International Theological Library. (T. & T. Clark, 12s.)

Dr. Clarke's volume consists of four lectures in which he seeks to show how the Bible has been affected by criticism, and under what conditions it may now be used for doctrinal purposes. It can no longer, he says, be regarded as a book of equal value and authority throughout; in the new light that has been thrown upon it it is seen to be composed of various and often conflicting elements, Jewish, Pagan, and Christian. If we are to use it at all, therefore, in constructing our theology we must adopt some principle of selection; and the true principle is to make use only of the Christian element, the pure gold, rejecting whatever is as wood and hay and stubble in comparison. The Christian element, however, is not to be identified with the whole of the New Testament, for in its pages there is much that is not Christian. Nor, on the other hand, is the Christian element confined to the New Testament; for all that is pre-Christian is not necessarily un-Christian in spirit and anticipation. Our principle only requires us to consider as valueless for theology whatever in the Bible is inconsistent with that "body of truth" which was Christ's "revelation" to the world. This "body of truth," or "revelation," is to be spiritually discerned; it has no definite verbal formula, and it does not of necessity include every word of Jesus himself. Some scholars, in their anxiety to free the Master from the charge of being mistaken in any respect, refuse to believe that he uttered the Apocalyptic sayings in the 24th chapter of Matthew, and they declare that the Church tradition, embodied in the Gospel record, "gathered in with his words some that were not his"; but, says Dr. Clarke, "exegesis is growing united in affirming that an expectation of an early return in his kingdom cannot fairly be eliminated from the words of Jesus." However unwelcome to many at present may be the thought that Jesus was mistaken, "it may be," continues our author, "that Christians of a later and riper time will not wonder or be grieved that the Christ whom they adore and love saw partly with the eyes of his age, when they perceive how much it means that he revealed the highest things in the very light of heaven, and made to dawn upon this world the glory of the living God." It is the "larger meanings" of Jesus, the great essential ideas of his Gospel, that constitute, according to Dr. Clarke, the fountain light of Christian theology; and in this we entirely agree with him: His book, so reverent in spirit, so radical in thought, and clear in style, can be confidently recommended to all who would learn the difference which criticism has made as regards the use of the Scriptures in theology.

The new theology has no more doughty champion than Professor Stevens, of Yale, and in his book on "The Christian Doctrine of Salvation" he directs many a thrust at the weak places in the orthodox armour. The polemic tone is fully justified; for in no respect has the traditional theology departed further from spiritual reasonableness and the simplicity of Christ than in this great subject of salvation. In the first half of his volume Dr. Stevens deals with the Scriptural basis of the doctrine, and with the various theories hathave since arisen to solve the problem as to what had to be done for us before we could be saved (which may be taken as the theological version of the familiar Gospel question.) We do not read far on in the book without learning that the doctrine of substitutionary punishment is our author's bête noir; and he rejoices to find no evidence of it, as usually understood, in the Old Testament, and not very much in the New. He sees no trace of it in the teaching of Jesus. It had its birth in the pharisaic schools, and is to be regarded as one of the things which that child of the Pharisees, Paul, did not put away from him when he "became a man" and a Christian. We are not sure that Dr. Stevens does not somewhat exaggerate the cruder Pharisaic element in Paul, but at any rate it was there, and through him chiefly it entered into the thought and literature of the Church. We believe, therefore, that our author is speaking the strict truth when he says that "the traditional doctrine of salvation has been constructed primarily out of the survivals of Pharisaism in Paul's thought"; and we heartily endorse his opinion that "the men of to-day can no more think in terms of late Jewish theology than they can think in terms of pre-Socratic philosophy. They can no more appropriate the outward forms of Paul's thought respecting expiation than they can adopt the cosmology or demonology which he derived from the same source." Dr. Stevens, however, makes it clear that Paul had also another, a more ethical and mystical view of the method of salvation. The first was a Pharisaic inheritance, but this one was original with him, begotten of his own heart and experience, and is, in its essential features, not yet superseded. After describing and discussing other New Testament ideas of salvation, the author passes to the consideration of subsequent speculation on the subject. He reveals, we think, the true inwardness of the "Commercial Theory" of Anselm by relating it with the feudalism of the time. Just as a mediæval king might enfranchise the inhabitants of a town in recognition of the distinguished services of one of their number, so, according to Anselm, was it the good pleasure of God to set men free from the penalty of their sin in recognition and reward of the splendid righteousness and self-sacrifice of Christ. When, however, it came to be asked, as it was by Socinus, why God could not release men without the exaction of such service and sacrifice on the part of Christ, why He could not forgive them "even as we forgive our debtors," Anselm's doctrine was found lacking, and it had to give place to another. This other was the so-called "Governmental Theory" of Grotius. According to it the righteous order of the world had at all costs to be vindicated and safeguarded. But if men were freely forgiven they might lose respect for this order, and learn to think lightly of the sin which violates it. So the divine plan had both to uphold the government of the universe, and to achieve the salvation of sinners. This twofold purpose was accomplished in the death of Christ. In that event the goodness and the severity of God are revealed—his goodness in providing such a means of salvation, his severity in demanding such an awful sacrifice. The Grotian theory, however, did not commend itself to the 17th century divines who have been chiefly responsible for the type of doctrine that has since prevailed. They professed to see in the death of Christ not a mere "penal example," but an exact equivalent of the punishment due to mankind. Their full-blown penal theory, as well as the later modifications of it, Dr. Stevens attacks with relentless logic, and he also discusses the various ethical and subjective views that have arisen mainly as a protest against it.

Our author very properly begins the second and constructive part of his volume with a chapter on "The Christian Concept of God." He shows that the various doctrines of salvation have had their origin in varying ideas of the Divine character. Turning to the Gospels, he finds that "in Jesus' revelation of God, two points stand out in clear relief: (1) that for him the term "Father" best expressed God's nature and relation to men, and (2) that he made the quality of mercy or grace primary in the character and action of God." He contends that the traditional theories of atonement "are not built upon the Christian concept of God"; and, in our opinion, he has proved his contention up to the hilt. In an excellent chapter entitled "The Eternal Atonement," he states his own view. He uses the word "eternal" in contrast to transactional, indicating that atonement is a process that has been ever at work, instead of being something begun and ended on Calvary. As scriptural basis for his doctrine he refers to Paul's idea of the cosmic Christ; to the Johannine Logos, the divine thought that has existed from the beginning and been the inspiring principle of all goodness; to the conception of the eternal priesthood of Christ as found in the Epistle to the Hebrews, and to other elements of New Testament theology which signify the presence in all history of that divine spirit of saving and suffering love which reveals itself in the life and death of Jesus of Nazareth. Wherever and through whomsoever this spirit is bringing men back to the life of goodness, there God is being satisfied, and the eternal atonement being once more exemplified. This doctrine, which represents atonement as the satisfaction of God's love and not as the appeasement of his wrath, marks a great step in religious thought, and we can but congratulate Dr. Stevens and his fellow-workers in the New Theology on having taken it.

The chapter on "The Personality of the Saviour" strikes us as being one of the finest in the book. On some points, however, it is open to criticism. For example, Dr. Stevens postulates absolute sinlessness in the character of Jesus as a condition of his saving work; but while professing to infer this sinlessness from a study of the personal consciousness of Jesus, he makes no reference whatever to the synoptic saying, "Why callest thou me good? there is none good but God," though he does not fail to quote the Johannine and less authenticated one, "Which of you convicteth me of sin?" Is he justified in thus ignoring one of the few relevant sayings? We think not.

This book is a solid and altogether notable contribution to the literature of its subject, and is worthy to be placed beside the best of its predecessors in the International Theological Library:

J. M. CONNELL;

A FAULTY ETHICAL STUDY.*

It is a shock of disappointment to open a book entitled upon the cover, "King David of Israel," and to find within what purports to be "a study in the evolution of ethics." Dr. Callaway has no fear of the divinity that doth hedge a king, which is a very real divinity in the person of such a king as David; he lays bold hands upon a sacred shrine; and few thoughtful readers, we think, will be eager to congratulate him upon the results of his hardihood. Dr. Callaway's main purpose, as he announces it in his introduction, was to present "an impartial sketch" of the "state of morality" among the Hebrew people at a certain early stage in their history. The author's design, however, dwindles as he handles it into an endeavour to detect the admitted moral standards upon which the Israelites, at a period reflected in many pages of the Old Testament, based their judgments of right and wrong. Whether by such a method as this any justice could be done to the moral spirit of a vigorous people we venture to doubt; but the investigation would have had its value if Dr. Callaway had followed it with a completer use of the materials at his command. As it is, he has been content to devote the larger part of his book to an inquiry into the recorded history of David, whom he selects as the "highest type of manhood and sainthood that could be produced in Palestine three thousand years ago." "[David's] virtues," Dr. Callaway goes on to say, "were the virtues, and his vices were the vices, characteristic of the Hebrew people in the transitional epoch to which I have referred. If certain of his acts are commended (or condemned) by his contemporaries or early successors, we may assume that they were in accordance with (or contrary to) the current moral code."

The purpose that Dr. Callaway has most nearly at heart now becomes plain. He is anxious to help to open the eyes of Bible students to the fact that there is a difference to be made in moral authority even among the pages of the Bible itself. There are many to whom it will still come as a novel conception that the Hebrew people had to grow, as other peoples of the world have had to grow, in knowledge of the ethically good and evil; that they did not set out from their infancy with the divine revelation of the ten-fold tables of the Law. The author has an easy task in showing that it is not possible to reconcile David's conduct in all respects with the ideals of a later time, and it is to prepare the reader in some measure for the severity of the strictures he feels bound to inflict, that the author forewarns us of his endeavour to be "impartial." He concludes his undertaking with the words, "I have extenuated nothing; but I have set down nought in malice."

* "King David of Israel: A Study in the Evolution of Ethics." By Charles Callaway, M.A., D.Sc. (London: Watts & Co. Issued for the Rationalist Press Association.)

It surprises us that Dr. Callaway, who is evidently acquainted with Shakespeare, should not be able to perceive the inadequacy and injustice of his final conclusions concerning David. It is legitimate to call attention to the fact that the David of the prophets and of the Psalms is not in all respects the real David; there may even be profit in some small measure in descanting on the sins of David; but truth may be diminished as well as exaggerated, and it is better to carry one's imaginations of a great man too far than to lose sight altogether of the superb qualities that contributed to the making of a noble personality. Here, in Dr. Callaway's essay there may be some account of David's errors, of his shortcomings as perceived in the light of a more modern understanding, but here is no account at all of David the man. Dr. Callaway may rejoice that it was no part of his business to deal with the man, but rather with David's principles, as far as David was conscious of possessing principles. Even so, the inquiry should have been managed without injury to David's character. Dr. Callaway works himself into an impossible position, directly contradictory to the fact. He lays stress upon David's "untruthfulness," his "defective sense of justice," his "lack of moral courage," his "cruelty and ferocity," and his "sensuality," and nowhere does he betray an inkling of the perception that it was precisely because David was full of truth, and full of justice, and full of moral courage that he was able to do the work that he did, and bequeath the grandeur of his name to his fellow-countrymen, and to all who have to suffer and to strive. Whatever David's deflections or waverings from the perfectly admirable and right, it remains true of him that it was by virtue, and by extraordinary virtue, manhood and manliness, that he bound his companions to his side, and delivered his country from internal distresses and bitter foes.

Dr. Callaway has taken great pains with his book, and we are sorry that we cannot think his labours of more value to humanity or to that liberalising interpretation of the Bible, for which we join in his desire.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE Contemporary this month has the first part of an autobiographical record by Mr. A. S. Palmer, "An Agnostic's Progress." In the social borderland between the Philistines and the Barbarians the writer was found in the early sixties by Darwin's great works, and began his progress through devotion to the scientific doctrine of evolution, and in this number is led to a profound interest in Psychical research. For the completer religious convictions to which he has been led we must wait till next month. In this number the redoubtable Dr. Emil Reich continues his onslaught on the Higher Criticism, and heralds his own great work on General History. He also wants from £3,000 to £5,000 to go and dig in Palestine for an early copy of the Pentateuch belonging to the thirteenth or twelfth century B.C., which he professes to think would very likely be found there, and for ever confound the critics! Mr. S. P. Kerr's article, "Stands Ulster where it Did?" should also be noted, and Mr. C. F. G. Masterman's on "The Unemployed." "Briefly," the latter writes, "I think the situation may be summed up somewhat as follows: The staple industries of the country are in flourishing condition, and the trade union returns of those out of employment have fallen since this time last year, and are probably destined to fall still further. The enormous waste in the South African War, and the enormous increase in unproductive Government expenditure have, however, in part limited the demands of the home market, and struck heavily at certain luxurious trades. This is true especially of the building trade, which is a sure test of private economy, and, in a lower circle, of the consumption of alcohol—the staple luxury of the poor. In consequence, there has been thrown out of employment, in London especially, a certain number of skilled artisans, and a greater number of those labourers who, without any technical knowledge, and usually with but little store of accumulation, form the material out of which are recruited the decent unemployed. Beyond these, at the other end of the scale, the workhouses are choked with paupers. The actual numbers, and even the percentage per thousand, have steadily risen since the days of the war, and now stand at a proportion of the total population which is a really menacing danger to the future progress of this country." There is a further enormous class, Mr. Masterman says, which has to be reckoned with, the creation of the modern city, occasionally exhibited in unemployed processions, and the despair of the unemployed committees. It is the mass of shiftless casual labour, for which some better conditions must be found. Three methods of remedy are described in detail, and only the simultaneous application of all three, Mr. Masterman holds, can produce the results desired. The first is immediate help for the present needs of the unemployed, towards which farm colonies can do much; the second is the promotion of fresh industries in the country; the third is reform in the incidence of taxation, better care for the children, and "the bringing of monopoly and the value of monopoly into the hands of the whole people."

The Nineteenth Century and After has an article, on "Lafcadio Hearn," the interpreter to us of Japan, who died last September at the age of 54. We note also Lord Dunraven's article on "Moderate Reform in Ireland," and a short paper by the Rev. G. M. Royce on "The Antagonism of the Prophet and the Priest." Sir Roland Wilson writes on a question of law as it affects Mahomedans in India, pleading for a revision of the law, which, however, would have to be carried out "in the spirit of Home Rule, in close co-operation with trusted representatives of all sections of the communities concerned."

Mr. Robert Dell, writing in the Fortnightly on "French Politics and the Coming Elections" (the Chamber is to be re-elected next May), gives it as his impression that "the separation of the Churches and the State is no longer a subject of general interest, and excites no feeling outside purely ecclesiastical circles. The Separation Law seems to be generally accepted by all but the extremists on both sides as a just and liberal measure, and a satisfactory solution of a difficult problem." On the general situation, his conclusion is: "Among all the trends of political opinion there are two characteristics of modern France that stand out clearly. She is overwhelmingly Republican and overwhelmingly anti-clerical; but anti-clerical does not mean anti-religious."

In this same number there is the first part of an article by Tolstoy on "The End of the Age," setting forth his view of the Russian defeat by Japan and the present revolutionary movement in Russia as the final breakdown of the attempt to associate Christianity with any form of coercion. "The distortion of the teaching of Jesus with the non-acceptance of the commandment of non-resistance has brought Christian nations to mutual enmity and to consequent calamities, as well as to continually increasing slavery, and people of the Christian world are beginning to feel the weight of this slavery. This is the fundamental general cause of the approaching revolution. The particular and temporary causes owing to which this revolution is beginning at this very time consists firstly in the insanity of growing militarism of the peoples of the Christian world as it stands revealed in the Japanese war, and secondly in the increasing state of calamity and dissatisfaction of the working people proceeding from their being deprived of their legitimate and natural right to use the land." It will be of great interest to see how Tolstoy concludes his article. But whether we can follow him or not in his conviction that non-resistance is the key-stone of the arch of mutual service, which is the Christian ideal of life, one can heartily accept his declaration that "if the Christian nations wish to remain Christian, their efforts should be directed not at all to military power, but to something different—to such an organisation of life which, flowing from the Christian teaching, will give to men the greatest welfare, not by means of rude violence, but by means of rational co-operation and love."

In the Independent Review Sir Thomas Barclay writes on "France and Germany in our Foreign Policy," which ought, of course, to secure cordial friendship with both nations. Mr. E. D. Morel has an article on "The Congo Problem," and Edith D. Marion, in an article on "The Mothers of the Future," pleads for a Central School of Household Management and Hygiene in London, in connection, if possible, with London University, and another in connection with a North of England university, as pioneer schools.

The World's Work and Play opens with a series of striking full-page portraits of the new Government. There is also a most interesting article on the Tribune, the new London penny daily, the first number of which is to appear on Monday. "A Manchester Guardian with the London touch—that, I think, is the kind of paper we may expect." So says this forecast, and adds some particulars, which will be familiar to many of our readers, as to Mr. Franklin Thomasson, of Bolton, the founder of the new paper.

ASSOCIATION COLLECTIONS AND SUBSCRIPTIONS.

SIR,—Will you allow me the courtesy of your columns to thank very warmly the 235 congregations by whom collections on behalf of the funds of the Association were made in 1905, amounting in all to £569 1s. 1d.

In no year have so many congregations joined in this common missionary effort, and only on one occasion was a larger sum collected; and there are still, I believe, two or three treasurers who have not yet forwarded the money to Essex Hall.

The Executive Committee, at their monthly meeting held to-day at Essex Hall, desired me to express on their behalf the pleasure with which they learned of this widespread interest shown in the large and varied work which they are doing on behalf of the principles and religious faith held by Unitarians.

The work of the Association has developed greatly during the last few years, particularly since the new and increased subscriptions have placed larger resources at the disposal of the Committee. These resources, owing chiefly to the death of former subscribers, will be reduced during 1906, unless others come forward to take their place.

There are many Unitarians who do not at present subscribe; and it would be a pleasure to add their names to the list of subscribers this year. The Secretary will be pleased to forward from Essex Hall, to anyone who applies, a booklet giving a brief account of the history and work of the Association.

THE Rev. T. P. Spedding, of Rochdale, who completes this year twenty years of ministry at the Blackwater-street Church, writes in the January number of his Monthly Messenger suggesting that they should celebrate in some fitting manner the centenary of the expulsion of the Rev. Joseph Cooke from the Wesleyan body in 1806, "and the beginning of that Methodist Unitarian movement, of which our Clover-street Church preserved the tradition that is now our joint heritage with that of the older Presbyterianism of Blackwater-street Church." The congregations at Newchurch and Padiham, which with Clover-street were the direct outcome of the Methodist-Unitarian movement, are, he says, making great efforts for a due celebration, and he is anxious that Rochdale should do its part. Joseph Cooke died at Rochdale in 1811.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE FOUNDATION OF RIGHTEOUSNESS.

I BEGAN to write these words quite early in the morning, before the children were up, and the first thing I wrote down was: Build on the foundation of righteousness. That is what I want you now to think about.

At this time of year it seems quite dark at seven o'clock, and when I came into the study I had to light the lamp on my desk, to see properly to write. There was a beautiful clear sky and a star or two shining in it; but soon a red gleam rose up on the horizon and it grew lighter, and before long the world seemed wide awake, and the fresh morning air came in at the window to say a new day had begun, full of health, and happiness. Then I put out my lamp, and was glad to have the clearer, brighter light of the sun. I heard the children's voices about the house, and their mother seeing that the little one got dressed, and all would soon be ready for breakfast.

So I began to think about our home life, and what it is that makes it so happy, and in what ways we have to take care to keep it full of health and happiness.

The sunshine and fresh air that came in at the window are both wanted. We cannot do without them, or the children would grow pale and puny, and be miserable, and very soon, if there was no fresh air to be had, they would sicken and die. And food they must have, to build up their bodies, and help them to grow, and to make up again for the wear and tear of every day; and food for the mind, so that they may learn about the world in which they have to live and work, and about the people with whom they have to live. They must learn how to manage their own lives, to keep their bodies in good order, and their tempers, and attend always to conduct, so that they may do what is right, and behave properly to one another and to all the people they have to do with.

They soon find out that there are rules which must be kept. The whole world depends on the rules being kept. And because that is so in what we call the Laws of Nature, we can depend on being able to order our lives aright.

We know that the sun will rise every morning, and bring light and gladness to the world, and we are constantly learning more about those wonderful Laws of Nature, by obedience to which our bodily life is kept healthy and strong.

Then there must be good order in the house. Things must be kept in their proper places. Dust and dirt must be regularly cleared away. We have to think of one another, and not only do our own work properly, but help to make it pleasant and easy for the others to do theirs. We have to be punctual and not waste time, and do things carefully and quickly and quietly; and there are plenty of other rules to be kept. But the more we get into the habit of keeping them, the less we have to think or trouble about them. They are the natural way for a healthy and happy life.

Now in all this there are two kinds of rules to be kept. There are the rules of the outward world and our bodily life, the "laws of nature," and there are the rules of our inward life, our character, which we may think of as all together under the one great law of duty. That is for us the most important of all, and that is why I said at the beginning, "Build on the foundation of righteousness." We must care most of all to do what is right. The outward law is not of so much consequence as the inward.

Suppose there are two children living in the same home. The sunlight comes to them both, and all the good order of the house is there, and the meals are ready for them both; they do the same kind of work, and they keep the rules of bodily health in exactly the same way. But one of them thinks only of himself and his own pleasure, he is mean and envious of the other, and is deceitful and untruthful, while the other is open as the day, truthful and trustworthy and always glad to do kind and unselfish things. There you see what really matters. Not the outward things they have, but what in themselves they are. You know which life is best, which is doing right. The one that is obedient to the inward law of character.

So his life is built on the true foundation, the foundation of righteousness. If his happy home were taken from him, and he had to go out among strange people, and could take nothing with him, but just his honest heart, and hands that can do honest work, and his kindly, unselfish nature, he would yet have what is most worth having in the whole world, and that which cannot be taken away from him except by his own disobedience to the inward law of right.

While he is at home, building up his life on that true foundation, more important even than the firm ground on which the house is built, he has the secret of happiness and the best kind of manhood. And he takes it with him, wherever he may go. Think that out for yourselves. It is character that matters most of all.

It is good to have good order in the house and to have healthy bodies and minds, and to be able to enjoy the beauty of the world and all its pleasant and good things. But the children must grow up honest and truthful, gentle and unselfish. They must care most of all to do what is right. And for the rest, God will care. Is not that exactly what Jesus said? "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you."

It is the same all the world over, wherever we may be, and we know that it is best. Just as the great laws of nature, all blending together in one beautiful harmony, are the good order of God, His will, which is good will for us, in outward things, so this inward law of duty, of character, of righteousness, is His good purpose in our inward life, made known to us in our own hearts, that we may enter into the true life as His children.

When we fully understand what duty means, we know that God is with us. How that strong and glad conviction takes possession of us, I must try to tell you more fully next week. But now, here is a good verse to end with.

"What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?"

DUTY, SOCIAL AND RELIGIOUS.

In the INQUIRER of last November 25, we published a declaration on the "Duty of the Churches in Social Reform," to which 107 signatures were attached; not a few of them of real weight in the counsels of our religious community. The declaration expressed the conviction "that our churches, as a whole, can only fulfil their mission by taking a collective and organised part in the movements of our time towards the social and moral improvement of the conditions of life."

It then offered a series of propositions on the duty of the Christian Church, stating among other things:—

"(2) That this duty consists in upholding the ideals of social, national, and international righteousness; in inculcating a spirit of universal brotherhood, and helping to shape its practical embodiment in the institutions and relations of society." and concluding:—

"(7) That this responsibility is only to be met by careful and sympathetic study of the social problems of the time, with a view to organised action, on wise lines, on behalf of all movements for uplifting the physical, economic, moral, and spiritual conditions of life."

Then followed the pledge:—

"And therefore we, the undersigned, desire to pledge ourselves, and invite all members of our household of faith, to take up for special consideration in an earnest and sympathetic spirit some one or more of the many difficult questions that confront our generation, to urge their discussion in our religious Press, and to do all in our power to press forward their solution, by combined, as well as by individual effort on the part of our own group of Free Churches."

This declaration we cordially welcomed as a sign, following on the appointment of the Social Questions Committee of the Manchester District Association, of the earnest spirit stirring in our churches, out of which should come a new measure of strength and practical endeavour after righteousness. We expressed the conviction that a living religious faith must be in close touch with the needs of the people, inspiring to self-sacrifice and loving service. In full response to that call of present duty we believe the regeneration of the churches themselves is to be sought.

At the same time we asked some questions, making, as we hoped, towards a further elucidation of the matter, both as regards past experiences and present duty, and, in particular, we asked of those who signed the declaration a more definite explanation of what was meant by "taking a collective and organised part in the efforts for social progress." To these questions we have, so far, received no adequate reply.

Miss CATHERINE GITTINS, indeed, wrote, in the following week, of the declaration:—

"Its main purpose is sufficiently evident, viz., to express the conviction that the time has arrived when the valuable work on behalf of various social reforms now undertaken by individual members of our churches needs to be supplemented by some kind of corporate action, in the interest alike of the reforms and of the churches. For who can doubt that, so far as a church is a body of men and women sincerely desirous of being co-workers with God in the service of man, it has a strength, and might exert an influence, especially in its immediate neighbourhood, out of all proportion to the number of its members? And that, on the other hand, for a church as for an individual, the spirit of service is the only true revealer of the Spirit of CHRIST? It is my belief that the will only is needed; the ways will open of themselves."

And the Rev. W. J. CLARKE, after describing, from his experience of Domestic Mission work in Birmingham, the grievous social conditions for which remedy is so sorely needed, added:—

"There is, however, the far more serious question of getting at the causes of and then prescribing permanent remedies for these terrible evils, and this aspect of the matter can only be adequately dealt with by collective and carefully organised effort. And I regard it as the sacred and bounden duty of every branch of the Church of CHRIST to move fearlessly in that direction, and to boldly face all possible consequences that may follow from doing so."

Thus it will be seen that we are still left to generalities, without more definite guidance as to what the collective duty of our churches actually is.

There was, however, in the concluding pledge, a sentence which urged the discussion of these social questions "in our religious Press." In that matter, it appeared to us that we might help. Hence the following paper by Mr. G. F. MILLIN, whose book on "Commerce and Christianity" is known to many of our readers. (A popular shilling edition is now issued by Sonnenschein). We propose to reserve space from week to week for a full discussion of the subject.

TOWARDS SOCIAL REFORM.

THE LAND AND THE UNEMPLOYED.

WORK is at the bottom of all our social questions, but there seems to be an almost universal impression that the work problem itself is so difficult and complicated that it passes the wit of men to solve it.

On the contrary, the true remedy for the lack of employment for honest workers is in principle an extremely simple one; and if we could only persuade ourselves to adopt it with sufficient boldness and resolution, it would in practice prove quite safe and thoroughly effective. We shall do it some day, and generations not a great way ahead of us will look back upon our present purblind perplexity, our solemn conclaves, our multifarious committees, our elaborate organisations, our rate-raising and charitable bungling with something of the wondering, pitying amusement with which we ourselves now look back upon the quack remedies with which our forefathers attempted to deal with plagues and pestilences which they did not in the least understand. We now see very plainly that their nostrums were no remedies at all, and were often worse than useless. They did not prevent or cure the disease, but they often enfeebled the constitutions struggling against it, and sometimes set up other maladies. Science and experience have combined to show that all that it was really necessary for our forefathers to do was simply to get back to the fresh air and pure water that Nature had so bountifully provided, but which they themselves in their ignorance and carelessness had been polluting.

Very much as it was with our grandfathers and some of the worst of their physical maladies, so it is with us and our social disorders. Just as they in their ignorance polluted the air they breathed and fouled the water they drank and then called the cholera that fell upon them the visitation of God to be averted by prayer and quack nostrums, so have we by our ignorant toleration of land monopoly and our unwise and unrighteous land laws and customs driven the people out of the healthy use of the land and cooped them up in town slums, and then have persuaded ourselves that unemployed fathers and starving children and dog-kennel homes are dispensations of Providence to be set right by charity and religious teaching. Our grandfathers were quite right in praying, but what they should have prayed for was a greater knowledge of God's laws and fuller faith in the inevitableness of their working, and for common sense enough to get in line with them. That is just what we have need to pray for. Just as our grandfathers and their descendants have been getting rid of physical diseases by getting back to natural conditions of air and water, so shall we some day exterminate our social maladies and make a splendid advance in the health and happiness of our people by getting directly back to the land. But if it is to be a real remedy, and not a mere palliative, if it is to be an advance and not a movement in a segment of a circle, it must be set about on a totally new method.

When I say that we must get directly back to the land, let it be clearly understood that I do not mean getting back merely to farming and gardening. That is the mistake that has frustrated every attempt to find a solution of our social riddles in that direction thus far, and it will continue to do so so long as we continue to make it. The main reason why it has done so it is easy to see. Attempt to establish a number of unemployed people in productive industry upon the soil and—no matter what the number may be, whether it is one family or ten thousand—success or failure must eventually be a question of markets. Everything turns on the possibility of realising a paying price for what the land can be made to produce, and it is probably some perception of this that compels so many to regard the unemployment problem as insoluble even by resort to the land. It would be easy enough to take any number of people out to the land and to set them to work, but will it pay? Can you sell what they produce at such prices as will make the work even self-supporting? The difficulties are really very serious, and it is because they have never been seriously grappled with that nothing effective has ever been done or even attempted. If you select land near a good market you will be sure to be handicapped with high rent; and if you are far off, you will be equally burdened with heavy carriage expenses. If your enterprise is philanthropic it will be hampered and restricted by lack of means. You will not be able to adopt the best methods or to secure the best management, and you will be unable to compete in the market with those who can, while if your enterprise could be amply supported with public money it would be of little service if it were on a small scale; and if it were on a scale at all adequate to the requirement of the problem, there would be an immediate outcry that you were ruining the private trader by unfair competition. All these and a good many others are difficulties and embarrassments by which any attempt to solve our social riddles by finding employment for people on the land on any lines hitherto considered would be sure to be beset.

It is important to remember that though a market is quite indispensable, nevertheless by far the greater part of such an enterprise will be altogether independent of markets. Food constitutes at least two-thirds of all the requirements of a working-class family; so that if you put a working man and his wife and children down upon the land, a very large proportion of the produce of the soil need not go to market at all. It will be required for the land-worker's own table. In this respect agricultural work is unlike every other employment under the sun. If a man makes boots or baskets, he must find a market for practically all he makes, and he must sell some of his wares before he can get a mouthful of food by his work. And with every other employment apart from the land, a market for the whole produce of labour is an indispensable condition of life. A man may be ever so clever as a watchmaker or a locksmith, but he cannot live on watches or locks; he must convert them into cash. But if he is working on the land he can supply his own table directly, and without any buying and selling whatever. Markets for produce may go up or go down or may vanish altogether; but the competent land tiller and his wife and children may all laugh and grow fat on the direct bounty of the earth. Give a tolerably industrious man access to as much fairly good land as he can work himself, and if he has only a moderate knowledge of what he is about, so far as he is concerned at least two-thirds of the employment riddle is solved. But for the other third of the problem—for rent and rates and taxes, for any interest on capital, for clothing and furniture, and every other item of home expense—he must find means of selling his surplus produce. It is just here that all the difficulty comes in. The bountifulness of Nature's return for intelligent industry is not to be disputed. All our difficulties arise when we get away from nature and come into the towns and begin to exchange.

The disposal of surplus is the heart of the problem. If a good market is to be got at and there is a steady demand and prices run fairly high, the landworker may, of course, be abundantly successful. But if the market is remote and expenses heavy, if the demand is uncertain and fluctuating, if home and foreign competition are keen and prices often run low, then there comes a sordid and disheartening struggle, and in the end probably total failure. That is the short and simple story of innumerable experiments both in England and America. Invariably the disposal of surplus produce has proved the main, if not the only cause of difficulty, and in the ordinary course of things it always must be so. If food were all, it would, for a very large proportion of our unemployed, be as easy to set up upon the land a productive industry that would solve the problem and put an end to all the evils arising from the starvation of children as it would be to set up a new workhouse or to build a new ironclad, and quite apart from markets altogether, a very small proportion of the money we squander in public and private charity would be sufficient to pay interest on the capital invested.

There are, however, other needs practically as imperative as the necessity for food, and how to supply these is the pith of the problem. How is it to be solved? If General Booth is as wise and far-seeing as of late he has come to be considered to be, he will give that point his most careful consideration before he touches a penny of Mr. Herring's £100,000.

Not only just now but always we have a large "surplus population" in our midst. Suppose, now, we pick out from among them, say 2,000 family men of good physique and respectable character, and establish them in food-producing industry upon the land. For the sake of round numbers and argumentative clearness only, we will suppose that these 2,000 workers can produce food enough for 3,000 families. They can, if they set the right way to work, do far more than that of course; but we will suppose that when they and their wives and children have eaten their fill, there is a surplus sufficient for 1,000 families, where is the market for that surplus to be found? Why, is it not quite obvious that the best possible market for that food could be absolutely created by taking down another thousand families of the unemployed and setting them to work to supply what we may call the secondary needs of the land-workers—to make clothes and build houses and lay down roads and so on? They would be a market on the spot and without any expense whatever for the land-workers' surplus food, and the land-workers would be a similar market for the boots and clothes and furniture the new-comers would make. Of course, if you set an idle man to work to make boots and put the boots on the existing market you may be only putting one man into employment by putting another man out, and may be tending to bring down wages all round. That is the obvious objection to the setting up of municipal workshops for the relief of the unemployed. You merely overstock an already fully-supplied market. But if you take an unemployed man and set him to work to raise food from the land, that man will himself constitute a new market for any one who can make boots; and if then you take an idle and hungry man and set him to make boots for that market, he interferes with nobody, and he will himself constitute a new market for the man upon the land. You create at once not only new supplies of food and boots, but new demands also. These are simple and obvious facts; they cannot be disputed and they afford a clue to the solution of the whole problem of the unemployed.

It always seems to be assumed that a market for land produce must be a spontaneous growth or must be found, and that it cannot be made. The assumption is false. There are easily conceivable circumstances under which no doubt it would be true, but these circumstances are certainly not ours. The fact is that with a large "surplus population" and plenty of capital at command, it would be as easy to create a new market as it would be to create a market supply; and it is just because we overlook this that "the problem of the unemployed" appears so hopelessly insoluble. Every idle man who is without the necessities and comforts of life is a potential market; and if you set him to work for those who need his services and can pay for them, he becomes at once an actual market.

The broad principle on which we should proceed in this matter is perfectly simple. It is merely the principle of general co-operation on which all society is based, but from which the infinitely complex outworking of our social system—corrupted by the private land ownership that has crept into it—has driven out a certain proportion of our people. Thus far we have been trying to bring them in again by all sorts of artificial and indirect methods, entirely overlooking the method that would be natural, and direct and perfectly simple. The people want to work, and in the mere supply of each other's wants there is abundant work to be done, but they have somehow come to a deadlock. They are smitten with the paralysis of a sort of practical paradox. There is no work for them, because they cannot get to work. There would be plenty of work for everybody if everybody could set about it; but because nobody can work there is no work to do. That is literally the case of the unemployed. Under such circumstances it is the bounden duty of a civilised—not to say a Christian—state to step in to the relief and assistance of these unfortunate people, to shake them out of the paralysis with which an old civilisation has smitten them, and to lead them out on to our own broad acres and give them a fresh start by the aid of our accumulated experience and capital, applied—not under any impulse of mere enthusiastic quackery, but on the soundest elementary principles of economic science.

The new Unemployed Workmen Act passed by the late Conservative Government is a step clearly in that direction, but altogether too timid and tentative, and it stops short just at the point at which the real reformation should begin. It creates new administrative councils, and it empowers them to buy land for labour colonies. These are the right initial steps, but, with nothing beyond, it is merely a slight development of Poor Law relief, and as a remedial measure is of no use at all. But suppose that when these colonies are established it is found that a certain proportion of the surplus labourers of our towns sent down to them, prove themselves in every way fitted for agricultural life and are eager to engage in it. If it is possible to enable them to do so, would it not seem the most egregious folly to fling them all back into the labour-glutted towns? We are all of us—economists and sentimentalists and hygienists alike—deploring the depopulation of rural England. If it is in the power of public capital and public organisation to plant out these men and their families in comfort and prosperity on the land on any scheme consistent with sound economics and the public well-being, why should not the thing be done? Why should not the Liberal party, at the earliest opportunity, supplement this initial Act by another affording altogether a new outlet for the chronic superfluity of town labour? Suppose they were to expand these mere relief colonies into training grounds for such of the unemployed as seemed qualified to become agriculturists and were anxious to do so, and were to create higher-grade colonies, centres of agriculture, to be conducted on such a scale and under such conditions of efficiency as would fetch out of the land the utmost that science and machinery and organisation could make it yield, and with an unfailing market for most of its surplus produce gradually created on the spot. Would not that be better for the people themselves, and better for the community, than merely giving them a wretched pittance for a little temporary work and then flinging them back into the general hurly-burly until the next period of acute distress comes round? Why should it not be done? It would be just as practicable, just as easy to establish these higher-grade colonies of free men, animated by an entirely new prospect for themselves and by a new social ideal, as it will be to set up the semi-penal ones for broken-spirited and hopeless workers. It would be a larger undertaking, of course, but we could do the one just as easily and just as certainly as the other, and do it whenever we please, and it may be done just as well on our own fields—assuming a fair price for the land—as it could on the other side of the Atlantic. Why should men and women be banished to the uttermost ends of the earth when they might live happily and prosperously on their own native soil? A single one of the 240 millions of money we threw away in South Africa, invested in the indisputable security of English land for the purpose suggested, would not improbably have revolutionised all our ideas of the relief of poverty and unemployment, and have opened a new era in social England.

If a Government were really in earnest about the unemployed, and were to set up real farm colonies with the full determination to solve this greatest of our difficulties, in five years' time the only question would be, Where is this sort of thing going to stop? Once start it in real earnest, and on lines intended to ensure success, and it never would stop while anywhere within our four seas there was a single honest man breaking his heart for want of employment, a single child going hungry to school for the father's want of work, or such a thing as a slum-dwelling for a respectable worker anywhere under Britain's blue sky. Start these farm colonies under the most favourable conditions that capital and science and experience can devise, and they will soon be flourishing like green bay trees, and all sorts of developments will become obvious and imperative. Agriculture and horticulture would be only the fundamental industries, and around these would speedily spring up an added colony of road-makers and builders, painters and glaziers, wheelwrights and blacksmiths, and model factories for the making of boots and clothes and furniture would be perfectly natural expansions. These things would all be required on the spot, and might be produced on the spot, to the great saving of all sorts of expenses. Such a colony, as it expanded, would obviously afford employment for people of very varied capacity, and even of many degrees of incapacity, and women workers would be needed as well as men. It would demand unskilled labourers and storekeepers, bookkeepers and accountants, clerks and correspondents. There would have to be school-teachers and needlewomen and laundresses, and there would be many little nocks and corners suitable for weaklings and the partly incapacitated. It is just what every philanthropist who has worked among the people knows to be so sorely needed. Half, and more than half, of our charitable efforts to find employment for the people are merely putting one person in by putting another out. It is a mere shuffling of the population. On the land, and the land alone, we can conjure up a new microcosm, just as often as we find it necessary in order to do away with the chronic misery of enforced idleness—a new microcosm out of the old acres, drawing all its resources at the natural fountain-head of all wealth—a fountain which would flow more copiously as science advanced and mechanism improved and methods were perfected.

The whole of this unemployment problem may be solved effectually and finally whenever this wealthiest of all the kingdoms of the world chooses to employ upon it the resources of its land, its accumulated wealth, and its modern organising experience. Why should not the Christian Churches make this question their own, resolve to fight the battle of the poor and suffering and oppressed, and preach and teach and agitate until the great principles for which they profess to stand have been practically applied to the healing of this horrible sore in the body politic? The vague generalities and pious platitudes that it is the fashion to pour out from pulpits and platforms on this subject of the poor are of no use except in so far as they incite to action. What we want is a definite policy, and here is one—a practical policy based on the very nature of things—the land and human labour as the primal source of all wealth. This is no mere dogmatic opinion; it is an eternal truth like the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of man; and when the Christian Churches will take their stand upon it and insist upon the State doing its duty, they will take a new lease of life, and will help to inaugurate a new era in the progress of the Kingdom of God on earth.

GEORGE F. MILLIN.

COMMEMORATION OF KESHUB CHUNDER SEN.

BORN, Nov. 19, 1838. DIED, JAN. 8, 1884.

A MEETING of commemoration was held in the Council Room at Essex Hall on Monday evening, the twenty-second anniversary of the death of the great Brahmo leader, Keshub Chunder Sen.

The chair was taken by Sir R. K. Wilson, Bart., who was supported by Professor Benoyendra Nath Sen, of Calcutta, and Mr. B. C. Ghosh, M.A. (Cantab.). There was not a large attendance, but among those present were the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, Charles Roper, C. E. Pike, F. Allen, and V. D. Davis.

In proposing a vote of thanks to Professor Sen for his address, Mr. Bowie read the following letter from Professor Estlin Carpenter:—

DEAR MR. BOWIE,—I am very sorry that my absence from home prevents me from responding personally to the invitation to the meeting on the anniversary of the death of Keshub Chunder Sen. No one who can recall, as I do, the effect of his noble enthusiasm, his splendid presence, his extraordinary eloquence, his exalted spirituality, can forget the impression which he produced among us five-and-thirty years ago. Through the magic of his speech and the kindling power of his personality ran the force of one who lived in habitual communion with the Unseen. The sense of the Universal Presence of God, which was the heritage of the higher minds of his race, became with him a constant fellowship with an infinite and holy Spirit, manifesting his righteousness, his truth, his love, through the noblest characters and the loftiest thoughts of humanity. So he was drawn to the Gospels with a profound reverence for Jesus, and became to thousands among his countrymen the interpreter of Christianity, not as a creed or an ecclesiastical system, but as a spirit of life. Nor can we forget that he had won the respect of great English administrators as a prophet of reform and a leader in all that made for the intellectual and moral improvement of his people. He was deeply concerned for the poverty of the vast masses of the population of India; but he was still more impressed with the urgent need of their spiritual development, and he attached especial importance to the education of women. In this country he uttered impassioned pleas for temperance and peace; and his lofty call to Englishmen to recognise the responsibilities which have devolved upon them in the government of the vast Empire beyond the sea seemed to utter the voice of India herself, rising to a new self-consciousness of her needs and hopes. Separated by distance from him in his later days, we could not always understand his difficulties or follow his action. But we must always recall with profound admiration and gratitude the way in which he made us feel that religion in England and in India is one. There are diversities of operations, but the same God worketh all things in all.

Faithfully yours,

J. ESTLIN CARPENTER.

Dawlish, S. Devon, Jan. 7, 1903.

The CHAIRMAN, in his opening address, recalled the memory of Keshub Chunder Sen's visit to England in 1870, when he had the pleasure of meeting him and hearing him preach on several occasions in London, and received from him an impulse which was very helpful at a time when he himself was feeling his way to some form of Theism. From that time he had taken a keen interest in the Brahmo Samaj movement as a whole, a movement against Hindu superstitions on the one hand, and mere secularism on the other. He had never regarded it as a half-way house toward Christianity, an outpost of Western influence in India. His idea of it was more fraternal, as fighting the same battle in India as they at home. Their battle was against old-established forms of Christianity, just as Rajah Rammohun Roy's in India was against the superstitions in the midst of which he had been born and bred. There was the same conflict going on in all the great historical religions between the past and the present, between those who were content with the revelations supposed to have been made once for all in the distant past and those who looked for the new light, welcomed it wherever it appeared, and desired to stand wherever the light was clearest. There was more in common between one who held his view and a reformed Moslem, Hindu, or Jew, than between any one of them and the established religion by whose name they were called. In that historic struggle in India the name of Keshub Chunder Sen would always be remembered with gratitude and admiration, as regards at least a considerable portion of his career. As to the crisis which came after his visit to this country, when Chunder Sen claimed special personal inspiration, he would rather hear what Professor Sen had to say, and would simply confess that his own sympathies were entirely against the one-man system and in favour of the congregational system as represented by the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj. He was glad to say that there was now a better state of feeling between those who represented the memory and aspirations of Keshub Chunder Sen and those who represented the seceders of the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj, and he was delighted to see in the joint committee (of which Professor Sen was secretary) one indication that those bodies were now working together. Their sympathies—his own, certainly—would be with the whole body, without distinction between its component parts.

PROFESSOR SEN said that to them January 8 was a day of sacred memory. He himself was only a boy of sixteen when, in 1884, Keshub Chunder Sen died, but he vividly remembered what he saw on that day, when in the evening they carried the body to the burning Ghat through the densely crowded streets. The scene was quite unique. Never before in connection with a funeral ceremony in Hindu society had such a procession been seen. Keshub Chunder Sen of all Indians was the man who might be taken as a link between England and India, the East and the West. When he came to England, it was under the auspices of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and with its President, Mr. Samuel Sharpe, in the chair, that the great meeting of welcome was held in the Hanover-square rooms; but nearly all the denominations were represented, and among his best friends were Professor Max Müller and Dean Stanley. He was graciously received by Queen Victoria, and took back to India a warm feeling of loyalty. There he was cordial in his relations with all denominations, and was foremost in protesting against the persecution of the Salvation Army when it first came to Calcutta. His was a great heart. He was not, perhaps, a great thinker, or metaphysician, yet in heart and soul he was a great man, and people of all countries and denominations who came in contact with him felt his power. If they asked what was the secret of his magnetic personality, it might perhaps be said that it was just the light and the fire of faith that was perpetually burning in his soul. Yet he thought there was significance in what he described as the temptation of that great man. They saw in the Gospels and in the life of Buddha what importance was attached to such a temptation and the victory over it. To him also there came, early in life, a period of great conflict, and it was victory in such an inward conflict that distinguished a man of faith from ordinary men. It gave strength to the will and light to the mind, strength to the whole character. Keshub had realised sin as a great reality, and overcame it, and that gave him his indomitable will and character. That was the secret of his magnetic personality. He made enemies, for he was a fighter. Yet all bore him testimony that when they came into his personal presence all hostility was overborne, and they felt the charm of his personality. Inspiration was a fact in his life, but it could not be explained. It was the highest fact in human life that the whole soul should be so attune with the eternal harmony of things that without exercise of reason a man could arrive at conclusions, and had light to guide him under all circumstances. So the life of Keshub Chunder Sen was attuned, and his whole soul illumined. Errors of judgment he might make, but he had the light, and must follow it even if the whole world would draw him away. As to his place in the Brahmo Samaj, it was he who brought power into the movement. The Maharshi Devendra Nath Tagore brought a fund of spirituality, and laid their basis in intuition; but Keshub brought power, and gave the movement its world-wide significance. He called upon his brethren, his countrymen, to make sacrifice of their prejudices, their superstitions, even their closest family ties, if need be, in the cause of truth and God. In the apostolic spirit of truth and poverty, working for the love of God, he made his appeal to the whole people. Professor Sen concluded his address with an earnest appeal to the people of this country to accept the government of India as a sacred trust. The Government, which had all power in India, ought to make itself the expression of the highest political and religious life of the nation.

Mr. B. C. GHOSH also spoke, and said that it was the ideal of the New Dispensation which set Keshub Chunder Sen on fire. It revealed to his inmost soul the solidarity of the human race and truth in all religions. There was the same law of growth in the soul in all lands and ages.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE proposed a vote of thanks to Professor Sen for his address, and read the letter from Professor Carpenter, above given. They were greatly indebted to Professor Sen, he said, for his inspiring address, which helped them to understand the power and the apostolic gifts of Keshub Chunder Sen.

The resolution was seconded by the Rev. V. D. DAVIS and cordially passed.

The Rev. F. ALLEN proposed and Mr. DELTA EVANS seconded a vote of thanks to the Chair, and, in acknowledging it, Sir ROLAND WILSON repeated his expression of sympathy with the congregational ideal as opposed to dependence on the inspiration claimed by the great teacher. He hoped that Professor Sen would accept that frank expression of opinion as a mark of true interest and gratitude to him for his address.

FROM THE NOTE-BOOKS OF THE LATE FRANCES LEE.—II.

To pray without ceasing is to strive without intermission. And in this way one's whole life might be a prayer—a constant striving, an intense desire. Thus it is our prayers are answered. Each prayer is an answer to the last. We gain a more earnest desire, a more strenuous resolve. "Seek and ye shall find" is not only a promise but a law.

It is not necessary that a minister of religion should be more learned or possessed of more brilliant gifts than his fellows, but only that he should have a deeper inward experience and a clearer moral vision. Intensity of feeling, rather than intellectual superiority, should be the primary qualification. For how can he whose experience is shallow inspire or console those who have felt and suffered more deeply than himself? How, indeed, can he have any comprehension of depths he has never sounded? To feel deeply oneself gives insight into the emotions of others. Wherein lay the secret of Jesus' wonderful comprehension of and sympathy with human nature? Was it not that the intensity of his own emotions gave him a clear insight into all human feeling? Through his own passion for righteousness he understood all passion. Through the keenness of his own feelings of indignation or compassion or grief, he gained a perfect understanding of the nature of all strong emotion. Amongst all the multitudes to whom he ministered there were none who had felt as passionately as himself, none who had suffered so deeply.

That a human life should go out like a spark is incredible. How can life die? Death is what remains when life has flown. And what does that imply except that the life has left what was no longer tenable, to assume some more appropriate form. Life cannot die. It is an eternal impossibility.

Much of the disappointment of friendship arises from our demanding of our friends a perfection to which we ourselves do not even attempt to attain. If you would have perfection in others, first exact it from yourself. There is no more disheartening quest than for one's ideal; the only way of meeting it is to be it yourself.

It is well to remember amidst our questionings and uncertainties that God never changes. It is only our conception of Him which is continually changing. What God is is affected neither by our convictions nor our scepticisms. Each new experience adds something to our thought of God, but "with Him is no variableness neither shadow of turning."

If the belief in the immortality of the soul ceases to be a living faith, Religion, as a moral force, will not long survive it. Take away this belief, and what remains of solace or inspiration? Will discourses on the "Ethical Ideal" or the "Science of Right" stimulate the jaded heart to fresh endeavour? What can keep from bitterness the soul whose efforts and aspirations hap-hazard fate has thwarted or upon whose shoulders heredity has laid some grievous weight? What but the conviction that this which they now endure is but a passing experience, a temporary discipline dispensed them at the hands of an all-wise and all-just Creator whose only motive is their ultimate good? Then can they endeavour to bear patiently the smarts of failure, and the cruel disappointments time metes out to them. Without this hope they are possessed by hatred, envy, and wild rebellion. And rightly, too, for such feelings are but the expression of an instinctive repulsion towards what would be a hideous injustice.

There is an innate craving after liberty even in the lowest forms of animal life; and how much of our human wilfulness is the outcome of this God-implanted instinct! This passionate revolt against domination is the main-spring and motive-power of moral progress; from that first crude instinct which drove the slave to risk the horrors of the blood-hounds sooner than remain in temporal bondage, up to that higher spiritual impulse which will cut off the right hand or pluck out the right eye rather than fall into subjection to the senses.

We gain always far more than we are striving for. As the child straining after some prize, though he fail to secure the coveted honour, has gained a far more valuable possession in the habits of mind he has acquired, so with those inward strivings of the soul which so often end in seeming failure. Something must be gained, though that for which we strove be lost. And though we struggle blindly, we may be sure it is for some end more glorious than we can possibly conceive of.

THE AUSTRALIAN CHURCH.

On the first Sunday of last December was celebrated the twentieth anniversary of the founding of the Australian Church at Melbourne, of which the Rev. Charles Strong, D.D., has been from the first the minister. The following statement of its principles will be of interest to many of our readers. It is pleasant to note that cordial relations subsist between the Australian Church and the Unitarian Church at Melbourne, of which the Rev. R. H. Lambley is minister. He was one of the speakers at the recent annual meeting of the Australian Church, and at a meeting in connection with the fifty-third anniversary of the Unitarian Church, Dr. Strong gave an address.

The Australian Church, Melbourne (founded 1885), seeks to meet the want felt and expressed by many Protestants to-day for a "Catholic Church" which, while reverencing and conserving what is best in the past, is yet unfettered by tradition and at liberty to adopt its forms of faith, ritual, and practice to the requirements of the present, and to follow the guidance of the ever-living Spirit of truth and love.

What makes a "Christian," in the best sense of the word, it is felt, is not creed, but spirit and life, and true unity is not necessarily uniformity. The family tie of God's household is not an intellectual dogma, but an inspiring spirit of trust, hope, and love—a will and an effort, to be good, and to do good.

Neither minister nor members, therefore, are asked to subscribe to a dogmatic creed, whose imposition has bred such scandalous division and dishonesty, and has proved so hurtful to religious life and progress.

Acceptance of the following basis of union is all that is asked, and voluntary contributions to the funds according to ability.

(1) The Australian Church is a free, progressive, and unsectarian religious brotherhood, held together by a common religious spirit of trust and love towards God and man, and a common endeavour after Christian life and practice, untrammelled by a final dogmatic theological creed.

(2) The following are the objects and aims of the Australian Church:—

(a) The united worship of God in spirit and in truth.

(b) The preaching and teaching of the gospel of divine love and humanity proclaimed by Jesus of Nazareth, interpreted in the light of growing knowledge and human needs, and the fostering of religious life in the soul.

(c) The application of the principles of this gospel to individual and social life, and the practice of justice and charity.

(d) The evolution of a universal spiritual brotherhood.

In an article on the Church in the December number of the Australian Herald, Dr. Strong wrote:—"For twenty years this Church has borne its witness amid much hostility and misrepresentation, and much sympathy and goodwill; amid the lukewarmness and desertion of old supporters, and the fidelity of old and new friends—witness to the possibility of a living Catholic Church, which, while reverencing what can be shown to be noble and true in the past, is not fettered by the past, and so trusts God and Truth that it feels no need of dogmatic Creeds.

"The true bond, Australian Churchmen hold, is the bond of the Spirit of living trust, of spiritual sympathy with Jesus Christ, and of practical devotion to the establishment of 'the kingdom' of righteousness, goodwill, and a spiritual humanity on the earth.

"If we are to judge by 'fruits,' it will be found that the Australian Church will not compare unfavourably with creed-bound churches, either in the lives of its members, or in its efforts to uplift fellow-man."

To this we will add the Pastoral Letter addressed by Dr. Strong to his congregation of the Australian Church, and issued as the Preface to the Annual Report for 1905:—

THE PASTORAL LETTER.

MY DEAR FRIENDS,

At the close of another year of our congregational life I would ask each of you to consider how far you individually have helped your church during the year that is gone, and the cause for which we stand, and how you can all aid and strengthen your church in the new year on which we are entering.

Good work has been done during the past year, as you can see by our Annual Report. Let us try to do even better work in the coming year.

Let me ask you to keep the ideal of your church constantly before you, as a "free, progressive, and unsectarian religious brotherhood," striving to foster in its own members the religious life of trust, hope, and love, and to inspire others with the same. We are seeking to sow the seeds of a really Catholic Church in Australia, of what a recent writer (Dr. John Hunter) has called "The Coming Church," whose authority and unity shall be based, not on miraculously communicated dogma, the infallibility of a Pope, or an apostolically ordained order of Bishops, or the infallibility of a Book written in distant ages, but on the rational, moral, social, and religious nature of man; on the authority and unity of the Spirit of light and love breathing in the prophets of all ages and lands, in Jesus, the Son and Brother, and in his true followers who are striving to be "perfect as your Father is perfect," to practise the religion of love, and to establish on earth the kingdom of the Son of Man.

Our basis of Brotherhood and Catholicity is essentially ethical and spiritual. Theology we do not despise. On the contrary, we strive to have the truest theology we can find. But we recognise that theology of necessity changes and evolves, and that men and women can be sincere lovers of God, breathe the spirit of Jesus, and be the sons and daughters of the Light under very different forms of theology. Those whom the spirit of God's children and man's friends thus unites no man, we feel, has a right to put asunder.

Impress this ideal of the Church, as a world-wide spiritual family, upon your children, speak of it among your friends, and let us disseminate it in Australia, through lectures, preaching, and press.

We cannot serve our country better than by trying, in however humble a manner, to prepare the way for this "larger faith," and more really Christian Church. For religion, "pure and undefiled," lies at the root of life, both social and individual. It is the salt of the earth, the flower of our human nature, the crown of rational, spiritual manhood, and is that which binds us together as families, and nations, in the widest and noblest bonds.

The traditional forms of faith are waxing old; they more and more cease to satisfy. We claim liberty to weave new forms, maintaining that unity of spirit, life, and work need not be broken by such "sober liberty." Providence calls us to re-state and re-interpret, and we cannot shirk our duty, difficult and even painful though it be.

Let me urge you to shake off the apathy and indifference which has settled down on many to-day—partly due to our clinging to antiquated things which have ceased to interest—to bring your influence manfully and fearlessly to bear against habits and customs, such as gambling, drinking, and the mammon-, pleasure-, and fashion-worship, which eat out our best nature, destroy our taste for all higher things, rendering us sordid and selfish, and mean in our ideas of life.

Cultivate a simple and genuine family-religion. Doing this you will help your church, for the church depends on the family.

Make a conscience of attending the weekly assembling together of your brethren, for your own sakes, your families', and your fellow-men's. Remember that the Church is, and has always been, not a private luxury, but a social institution binding together society, and as such claiming our allegiance.

Show living interest in the practical work of your church; take a pride in your church; try to perfect your church; sacrifice something for your church; and seek to make of your church a real spiritual home, and a centre of all manner of good influences radiating out to others.

I appeal to each and all of you not to hold aloof, but to regard yourselves as members of a guild of workers for "the kingdom of God and His righteousness."

If you can give nothing more towards the common cause, give at least the cup of cold water, in the shape of a word of sympathy, your encouragement, your presence, and your example.

With cordial acknowledgments and thanks to office-bearers, and all who have helped in our church work, and with all kindest wishes for the New Year.

Yours faithfully,

Nov. 22, 1905. CHARLES STRONG.

THE Rev. C. W. Wendte, hon. secretary of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, has accepted the pastorate of the First Church in Brighton, Mass. (a church founded in 1730), which is now a part of Boston. Mr. Wendte will thus be on the spot, to throw himself, with his untiring energy and enthusiasm, into the organising of the 1907 meeting of the Council, to be held in Boston; and he has been appointed by the American Unitarian Association its secretary for International Work. No. 25, Beacon-street, Boston, the headquarters of the Association, will thus be Mr. Wendte's address for all such business.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Aberdare.—On the first night of the New Year a party of the Sunday-school children, mostly under ten years old, performed the operetta "Happy Hearts, or May's Birthday Party" (Curwen) in character. The performance was so good that it had to be repeated to a crowded house on each of the two ensuing nights.

Bristol Domestic Mission.—Through the generosity of many friends, a tea and entertainment were given to nearly 250 poor children of the parish of St. James's on Saturday, December 30, and on the following Saturday, January 6, 150 poor people sat down to a meat supper, followed by a first-class entertainment. The gatherings were addressed by Revs. A. N. Blatchford, E. I. Fripp, Mrs. Broadrick, and Mr. Bruce Coles.

Coalville.—For some time past a few earnest men have met together here for worship and the reading of Unitarian literature. A year ago cottage services were arranged. With the opening of the present year it was felt that the time had come for taking a forward step. A room for meeting has been secured to seat about thirty. This was opened last Sunday, when the Rev. W. H. Burgess, of Loughborough, gave an address on the "Doctrines and Principles of Unitarians." It is hoped that a few popular services in a larger hall may be arranged in the course of a month or two, to test the feeling of Coalville, and discover any latent Unitarians in the town.

Hindley.—A very busy Christmas season has just been brought to a successful close. On New Year's Day a sale of work in the upper school, and a social evening in the lower school were held. The young people of the school co-operated most heartily with the members of the congregation, and upwards of £30 was realised as a contribution to a fund which is being raised for the purpose of enlarging the Sunday-school. Now that the busy season is over, the minister (Rev. John Moore), acting on the advice of his doctor, intends to spend the remainder of the winter in South Devon. The chapel trustees have allowed Mr. Moore to enter into a three months' engagement with the Rev. Thos. Robinson, of Hale, for the supply of the pulpit.

Leeds: Hunslet (Resignation).—The Rev. John Fox is retiring from the pastorate of the Unitarian Church, at the end of March next, on the completion of a twenty years' ministry there, thus bringing to a close his long career in the regular ministry, upon which he entered at Heywood in 1864. The congregation asked Mr. Fox to continue his services, but he did not see his way to do so.

Leicester: Great Meeting: (Appointment).—The Rev. A. H. Thomas, B.A., of Stourbridge, has accepted the pulpit of the Great Meeting, in succession to the Rev. E. W. Lummis, who was compelled by the failure of his health to resign, and is now spending the winter at Davos.

London: Essex Church.—Next Wednesday at 8.30, the Rev. Frank K. Preston will deliver a lantern lecture on "Mazzini and his Work for Liberty."

London: Peckham.—The annual tea to poor children of the district was held on Wednesday, the 3rd inst., in connection with the Band of Hope and S. S. Guild; 220 children sat down to a substantial tea, served by many willing hands, after which they were entertained with songs, recitations, &c., by members and friends of the church. Not the least entertaining part of the programme, was a distribution of toys from a Christmas-tree to each child by Mrs. and Miss L. Cox. A brief address was given by Rev. G. Critchley.

Lye (Centenary Services).—Special services were held in the Unitarian Church, on Friday, January 5, and on Sunday, January 7. On the former date a sermon was preached by the Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham, who spoke concerning the aim for which a church is founded. Quoting Matthew Arnold's definition of a church as an organisation intended for the promotion of goodness, Mr. Wood urged the cultivation of reverence and of sympathy. On the Sunday evening a joint service was held of the three congregations of Stourbridge, Cradley, and Lye. All these ministers took part in the service, the sermon being preached by the Rev. A. H. Shelley, of Cradley, the mother church. Testimony was borne by him to the excellent work done by the Rev. James Scott, "the Apostle of the Lye." The evening was very stormy, but the chapel, nevertheless, was crowded, and both services were most successful in every way.

Midland Ministers' Monthly Meeting.—On Monday last twelve ministers met together in the vestry of the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, when a paper was read by the Rev. Walter Lloyd, of Gloucester, on "The Relation of Jesus to the Church and Civilisation," followed by an animated discussion.

Mottram.—The Christmas and New Year festivities included a Christmas party, 430 to tea and over 500 at the entertainment; also a workers' party. There was a watchnight service on December 31, 11.30 to midnight. The late Sunday-school superintendent, Mr. J. H. Elkin, has returned from Mexico after an absence of over a year, and has been given a hearty welcome.

Newbury.—The Mayor of Newbury (Mr. Richard Hickman) having observed the traditional custom of attending in civic state at the Parish Church on Christmas morning, expressed a desire to attend officially his own place of worship, the Presbyterian Chapel, on Sunday, the last day in the old year. The response to his Worship's invitation was very gratifying, nearly all the members of the Corporation assembling at the Town Hall at half-past ten, when the Mayor, wearing his official robes and chain of office, afforded a cordial welcome to each and all. After an interchange of greetings a procession was marshalled. It was headed by the town band, whilst in addition to the aldermen, councillors, mace-bearers, and several burgesses, it included the members of the Newbury Company of the Volunteers, the Volunteer Fire Brigade, under Capt. Church and Lieut. Rokeby Hallen, and the Mayor and the Pastor of the Chapel, the Rev. E. Turland. The members of the Corporation were in their state robes and cocked hats, and to the strains of the band the procession marched through Mansion House-street, across the bridge into Northbrook-street, and then into Crown-place, which leads to the chapel. This was not the first occasion that the Mayor and Corporation had attended a Presbyterian Chapel in Newbury, for in the year 1688 John Cook took them to the Meeting House on Stroud-green, and it is an interesting fact that the name of this said John Cook appears the first in the list of subscribers to the present chapel, which was built as far back as 1697. It is a quaint old building, square and solid, and, although the old-fashioned high-back pews have been removed from the centre, there are still examples of them and the tiny baby pews remaining in the side aisles. The spacious gallery at the back of the chapel was occupied on this occasion by the choir and the habitual congregation. The Rev. Ephraim Turland preached an able sermon on the "Ideal of the Kingdom, to be Realised Here on Earth." In the course of it he spoke direct and earnest words bearing on that special occasion. "Our Christianity," he said, "is not a mere opinion or inward conviction, but it is a life, an aspiration, and a work for others, not simply for ourselves. Such brotherly co-operation is essential to the efficient management of any department of our life. You who have been appointed to high office in this community have great influence, with responsibility not to mere citizens, but to God. We ought all to warmly appreciate your voluntary toil and self-denying service. Yours not to make the law, but to administer it; but administration is at times more important than legislation, and there is room and need in it for public spirit and beneficent aim and efforts. The co-operation of all is needed, and is helpful. None are too weak to render service to the community. The selfishness which is careless of common ends defeats its own aims, and leads to atrophy and paralysis of life. Christ pleased not himself, but lived and died for others; and so the humblest of us may render to the community service which the Lord of the servants will not despise. Why should not Newbury become a city of God, a New Jerusalem, a true human and Divine unity, in which none are for a party, but all are for the State, because all are animated by the brotherly spirit which is of the very essence of our religion?" The hymn, "Lord, while for all mankind we pray" and the Benediction brought the service to a close, after which the procession re-formed, and returned to the Town Hall.

Portsmouth: High-street (Appointment).—The Rev. Roger Finnerty, until recently a Roman Catholic, has accepted an invitation from the congregation to become their minister for a year.

Scarborough.—The services on Sunday, Jan. 7, were conducted by Mr. Bhimal C. Ghosh, M.A., of the Brahmo Samaj, the Theistic Church of India. Mr. Ghosh preached in the morning on "Karma—The Hindu Doctrine of Works," while the subject of his evening discourse was "The Harmony of Religions." Both addresses exhibited a profundity of thought, a command of language, and above all a reverence for true religion in its widest aspect, that were widely appreciated by the congregation, which in the evening was considerably above the average in point of numbers.

Southampton (Appointment).—The Rev. T. R. Skemp has accepted a unanimous invitation to the Church of Our Saviour, and will shortly enter upon his ministry.

West Kirby.—Rev. H. W. Hawkes commences a course of services at the Public Hall on Sunday morning, 14th inst., at 11 a.m.

Whitchurch.—On Sunday, Dec. 31, after a ministry of three years and five months, the Rev. C. D. Badland, M.A., preached his farewell sermon at the Church of the Saviour. During Mr. Badland's ministry the church has lost many of its most earnest and devoted workers by death and removal from the town, the like of which has not occurred in the history of the church. These sorrows have bound minister and congregation together in a special manner, and Mr. Badland's services have been highly valued in the town. He was a member of the Free Library Committee, President of the Temperance League, taking his place on the platform of social reform with other ministers. His departure is a loss to Whitchurch.

PERCEPTIONS without conceptions are blind; conceptions without perceptions are empty.—Jowett.

PEOPLE do not do wrong because they do not know what is right, but because they have no proper motive to do it. This is the real point about religion. It gives a motive to do the will of God.—Bishop Creighton.

AGAIN AND AGAIN!

For OPEN BROTHERHOOD;
For THE CHRISTIANITY OF JESUS;
For THE KINGDOM OF GOD WITHIN US.

We venture to ask leave to repeat our statement of another view of Christian teaching and Christian effort (as some of us apprehend them) than that of WE and OUR, of which we certainly hear a great deal too much.

In the first place, let us once for all say that none of us ever think of scandalising any "Unitarian" or other "Sectarian" or any "Church" man for such a name. Any personal attack of the kind is absolutely out of the question. We do most earnestly deplore and do with heart and soul protest and fight against the grave Scandal (as it appears to us) of the Unitarianism now so prevalent, and against its only too clerical organisation and contagion, and its fluttering aspiration to uphold a dogmatic Name, Position, and pharisaic Segregation!

Nor can we be seduced to such disorder by the curious device of reviving a purely theological definition—honourable enough in its proper time and place—the "Unitarianism" of the early last century, and its descendant—and of endeavouring to perpetuate that name in order to make it easier to rake in less independent thinkers;—taking as it has been pointed out—and practised at Rome (under the cunning veil of the most unchristian organisation in the world)—a statue of Jupiter, and offering it to the people as Saint Peter, to the woeful confusion in a great many persons' minds between the Killing Letter and the Life-giving Spirit. Nor are we to be led in the harness of an elaborate doubled meaning put upon that time-honoured name. We want to hear (as Jesus himself said) NOT THE WORDS OF THE SPEAKER BUT THE WORDS OF THE FATHER THAT HAS SENT HIM!

We do want a genuine humility, a more truly faithful, hopeful, and really loving Word than that of WE and OUR, as they shout around.

We want to pass by the Images of Christian Faith, Hope, and Love which are put forward by a double minded "Unitarianism," and to leave behind any so-called "Unitarian" Church, in order directly to worship Our Father in His own temple not made with hands, and, there and outside, continually, to love and follow our Lord, and love and live and speak as His disciples saw and heard Him do. A "Unitarian Church" is by no means the Meeting House or Chapel in which our pious ancestors loved to meet for "the worship of God" in certain Faith, in assured Hope, and in Christian Love.

There is no comparison between so-called "Unitarian Church" or "Churches" and the Freedom and Openness of meek Brotherhood, worshipping in Spirit and in Truth, together or alone, and spending itself, body and soul, in pouring out to any and every neighbour, day and night, and everywhere, on every opportunity it can find or make, the very personal faith, hope, and love in which our Master lived and spent himself, and died upon the cross. It is the same that has kept alive amongst men and women and children to this day His own Personal Christianity of self-forgetting Life and Love, underneath and in spite of all the claims and the controversies and the malice and persecutions of Orthodoxies, of Priests, of Theologians, of Popes of all kinds, and of Clericals and Inquisitors, and of perpetual Talkers, every one of whom all, continuously, pretends to and professes an exclusive loyalty and a self-satisfied pharisaic segregation (which are not Christian, nor Religious)—and that, in the face of a Divine Catholicity such as neither Rome, nor Canterbury, nor—Essex Street, in any true sense, comprehend.

We well know, from much and minute experience, and profound sympathy, how simple and faithful is the devotion of Spirit to Spirit in the Ministry of the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, amongst unaffected, self-forgetting Roman or Anglican priests or people, Methodists, Independents, or Friends.

Do WE and OUR ever preach that same Gospel of our Lord and Saviour? with heart and soul and voice?

We profoundly respect and admire the personal dedication of all (and especially the personal dedication and outpouring of the true, enlisted personal soldiers of the Salvation Army) and we now again, for our great company of Brothers and Sisters, deliberately repeat our entreaty to every Neighbour and Friend, and every one of their Associations and conferences, and to every minister and every one of all: to cast aside, once for all, all doctrinal array and "Church" talk, and all flags and all drums and baggage wagons, and humbly and perseveringly to seek the strait gate and the narrow way of personal dedication that "leadeth unto Life." Let us all and every, each one of us strive and live from day to day a new life of his own in a real Holy Communion in Christian perseverance and goodness, self-lost in the Kingdom of God within us, in the meekest recognition of His eternal power and glory—true—meek—self-lost—Ministers of the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour. Blessed be His name!

"So is the Resurrection of the dead:—it is sown a natural body; it is raised a Spiritual body. There is a natural body and there is a Spiritual body. . . : Therefore beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord. Your labour is not in vain in the Lord!"

For some of Open Brotherhood
(to comply with your rule, I give my name),
R. D. DARBISHIRE.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE result of the first week of the General Election is overwhelming. With the marked exception of Birmingham, it is a tremendous sweep of the boroughs for Liberalism, and we must rejoice especially that at last the voice of the Liberals of London will be heard effectively in Parliament as well as in the County Council. We have noted with the utmost satisfaction the return of such men as Mr. W. H. Dickinson, Sir William Collins, and Mr. C. F. G. Masterman, because of their profound sympathy with the needs of the people, and their close touch with the needs of London life.

THE first number of The Tribune, the new London penny daily, appeared on Monday, and contained a letter from the Prime Minister to Mr. Franklin Thomasson, the governing proprietor, expressing heartiest good wishes for the success of the paper, and adding :—"We all of us are deeply indebted to you for the great public spirit you have shown in coming forward to undertake such an enterprise. It is launched at an auspicious moment, and I do not doubt that the cause of Liberalism and Progress will find in the columns of The Tribune a new source of strength and inspiration."

THE first number of The Tribune contained also a letter from Count Lamsdorff, communicating a special message from the Tsar, in answer to an address from the Editor, and announcing "That his Majesty's Government intends very shortly to present to various countries for their consideration a draft programme for the Second Peace Conference, to be convoked by his Majesty's initiative, thus actually confirming the unchangeable sympathy of his Imperial Majesty for those principles which formed the basis of the first Conference." If only the Tsar could find the way to peace in his own distracted realm! But The Tribune, which will be a staunch and persistent supporter of the cause of International Peace, rejoices in the receipt of his message, and its concluding profession of faith.

WE have read with feelings of warmest cordiality and sympathy the letter addressed by forty-one leading representatives of German science, art, and literature to a body of Englishmen, who, with Lord Avebury at their head, represent the same forces in the spiritual life of the English nation. The aim of the German letter, so fully reciprocated in the English reply, is to clear away the fog of mutual suspicion and prejudice which has been existent among both peoples, and which has been utilised from time to time by the Press of the two countries, in order, under the guise of a fervent patriotism, to arouse the war spirit to a dangerous pitch of excitement. "We can state," say the writers, "that none of us, though living in widely distant parts of Germany, and moving in different spheres of German society and party life, has ever heard an attack on England seriously discussed or approved of by any man or section of the German public worth noticing."

THIS Assurance is supported by the signatures of men, many of whom possess an international reputation, and among them, to mention only some of those best known in this country, Joseph Joachim, Gerhard Hauptman, Adolf Harnack, Richard Strauss, Brentano, Eucken, Haeckel, and Wundt. The letter continues: "The wish to be on truly friendly terms with England and Englishmen is general in Germany. Every cultivated German knows and venerates ties that bind together both nations. To no other modern country does German civilisation owe so much as to England through Shakespeare; and England has, from the times of Luther and Holbein to those of Handel and Goethe, found in Germany a source of pure spiritual and artistic inspiration. We believe that on the continuance of this intimacy between both countries depend to a great extent the future and fulness of European civilisation." One sentence from the English reply must suffice, and does suffice, to express our strong conviction: "A war between the two Powers would be a world calamity, for which no victory could compensate either nation."

WE in this country hold truly friendly sentiments towards our German fellow members of that future world-society which is slowly and with such difficulty even now fashioning itself. The same sentiment exists in Germany. Why, then, need we fear? Why does suspicion continue to reign? For many in England do think that Germany would willingly pick a quarrel; And in German society there exists a widespread dread of English intentions and the English sea power, a fear that we certainly can, and probably intend to, fight a fight, of which the inevitable outcome would be the destruction of what has been created with infinite strife, the one self-conscious German nationality. Men of Thuringia, of Saxony, of Prussia find themselves as something greater—for the German is to them a more eloquent thought than the mere Thuringian. England does not hate, does not threaten the higher spiritual destiny of the German peoples. We must rely chiefly on increased intercourse, the interchange of visits, the reception of corporate bodies, and such means of more intimate knowledge, to dispel mistrust and cement a mutual loyalty of friendship: It is as a step in this direction that we so heartily applaud these letters between the intellectual leaders of the thought of two kindred nations.

THERE is one thing not mentioned in these letters, and yet one which lies at the back of all thoughts, certainly in Germany, and largely also in England. Our spiritual achievements are the finer for being shared with our fellows. Unfortunately this is not so, or is not yet seen to be so in the case of those material things which engage the minds of the men of the market. The German, ever the lover of peace, ever the friend of many Englishmen, the German says to the Englishman: "Yes, but the commercial competition, this concurrence, this strife, this war of bills and invoices goes on, and its progress threatens the ideals we more and more clearly, more and more passionately reverence." Here, then, lies the kernel of the modern international problem, as of the modern social problem within the separate frontiers. To organise industry, and therewith to conduct international commerce in such a way that industry and commerce shall simply and adequately subserve the highest ideals of modern wisdom and modern culture, which themselves turn more and more yearningly to the unchanging Justice of which they are the handmaidens. So deep into the heart of social philosophy stretch the thoughts set vibrating in the messages exchanged between the teachers of Germany and the teachers of England.

THE Bishop of Hereford, in a column on "Church and People," in Monday's Tribune, expresses the hope that in the better days in front of us the Church of England may go forward in closer sympathy than hitherto with all popular aspirations, and growing in strength and power for all good influence, because more deeply rooted in the heart and the affections of the people. And he rejoiced in the spirit and aspirations, which he noted as a most hopeful sign, in some of the younger clergy. "Their devotion to the poor and their enthusiasm for the moral and spiritual well-being of the masses are drawing them with a true instinct to their side in all matters of social and political reform. If the Church of England is in the future to be not merely in name but in reality the National Church, it must retain or recover the allegiance of the masses, the sympathy and the grateful and willing adherence of the working multitudes that constitute the main force of the English democracy."

To this utterance of the Bishop of Hereford's we may add the specific declaration of the Church of England Liberal and Progressive Union, of which Lord Beauchamp is chairman. Referring to the crisis of the General Election, in which so many questions of distinctly moral issue are involved, the declaration says:—"The Education Act has conferred the minimum of benefit on the Church, while causing the maximum of irritation to Nonconformists. It has increased rather than diminished the unfairness existing in the large number of districts that are served by a single school, where the public can exercise no control over the majority of the managers or over the appointment of the teachers. With regard to the Licensing Act, it has to be remembered that the great majority of our Bishops were in favour of a 'Time Limit,' and of the restoration to the magistrates of their original and time-honoured authority. It is hoped that the Church will give its adhesion, on this great moral and social question, to those who will support the public control of the traffic in intoxicants. Freedom of trade is essential to the purity of public life, and to the maintenance of a high standard of political morality. Nor can it be supposed that any artificial fostering of certain favoured industries will ever result in lasting benefit to the community. A great wrong has been committed in South Africa by the introduction of indentured Chinese labour under circumstances involving all the essentials of slavery. The remedy for this wrong should surely be found in the free expression of sound Colonial feeling; and the dignity, value, and freedom of labour, at home and elsewhere, are principles to be maintained at all times and at any cost. We appeal to our fellow Churchmen to give these subjects their most earnest consideration, and to support those men who are pledged to put these principles into practice."

THE Moral Instruction League has addressed a series of questions to all the Liberal and Labour candidates. Of 127 candidates who have replied, 110 (83 Liberal, 27 Labour) have expressed themselves definitely in favour of the introduction of systematic non-theological moral instruction (systematic instruction in personal and civic duties as part of the secular curriculum) into all State supported schools. They have also pledged themselves to use their influence, if elected, to secure the introduction into the Code of Regulations for Day Schools of such instruction as a compulsory subject. Further, 68 candidates (40 Liberal, 28 Labour) declare themselves definitely in favour of a system of purely secular education (including systematic non-theological moral instruction) in all State-supported schools. 97 candidates declare against the right of entry of religious bodies into schools for the purpose of giving denominational theological instruction during school hours or at the public expense.

TWENTY-SIX education authorities (including 6 county education authorities) representing over 3,000 schools, have already provision, or have decided to make provision, for systematic non-theological moral instruction in their schools. The Graduated Syllabus of Moral Instruction and Training in Citizenship issued by the League has been adopted with slight modifications by the Surrey, West Riding of Yorkshire, Cheshire, and other education authorities.

THE Co-operative Holidays Association reports that 8,400 people took their holidays at the various centres last year, an increase of 667 over the previous year. The finances were satisfactory, and allowed of votes of £25 to the National Trust for the purchase of Gowbarrow Park and £70 to the children's holiday fund. It was decided at the annual conference early in January that a centre convenient for London people should be established. A delightful spot on the North Downs of Kent is proposed, from which Penshurst, Tunbridge Wells, Sevenoaks, Addington, and other beautiful and historically interesting places can be visited, and excursions may also be made to London. This centre may be worked in connection with another on the South Coast. As in other years, holidays may be taken in Switzerland, and a new centre is contemplated among the hills and forests of the Eifel district in Germany.

At the annual conference Mr. J. R. Barlow, one of the most steadfast friends of the Holidays Association, spoke of the dangers of humbler and simpler folks being crowded out of the centres, and pleaded for the good old traditions of simplicity and naturalness alike in dress and amusements. The experiment in the Vale of Newlands, in the Lake District, where an old factory has been furnished as a holiday home, has been very satisfactory. There the guests do part of their own work, the excursions are nearly all on foot, and plain living and high thinking are cultivated in the district where memories of Wordsworth and Ruskin abound.

PROFESSOR B. NATH SEN, of Calcutta, preached at Wandsworth last Sunday morning, on "The Religious Ideals of India," the service being conducted by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant. To-morrow (Sunday) Professor Sen is to preach in Manchester College Chapel at Oxford.

WEDNESDAY was the two-hundredth anniversary of the birth of Benjamin Franklin. Born at Boston Mass., Jan. 17, 1706, he settled as a young man at Philadelphia, and made his way there as a printer, publisher, and author. Distinguished as a man of science, especially for his discoveries in electricity, honoured as a public man, he fulfilled more than one political mission to the old country, and was one of the five authors of the American Declaration of Independence. After that he represented his country with great distinction as a simple democrat at the Court of France, and having returned to America, died in 1790, in his eighty-fifth year. He is a great example of the strength of personal character and practical good sense.

THE late Miss Caroline Richmond, of Providence, Rhode Island, who passed away on November 8th, 1905, in her 65th year, from sudden heart failure, in the state of Colorado, was an ardent Unitarian, and a very generous benefactor during her lifetime to many religious, educational and other institutions, both for white and coloured people. To the American Unitarian Association she left a legacy of over £3,700. She had been several times in this country and was well known to not a few of our people. In Hungary her name will be remembered with special gratitude, for it was to her enthusiastic interest that her mother's gift of £1,000 was due, which led to the establishment of the Anna Richmond professorship at Kolosvar. To this her brother added later a further gift of £1,000, in memory of their parents. Miss Richmond had always very delicate health, but an indomitable spirit. In her home at Providence she exercised a very gracious hospitality. She was a descendant of the Priscilla who went over in the Mayflower in 1620, whose story in connection with John Alden Longfellow has immortalised.

CAMBRIDGE.—The Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association have made the following arrangements for preachers at Cambridge during the spring term:—Jan. 21, Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A.; Jan. 28, Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, M.A.; Feb. 4, Rev. Henry Gow, B.A.; Feb. 11, Rev. L. P. Jacks, M.A.; Feb. 18, Rev. F. K. Freeston; Feb. 25, Rev. Joseph Wood; March 4, Rev. W. J. Jupp; March 11, Rev. J. Worsley Austin, M.A. Mr. L. B. THE January Cornhill has the first three chapters of a new story by Stanley Weyman opening in 1831, in the midst of the excitement of the Reform struggle. "Chippings" is the title, and Lord Brougham is one of the chief characters.

EUCKEN'S PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION.

III.—RELIGION AND ITS RELATIONS.

It may be stated that all of Eucken's books have been the clearing of the ground for his last great work, "Der Wahrheitsgehalt der Religion" (first edition 1901, second edition 1905). Probably the best way to understand his system of philosophy is to take the books in the order of their appearance, for in this manner an insight may be obtained into the gradual development of the system in the author's own mind, thus making his personality clearer to us than by reading his works at random. In the above-mentioned work the author reaches a higher religious level than in any of the previous works. In fact, the work may be named a Theology as well as a Philosophy of Religion.

Religion with Eucken means the gaining of a new self—a self which is never to cease to grow. This self is to be possessed by man through the freeing of the life from the "small I," and it must always be looked upon as something quite other than a particular subjective self. The spiritual self belongs to the very nature of things; it is the culmination of the process of the world-life. This quality of the spiritual self is universal, i.e., its substance is in the Cosmos. It depends, therefore, upon the wholeness of things, and recognises its dependence, for it is in the recognition of this dependence that it finds a guarantee for the meaning of the world. That aspect of the self is necessary in order to escape from the perpetual flux of appearances. But this relationship of the self has to become ever clearer, and this it can become only in the degree that it struggles against appearances and links itself to meanings and ideals. By taking the wholeness of things into account, the cleft between thought and existence is overcome. What its potencies may mean can not become clear to this spiritual self by the outward aspect of any knowledge or speculation, but by coming into contact with the life of society around itself. It is in society that the self has to realise itself. It is in society that the self receives its problems, and it is through the taking up of these problems, through transforming them and approximately solving them that it gains its content, for thus alone can the deepest meaning of things be experienced by the spirit of man. Thus life gains an ever-new content; it passes from negations to affirmations because it has been driven to such a position by its own demands. It is evident that in all this there is something quite different in nature from the natural process, for the power which drives forth the idea is quite other than, quite contrary to, the ordinary natural process. When the spiritual life becomes conscious of its relationship with the world-life it takes upon itself the burdens that are presented to it, and sees the meaning of its own development in front. Life becomes now a ground to be travelled, a problem to be solved, a rest not to be gained until after the exertion of the whole spirit. The more this is done the more does it seem opposed to the empirical existence which is within and without the spirit. The possession is conceived to be that of a new world—possessed, yea, evermore to be explored. So it is a new world and an over-world at the same time. In this world, discovered by the spiritual self through many struggles, dwells all that is perfect, and it is in this that the spiritual life finds its sufficient cause as well as its sufficient end. Eucken insists that unless this over-world exists the spiritual life, in so far as its wholeness and strength are concerned, falls into pieces and becomes a mere illusion. Whoever wishes to hold to the reality of the spiritual life in the midst of the storms that blow upon it must become convinced of the fact that in that life an independent reality is enclosed, which is a quality of the over-world and which creates the over-man. When this is admitted and acted upon, although there will be as yet much that is dark, there is enough light to cast a hope in the very depth of the human spirit that the struggle is a dire necessity, because it signifies not only a struggle from a lower point to a higher one, but from one world to another.

Here religion differs from philosophy. As Eucken himself states: "Religion holds up visibly to us a large world-wide fact—the opening of love and grace, the living presence of the Kingdom of God; whilst philosophy begins with the general outlines of reality and can penetrate only gradually to the point where the facts of religion become a necessity for its own endeavours." To religion belongs the reality of this new world—a world superior to that of direct and immediate existence. To our author there is no real religion possible without recognising and experiencing this. "A denial of this is for religion a refuge of 'halfness' and obscurity, and is a wretched contradiction in itself." But the belief in the mere existence of some higher Being is far from giving us a religion. "The Epicureans admitted willingly the existence of divine beings, and yet at the same time denied all religion because they denied to these beings any relations with humanity. To religion belongs not only the existence of a higher world, but also the opening up for us of its living presence for salvation from our sins and needs, and for the obtaining of a new being." The only real God is he who works in our own immediate circle. He is not an object to be gazed at, but a power to be used for the transformation of life. A recognition of his transcendence without his immanence is of very little value for man.

Here arises the all important problem of religion—the proof of the living presence of a higher world in our own circle. We are familiar enough with the old method of attempting to prove the existence of God from the starting-point of the physical universe. This method has not quite died out even in our own day. If religion is to obtain a foundation which is unshakable, this method of proof will have to be given up. It is astonishing how prevalent such a method is in our midst. Eucken emphasises this need of change, for no method which attempts to prove the existence of God by the reason, order, and adaptation to ends found in the physical universe, or by an analogy of the workings of the human body or mind, can stand the light of science. All such proofs are artificial, a refined form of realism, and consist simply in projecting by analogy to the universe our own mental conceptions. Such proofs are also fleeting in their nature, because mental conceptions concerning the physical universe vary from generation to generation. They also belong to the lower side of the truth of things, and so leave out of account the higher truths which exist and are effective in the human spirit, and which have no counterpart in the physical world and its behaviour. The counterpart of the higher truths is not in what is physical, is not in what is below themselves, but in that which is above themselves—in the ideal. It must then be admitted freely that science from its objective aspect offers no clue to the existence or efficacy of the divine, and that it has become amongst the leaders of thought a superstition to attempt to build religion on the unfilled clefts of natural science. The history of evolution shows us clearly that the clefts are being gradually filled, with the result—the sad result—that a religion founded on such traditional proofs has to shift perpetually its ground to the next unoccupying point, and that point in its turn it will have to flee from. Science itself is not concerned with the province of religion; far less is an archaic or pseudo science concerned with it. We are not warranted in holding that such and such things are produced by nature out of itself, and other things produced by some superior power. If we hold to such theories we can find no more than an external God, who is little better than no God, and we have to create artificial breaks in the behaviour of the physical universe in order to possess such a weak religion at all.

Eucken states that we have to take our stand on the fact that the world of natural science does not signify the whole and final reality. This work of science is the work of mental activity, and is real in that sense as far as it goes, but it does not go and does not profess to go far enough. It goes some way on the road to reality; this science has been built up through the strength of the mind of man. In our investigation after reality we are therefore to proceed not from the world to man, but from man to the world. The centre of gravity must be shifted from the object to the subject; it has in science to be shifted from the objects of sense to the mind and strength which give meaning to these. Here is seen the overpowering influence of Kant—of emphasising the inward aspect of things in all the dealings of the human mind with physical objects.

So the conclusion is established beyond the possibility of a doubt that in science itself there is a More than sensuous nature. This More is something over against nature, i.e. it is the existence and reality of an inward life. This inward life is a universal thing, at least in so far as it is the possession of all who know the meaning of sensuous things. Upon this ground, out of the power of this mental activity which knows, which is aware of things, have arisen science and art, right and morality, state and humanity, love and life and work. Even on this ground of dealing with sensuous objects and human relations there has grown a new idea of personality and a new spiritual centre of existence. Even on this mental level there is the breaking forth of a new world over against the mere subjective desires of the individual. That this is true may be seen from the characteristic taking up of the struggle against what Eucken calls the "small human," for the emancipation of mental and spiritual work from the private interests and opinions of the bare individual. That scientists themselves have ignored these great results of their work and have emphasised only the external sensuous side is to be deplored. But the work and the results are there, and constitute a proof that the spirit of man on any level of work shows the presence of a life and an activity which are quite other than the bare objects of sense. This life and activity are not a mere More of nature, but the beginning of a new order of things, the breaking forth of a new kind of reality in so far that it shows that the mental life is not a something dependent or lying by the side of the mere natural process either of the individual or of nature. Although the complete reality is not enclosed on this level, yet it has become the standard of all the work of culture, and, however much it is forgotten, it is only out of this standard that the work of natural science can originate and continue. We must therefore, according to Eucken, come to the conclusion that the world is more than nature, and that man is not the mere product of nature, but the possessor of a life which gives meaning to nature.

When we turn from nature to history a similar conclusion must be arrived at. In connection with the work of history in the development of religion much will have to be altered. The Christian conception of history will have to be changed. That conception shows the relationship of God and man as having happened but once in the history of the world, and this conception is supposed to be a break in history itself, to be something lifted out of all human relations and activities. The force in connection with the movement of things is conceived in this manner, in the main as something which was not in human nature and its capacities, or in the transformation of existing things, but in the supernatural power, wisdom, and goodness of God. All that happened was supposed to be linked in an entirely new manner to the will of a personal God, and man was bound in a decree out of which he himself was powerless to escape; e.g., in the Christian conception we get an account of the Creation and the Fall, of salvation and the day of judgment, and the world-history becomes a great connecting drama, which, through innumerable catastrophes and failures, brings about at a single stroke the final conquest of the good. In this manner our position to the whole of things has been determined, and nothing new can be brought about. This view, as Eucken points out, cannot be held to-day, and the sooner we see that the better for us. The main conception to-day is that of the becoming of things, and the Christian era shows but a fragment of this becoming. In Christianity itself there is much which belonged to its particular age, and which cannot be transplanted to the soil of another age. The dogmas which are entwined around the Christian religion belong to days of long ago, to modes of thought and expression which are largely non-Christian, and which have ceased to have meaning and power in our day. Such notions have led many people throughout the ages to conclude that man is hemmed within a chain of causation and is incapable of liberating himself. But is this true? Eucken states that it cannot be true. When history is read and its deeper current becomes visible, there appears a power which is superior to the natural causality of things, and this power has come about through human activity. It is a power which has worked against the fleetingness and shallowness of appearances. Such a fact as the expression and manifestation of such a power could not happen without holding forth the distinction between essential and non-essential. This power has deepened and changed the first ordinary impressions of things, and all this could not happen without the work of the human spirit, which is greater than the ordinary human formation of things. The things of history are taken up by the spirit of man, and are carried forward and upward to higher issues by the activity of that spirit, so that religion is not a fleeing from the present into the past, but the creation of an ever-wider present—a present of the spiritual life over against the present of tradition or the thought of the present of the bare moment; and this spiritual life brings into existence a kingdom of the spirit in the midst of time. Thus there arises within history—within the ordinary current of events—an over-historical reality, and through all the struggles and transformations of time there opens out to man an eternal truth, and through this all our relationships with history are changed. The current of the becoming of things is now viewed as not running unbroken, but with the entrance of the spiritual life, which life is universal and not merely personal and subjective, a new order of things perpetually takes place. A dualism has here again taken place between the bare historical process and the spiritual life, for thus alone the life gains its universality and its ethical character. Great ends open up in front of man; great problems and possibilities surround him on all hands; the conviction is borne upon him that the spiritual life is founded in an eternal truth, for this conviction gives the reason of his existence and the goal of his destiny. Thus it is by the activity of the spiritual life that the stream of history can be made to run in ever-deeper channels. In order to do this it is neither the carrying of traditional intellectual elements of the past nor even the clearness of mental conceptions alone that will help us, but an energetic self-deepening of our own inmost nature and activity. This is the essence of Christianity as held by Eucken, and as we shall see in the last article on Eucken and his relation to Christianity, he conceives of Christianity as the absolute and final religion.

If we look at Eucken's system in its relation to psychology, the same truth of the superiority of the spiritual life over the mental processes of that life is seen. The account which psychology gives of us is too small; it cannot lift man out of his own small self. Our self has a world-character, or else it could not bind together the impressions which it receives into a totality and give them meaning. When we pass from psychology to the recognition of the world-life of the self, there appears the possibility and the necessity of a turning to religion; there appears the possibility and the certainty of a new order of things. In this way, as Eucken states, "Religion alone assures the spiritual life of its indispensable independence and superiority over against the nearest existence, and only with the help of religion is genuine spirituality able to close itself firmly together and take up an energetic struggle against all 'halfness' and all the sham which cling to the average life of humanity." How this culmination of the spiritual life is to be reached we hope to show in the final article.

MR. ARMSTRONG'S SERMONS.*

RATHER more than a third of this memorial volume is occupied by Mr. George Armstrong's Memoir of his father and Mr. Wicksteed's Introductory Letter. To these we referred in a first notice of the book a fortnight ago. We now turn to the Sermons.

There are sixteen sermons, and after these a further nineteen pages of extracts from other sermons. Mrs. Armstrong has been responsible for the selection, and has endeavoured to make them as representative as possible of the various aspects of her husband's maturer teaching. The sermons all belong to his Liverpool ministry with the exception of one on the Lord's Supper, preached at Nottingham in October, 1881, rather more than two years before his removal to Liverpool. Their quality is well described in the Memoir, where, after a reference to the contrast, architecturally, between the two churches of Hope-street, Liverpool, and the High-pavement, Nottingham, it is added:—

"Some of his hearers traced a difference in his preaching corresponding with the difference in the buildings, in a certain mellowing and deepening of his religious teaching during his later ministry in contrast with that of his younger days. The gospel of an all-conquering love seemed more and more to overshadow and supersede the old gospel of the warfare of the spirit. One who had heard him many a time before and after his migration to Liverpool said that at Nottingham he preached Paul, but at Liverpool, Christ. He was a fighter to the end, but as the years went by, he came to regard love more and more as the supreme power for the uplifting of the world, and to care less and less for the sword of controversy."

No one is likely to grudge the space given to the Memoir in this volume, but if any should wish that there had been room for more sermons, it should be remembered that at least a hundred of Mr. Armstrong's sermons have been already published. The four volumes of the Liverpool Pulpit, which he edited with the present Dean of Ely and the Rev. C. F. Aked (in the fourth year, with the Rev. Robert Veitch in the Dean's place), 1892-5, contain twenty of his sermons, and in the monthly issue of his own Sermons for the Day, continued during the years 1896-8 and 1902-5, there were about eighty more. And there were several special sermons separately published:—The annual sermon of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, in 1880, on "The Desolation of Jerusalem,"; the sermon at the second meeting of the National Conference in 1885, at Birmingham, on "A Church Free and Catholic"; the Provincial Assembly sermon at Flowery Field, in 1889, on "The Soul's Converse with God," afterwards published in Sermons for the Day in 1897. Another sermon, on "The Sympathy of God," is in the volume published by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in 1897, under the title "Verities of Religion." Thus there is ample store, in addition to the published volumes of his lectures, for those who want to follow out the lines of his pulpit teaching; but the sixteen sermons in this last volume will stand as an admirable presentment of the main features of his positive religious teaching, and we like to think that they will be very widely read. They should be welcomed especially by those who value "God and the Soul," as offering invaluable illustrations of present-day religious experience, with which that "Essay towards Fundamental Religion" is concerned.

These sermons are printed exactly as they were used in the regular course of Mr. Armstrong's ministry. Thus, the last sermon, on "God made not Death," was preached on Hospital Sunday, and there is reference to the collection. In the sermon on "The Mystery of Grief," the occasion is distinctly marked: "We have suffered so much sorrow this past week, there are so many among us that 'go mourning,' whether for the aged who has laid down earthly life in the ripeness of many years, or for the friend and brother taken away from us in mid-career, to so very large a proportion of our ranks one or other of these events has come as a grief," &c. And in the sermon on "The Poles of Christian Character," an illustration from the well-known picture, "Diana or Christ?" is introduced with these words: "We look on that great canvas which I have on other occasions described to you," &c. They are not long sermons. They would fill on an average only about four and a half columns of this journal, whereas a sermon of Mr. Stopford Brooke's would fill at least six columns, and often a good deal more, and Dr. Martineau's and Mr. Thom's sermons would average about six and a half columns. Mr. Armstrong was not a rapid speaker. One remembers his great platform gift of saying in a few weighty words exactly what had to be said; and the sermons make much the same impression of clear, forcible and measured utterance.

The first of the sermons is on "The Theism of Nature," preached in August, 1890, after a holiday in Norway. It contains a series of vivid pictures of the beauty and grandeur of that wonderful country, and an expression, such as was habitual with Mr. Armstrong, of his deep sense of the revealing power of the beauty and sublimity of Nature. The first scene he pictures is from the southern point of the long arm of the Hardanger Fiord at Odde. He describes the great stretch of the waters and the encircling hills at sunset; and quoting the complaint of some tourist that the mountains want boldness of outline, goes on:—

"Yes, just here there are no terrific precipices or cloud-cleaving peaks, only slopes from cloud to fiord of various angles, line behind line, and curve behind curve. Yet is there a very miracle dominating those curves and lines, for they also are marshalled into a harmony and unity such as no architect has ever given to palace or cathedral. So that the whole vast landscape, with the sunset bloom resting on it everywhere, is a sweet and mighty music, ravishing the soul with the burden of its chant. Alone with the mountains and the waters, and the skies? Nay, not alone! Less alone a thousand-fold than in the clattering hotel or in the streets of the huge cities at home, this Liverpool and that London, of which Norwegians speak with incredulous awe. Less alone, there in the still solitude, than on any other spot of earth. For never with such enchanted voice on any other spot of earth did all the elements seem to murmur, 'Our God is here. He holds us and He moulds us. Our form is from the pressure of His hand; our tents are from the fragrance of His breath. Our God is here, and we in Him, and He in us, and in thee too while thou standest in this temple which we are.'"

"And as one turned amid the gathering darkness, and softly stole back to the little town, it seemed as though all the problems of life, and all the doubts of the restless brain, and all the achings of the heart, and all the wrongs and sorrows of the myriads of men, must be softened and harmonised and brought under the holy dominance of God for ever, like that wondrous, prophetic army of ancient hills, in the light of the memory of that marvellous scene" (p. 132).

Other pictures follow, and then there is a closing work of what the human countenance may reveal of the yet fuller spiritual knowledge of the love of God.

The second sermon, "Thy Kingdom Come," is the only one which had been previously published, being in the Liverpool Pulpit of September, 1895. It is a powerful appeal for individual faithfulness, and confidence that each one can and must do his own part for the furtherance of righteousness. The same burden, at the heart of a true manhood, is in the sermons on "What must I Do to be Saved?" and "The Domain of Law," and again in that on "Depression," with its pleading for the strenuous doing of duty, and the going out from self to live with and for others, and not with those who are our brethren only, with single-hearted love for them, but also with God, our Father, doing for His sake, and loving because He first loved us. The sermon on "The Mystery of Grief," again points to that perfecting of our life, and the ultimate victory over all sorrow, through trust in the perfect love of God.

Following the sermon on the Lord's Supper is one on "The Upper Room," preached in May, 1895, after Mr. Armstrong had been in Jerusalem. Here again there is a striking example of his power of realising the scenes of which he speaks:—

"Yes, the magic city. For even now, however squalid Jerusalem is within, as seen from the Mount of Olives it can never be forgotten. We sat one moonlight night half-way up Olivet, gazing across the valley at the city. Instead of the roar of traffic which would fall on your ears of an evening in the outskirts of a European city, the one sound breaking the silence was the barking of many dogs, so characteristic of the East, and the barking, too, no doubt of the foxes or the jackals prowling on the neighbouring hills. But there, before us, across the valley on the abruptly rising ground to the west, were the square castellated walls of the famous city, the mosque of Omar marking the splendid plateau levelled of old by Solomon, where the Temple once glittered in all its stately magnificence. And quietly in the moonlight we read the story of Gethsemane, of that quiet procession of the Master and his friends from the upper room to the olive-garden, of the drawing apart of the Master for the strengthening of prayer, of how those three who should have watched with him were overcome with sleep, of his pathetic reproach, 'What, could ye not watch with me one hour?' of the sudden noise and bustle of the band who came to seize him, of the violent arrest, and the march back up the hill into the cruel city.

"Many have asked me whether the visit to Palestine was mostly a disillusionment or a help to the realisation of the Bible scenes. So far as regards that evening on the Mount of Olives, and the Sunday morning hour on the banks of the Jordan, I can truly say that these made the scenes in the life of Jesus very real to me—brought them before my mental vision with a vividness which I can never forget, and which must remain as long as I live, very precious treasures in the storehouse of my memory" (p. 276).

There are other of the sermons on which we should have been glad to dwell, each with its own characteristic touch—"Power through Repose," "Patriotism," "Self-Denial," and "Eternal Life." This last describes the true nature of that life which is gained not as a future reward, but in the very act of the knowledge of God and of Jesus Christ, a life the nature of which is so profoundly realised in the Fourth Gospel. We must not quote any more, except one final passage, or we would have added here the passage beginning on p. 255, on the true knowledge of God, not given by the arguments of philosophy but by an inward spiritual experience, and the conclusion of the sermon, on that "new order of love, and gentleness, and purity, and human helpfulness and sympathy and humility," revealed to the world in Christ.

Of the passages from other sermons at the end of the book the first is another beautiful nature picture of Loch Katrine, with some thoughts on "God in the Beauty of the World." Others are on "The Unconventional Christ," "Veracity in Religion," "Father and Child," "The Coming of the Kingdom," &c. Among them is this passage:—

"What astonishes me most, in these latter years, is the clearness with which it is coming out that in the enunciations of the Sermon on the Mount and similar utterances of Jesus is to be found the true and the only true solution of the great social and economical problems which with so frowning an aspect confront us to-day. It can be shown in detail that every one of these dark problems has arisen directly from the violation of the principles which Jesus spoke straight out of the treasure of his moral and religious consciousness. I believe that it can be shown in detail also that the restoration of social and economical equilibrium depends solely on a new realisation of the simple principles of his gospel. Economists have decried the mixing up of Christian ethics with their science. It is beginning to appear to-day that Christian ethics, and Christian ethics only, can restore economy to a place among the sciences. Jesus, the supreme prophet, is the supreme economist as well" (p. 309).

And now we turn back once more to the portrait at the beginning of the book, and to the Memoir which so happily tells of this preacher of righteousness and of the love of God. His life was the greatest of all the sermons. It was a great word of manhood that he spoke—of manhood and devoted service and enduring love. Many whom he helped, and still helps, will have been deeply touched by those words near the end of Mr. Wicksteed's letter, referring to those "who feel his death as a challenge to them, to live nobly in the strength which he confirmed, testifying to the life he gave them by strength to live without him." Only it can never be altogether without him, whose word has such living power.

LIFE AND MATTER.*

HAECKEL'S "Riddle of the Universe" has met with criticism from various quarters since its publication. The main interest that attaches to the recent little work of Sir Oliver Lodge arises from the fact that it is the reply of one eminent scientist to another. In it the author gathers into a whole the thoughts on life and matter which he has recently, in various lectures and articles, been making public.

The details of the criticism of Haeckel cannot be entered into here. They all converge, however, to a certain point, which is fundamental in Sir Oliver Lodge's philosophy—namely, that Reality cannot be regarded as limited simply "to that part of existence of which we are now aware." It is on this point that his basal cleavage with Haeckel rests.

Haeckel has built up a philosophical system to which he has given the name "Monism." The universe, in his view, represents, in all its varied forms and processes, the evolution of one primary substance. The evolution of this substance discloses a certain fundamental cosmic law whose "discovery and establishment is the greatest intellectual triumph of the nineteenth century, in the sense that all other known laws of nature are subordinate to it." To this Haeckel gives the name "the law of substance," and says that it is a combination of the two laws of "the conservation of matter" and "the conservation of energy." As Sir Oliver Lodge points out, Haeckel thus attempts to lay the basis of materialistic monism, which is a special variety of monism, and far from being the only possible form, since "an attempt at monism is common to all philosophers." Sir Oliver Lodge's criticism of this initial position of Haeckel's consists in showing that, in the light of recent physical discoveries, matter cannot be regarded as an ultimate, permanent form of Reality at all. "The destruction and the creation of matter," he writes "are well within the range of scientific conception, and may be within the realm of experimental possibility."

As regards the theory of the conservation of energy, after discussing its true meaning and limitation, he concludes: "The serious mistake which people are apt to make concerning it is to imagine that it denies the possibility of guidance, control, or directing agency, whereas it has nothing to say on these topics."

These and kindred criticisms lead up to the conception of transcendence, which is the key to the author's own position. His main contention is that we are in no way entitled to believe that we can explain the whole universe in terms of the limited and by no means ultimate forms in which its reality is at present manifested to us. The Real transcends that part of existence of which we now know. And so he writes: "The miserable, degraded monism and lower pantheism, which limits the term 'god' to that part of existence of which we are now aware—sometimes, indeed, to a fraction only of that—which limits the term 'mind' to that of which we are ourselves conscious, and the term 'matter' to the dust of the earth and the other visible bodies, is a system of thought appropriate, perhaps, to a fertile and energetic portion of the nineteenth century, but not likely to survive as a system of perennial truth."

The latter part of the book is devoted to the Problem of Life. The attempt here is, as Sir Oliver Lodge himself puts it, "to confute two errors which are rather prevalent—(1) The notion that because material energy is constant in quantity, therefore its transformations and transferences—which admittedly constitute terrestrial activity—are not susceptible of guidance or directive control. (2) The idea that the specific guiding power which we call 'life' is one of the forms of material energy, so that directly it relinquishes its connection with matter other equivalent forms of energy must arise to replace it."

Sir Oliver Lodge's position seems largely based upon the ideas set forth some thirty years ago by the late Mr. James Coll. That these are bearing fruit in present-day thought is shown by their reappearance in two other recently-published works—"Life and Energy," by Mr. Walter Hibbert, and "Present-day Rationalism Critically Examined," by Professor G. Henslow. The contention in all is the same—that the action of force is determined by something that is not itself force; that life or mind is not a form of force, but a controlling agent, that controls without expending force.

The reasons for the contention are well summed up in the present work in the author's reply to the statement of Professor Le Conte, that had been quoted against him: "Vital force may now be regarded as so much force withdrawn from the general fund of chemical and physical forces." To this Sir Oliver Lodge replies: "If it were true that vital energy turned into or was anyhow convertible into inorganic energy, if it were true that a dead body had more inorganic energy than a live one, if it were true that 'these inorganic energies' always or ever 'reappear on the dissolution of life,' then undoubtedly cadit questio; life would immediately be proved to be a form of energy, and would enter into the scheme of physics. But inasmuch as all this is untrue—the direct contrary of the truth—I maintain that life is not a form of energy, that it is not included in our present physical categories, that its explanation is still to seek. And I have further stated—though there I do not dogmatise—that it appears to me to belong to a separate order of existence, which interacts with this material frame of things, and while there, exerts guidance and control on the energy which already here exists."

The author brings us thus to the fringe of a very big problem—or, rather, series of problems—in which a good deal more than the superficialities of Haeckelism is involved. Readers of Lotze's "Microcosmus" will recall the detailed inspection and close handling of the problems of organic vitality and psychic life in the first two books. Such questions as the following arise:—

(1) Are organic vitality and psychic life of the same nature? Lotze answers, "No."

(2) Is anything involved in organic vitality beyond a reciprocal action and interaction of physical forces, each acting in accordance with its own mechanical laws, to build up the complex whole? To this Lotze answers, "No"; and at great length works out his position, which is that all vital phenomena have their explanation as part of the physical universe.

(3) Is anything beyond all this involved in psychic life—i.e., in consciousness and the facts and activities which it includes? To this Lotze replies, "Yes." Mind, which is something quite different from "Life," is an agent which exerts guidance and control, and which is not to be derived from the physical world and its energies.

Such are samples of the problems to which Sir Oliver Lodge brings us, and such are the answers of another constructive thinker, which will be found partly to accord and partly to disagree with the thesis of Sir Oliver Lodge when developed. The distinction of mental facts from vital facts is fundamental, and it seems to me that the "control theory" will have to square itself with this distinction first before it makes progress.

It is satisfactory to note that the Birmingham and Midland Institute is making a special publication of Sir Oliver Lodge's work for distribution. Similar educational institutions might do the same with advantage, as an antidote to some of the Rationalistic Press productions that just now are circulating so freely.

THE ENGLISH BIBLE.*

THERE are few reprints which have better justification than that of Westcott's History of the English Bible. It has been a very scarce book for many years, and it reappears now carefully edited and revised

* "Life and Matter": A Criticism of Professor Haeckel's "Riddle of the Universe." By Sir Oliver Lodge. (Williams & Norgate. 2s. 6d. net.)

by Mr. Aldis Wright, but in structure and contents essentially unaltered. In its pages theology and literature join hands, for the reader hardly knows whether to be more interested in the story of the gradual diffusion of knowledge of the Scriptures, with all its momentous religious consequences, or in the growth of the prose classic, which for three hundred years has set the standard of the great style in writing and fixed attention upon what is most excellent in our English tongue. It has probably been of unique advantage to us that the two interests have coincided so closely. It has helped to bring the organ notes of the prophets and the lyrical cadences of the psalms into secular speech, and it has provided religion at the same time with an instrument of expression of unparalleled beauty and nobleness. A man cannot frame his lips to use the words of the Bible with irreverence; there is something in their very sound, like that of the elemental forces of nature, which saves him from vulgarity of spirit. It is for this reason that at the great moments of life, when the heart is touched to a deep solemnity and sincerity, no language is so sufficing as that of Scripture; and it is not the mere habit of repetition, but something inherent in itself, which makes any other words seem out of tune with the primitive simplicity of joy or grief. This Scriptural authority of the fit word perfectly expressed gives a fatal unreality to most arguments for an enlarged lectionary or extra-Biblical readings in public worship. Plausible as they may appear on the lips of some advocates, they touch no real need of the Christian society. Until we can create Scripture we can find no substitute for it. Perhaps some regret is admissible that the prestige and nobility of the authorised English Bible have stood so steadily in the way of the popularity of the Revised Version. There has never been any effective competition between them, nor does there seem likely to be any in the future. It would be mere pedantry to put down this failure of a great plan to religious prejudice. The defects of the Revised Version are well known, and there is no need to exaggerate them. The chief difficulty has been the supreme excellence for religious uses of the Bible that we know. It is only shallow people who transfer their affections easily, and the congregation that is eager to proclaim its enlightenment by a facile change from the old to the new may involve itself in worse snares than those of Bibliolatry. The truth is that religious changes come slowly. Our habits in worship are swayed, not by argument, but by spiritual need and affection. We listen to the Bible that we may taste the joy and salvation of God, and we cling with strong but not unreasonable desire to the words, which have stolen into our hearts with our earliest affections and left a perfect impression of holiness and beauty. In other moods, we do well to search the Scriptures and let the scholar take us by the hand. "For thy part, most gentle reader," wrote Miles Coverdale, "take in good worth that I here offer thee with a good will, and let this present translation be no prejudice to the other, that out of the Greek have been translated before, or shall be hereafter. For if thou open thine eyes and consider well the gift of the Holy Ghost therein, thou shalt see that one translation declareth, openeth, and illustrateth another, and that in many places one is a plain commentary unto another." Westcott's book strengthens our sense both of the claims of scholarship and the still more paramount debt of piety. It is an heroic story that it has to tell, and one full of fascination for all who care to follow the parallel growth of Christianity and great literature in our national life.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

When we fully understand what duty means, we know that God is with us.

Let us think about that together, and see if it is not the best way to get a real hold upon religion, which means trusting in God, being obedient to His will, and glad and thankful that He is with us all through our life.

Think how it is with you any day, when you have done what is right, in spite of strong temptation to wrong, or in spite of danger and great difficulty. You know how, when you have done it, a feeling of strength and gladness comes into your heart—a gladness which nothing else in the whole world can give, different from any other feeling in your life.

If you have dared to speak up when some wrong thing was being done, and said openly it was a shameful thing, and perhaps by your courage prevented it from being done, stopping the beginning of some plan of deceit, standing up for a little one against big bullies, or saving some helpless dumb creature from cruel hands; or if, where you were, the others were beginning to talk or act in a nasty way, and though you were ashamed, it yet seemed easier to do as the others do and pretend to be amused, or perhaps to take no notice, but then you moved away and openly showed your disgust or spoke out and stopped it; even if you were quite a little chap and they jeered at you and perhaps knocked you about a bit; you know how you would hold all the more passionately to what you know is right; and whatever they might do to you, would keep yourself clean from that wrong, and your honour untouched; how glad you would be that you had dared, and anything you suffered would seem as nothing compared with that great gladness and the secret feeling of strength and certainty that you were on the right side.

Did you ever go to a public meeting in a time of great excitement, when some wrong had been done, and the citizens met together to protest, or when they wanted to get some evil and oppressive law repealed, and their opponents crowded in to break up the meeting or to mock at the speakers, and prevent them from being heard?

Suppose you had gone to such a meeting with your father, and heard him speak on the unpopular side for justice, and the people shouted and jeered at him and called him evil names, but he just held steadily on, and said out fearlessly what he had to say and felt to be the truth, and the people hissed and hooted; and then, as the meeting was broken up in confusion and he came out, he was hustled by the crowd and struck again and again, but he went calmly on through it all; and you were with him and just held his hand, and you got some of the blows too. How would you feel as you went with him through that storm, you who had felt your heart burning with him as he spoke brave words, and you knew he was right? And when you got home, perhaps all bruised and with your clothes torn and pale from the excitement, but seeing a light of great tenderness and courage shining in his eyes—what would be your strongest feeling?

I think it would be exultation, a deep and passionate feeling of gladness, and of victory because you and he had been together, and had suffered for the right. You would know, as you had not known before, the glorious strength of that inward law of right, which can make a man strong against the whole world.

It is very wonderful that inward law, which we find in our own hearts, and yet know is not of ourselves. It is something that we find and know that we ought to obey. It has to do with the whole of our life. It is a great power, unseen, but always present, wherever we may be, and whatever we have to do, bidding us always do the right, bringing penalties for disobedience, but strength and that great gladness of which we have spoken, to those who learn to obey.

The children begin very soon to find out what it means. At first, of course, they do things simply because they are told. "You must do it because mother says so." But why does mother say so? She and father feel the same about right and wrong, and when they say a thing is right, and the children ought to do it, it is because they and the children are living together under the same inward law. They lead their children in the first steps of doing right, but just in doing it the children begin to feel for themselves that it is right. They see the sorrow at untruth or deceit in mother's face, and they know what it means. They hear the tones of indignation at wrong, of sympathy for those who suffer, of hope or triumph in the victory of some good cause, and there is something in themselves which answers. They do not feel those things because they are told to feel them, but because the right is right, and the same inward law of the true life is in their hearts too.

They love and obey their parents all the more, because they feel how their parents love and obey the right. That is how the great happiness of a true home life is built up.

So here is that great law, the law of duty or of right, unseen but always present, a great power in our homes and in all our lives. What does it mean? A law is not in itself a living thing, and it is not something men have made. It makes them strong as they learn to obey, and leads them into the true life.

The answer is that the law is the will of God, who is always with us. It is His good purpose. All that the presence of that law of right makes us feel, all that it brings with our lives, is one great way in which God, our Father, speaks to us, and shows us how we are to live the true life as His children in this great and beautiful world. That wonderful gladness and strength, which come to us when we have dared to be true, and have suffered for the right, are the touch of His Spirit. He is with us. We are strong in His strength, glad because He cares for us.

AN ENLARGED LECTIONARY.

THE notice of WESTCOTT'S "History of the English Bible," by the Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND, which we publish this week, raises two questions not to be passed over without serious consideration.

First, as to the use of the Revised Version. We do not know to what extent that use has been adopted in orthodox Nonconformist bodies, but it was a notable point in the celebration of the Centenary of the Bible Society that several cheap editions of that Version were then, for the first time, issued under its auspices. Of the Church of England, what Mr. DRUMMOND says is doubtless true, that there has, hitherto, at any rate, been no effective competition in its communion between the Authorised and the Revised Versions, although strong pleas have been made in Convocation for the adoption of the latter, simply in the interest of truth. And in our own community that, we imagine, has been the paramount consideration, and not any desire for facile change. We are not aware that in this matter any census of our congregations has been taken, but we should be very much surprised to learn that a large majority of them have not already adopted the Revised Version in their public services. And we confess that after twenty years' habitual use of that Version we do not find that its religious cadence falls so painfully short of that of the old version as to justify an unwillingness to accept its more exact presentment of the meaning of the original scriptures. It is, perhaps, in the Old Testament that it is most essential to a right understanding of the books, but in the New, also, there are many critical passages; and, apart from that paramount question of truth, we do not find that even in beauty of expression the new always falls short of the old. In 1 Cor. xiii., particularly, we should find it difficult to return to "charity," after constant delight in the celebration of "love," which "suffereth long and is kind."

But what we are chiefly concerned to say here is on the further question of an enlarged Lectionary. We fully admit that no other book can take the place of the English Bible in our public worship, and yet it does not necessarily follow that we ought not to have liberty occasionally to use other books for the reading of lessons, and we are not sure that the practice ought not to be encouraged more than it is simply as a testimony to the true doctrine of religious inspiration.

Mr. DRUMMOND says that, "until we can create Scripture, we can find no substitute."

But is it a fact that after the first creative period of the Christian Church, out of which the New Testament grew, seventeen or eighteen centuries of Christian experience have produced no "scripture"?

The Old Testament contains the religious literature of a people during centuries of its progressive life, or, perhaps, we should say, it contains a selection from that literature made by the religious instinct of chosen teachers; and while it is a priceless treasure for the history of religion; only a part, and by no means the larger part, is of use to us for lessons in public worship. We admit that other expression for our devotion is needed, in that we sing not only the ancient psalms, but hymns gathered from the stores of many later centuries. Would it not seem natural also that in the reading of lessons we should gather wisdom and inspiration from the best writings of those same centuries?

The New Testament, we may admit, contains the richest treasures of the literature of the first Christian century and a half, and yet not all of the same worth for spiritual religion. If we found another undoubted letter of the Apostle PAUL'S, full of those vivid personal touches, showing how he lived and worked among his friends, and containing further exhortations as to the worth of spiritual freedom and the power of pure unselfish love, should we not thankfully read from it in church, even though it had been translated into quite modern English? Why then should not a passage be read now and then, say, from the Journal of JOHN WOOLMAN, which is full of the beautiful spirit of single-hearted Christian discipleship? Is it the worse for belonging to a later generation. Is it farther from God and the kindling power of His Spirit? We believe there is "scripture" to be found in that book, which perhaps we are unfaithful not to use with many another treasure of latter-day Christian faith and love, for instruction and inspiration in the hour of worship. No doubt lessons so selected from later literature must be only of the most beautiful in form to stand beside the strength and beauty of our English Bible, but are there not such to be found. If, for instance, we read lessons from the Book of Proverbs, why not also from the Book of the Imitation of CHRIST? And once more, ought we not to seek out such fit passages, so that in public worship we may vindicate and rejoice in the unbroken flow of Divine inspiration through all the Christian centuries?

In furtherance of this consideration, we will add here four passages, which appear to us not unworthy to be used as occasional lessons, and if any of our readers are interested in this suggestion, we shall be glad to carry the illustration further, if they will send us what they consider the best examples.

I.

From the "Imitatio Christi."

Blessed is the soul that heareth the Lord speaking within her, and receiveth from His mouth the word of consolation.

Blessed are the ears that gladly receive the pulses of the Divine whisper, and give no heed to the many whisperings of this world.

Blessed indeed are those ears which listen not after the voice which is sounding without, but for the Truth teaching inwardly.

Blessed are they that enter far into things internal, and endeavour to prepare themselves more and more, by daily exercises, for the receiving of heavenly secrets.

Blessed are they who are glad to have time to spare for God, and shake off all worldly impediments.

Consider these things, O my soul, and shut up the door of thy sensual desires, that thou mayest hear what the Lord thy God shall speak in thee.

The children of Israel in times past said unto Moses, "Speak thou unto us, and we will hear: let not the Lord speak unto us, lest we die."

Not so, Lord, not so, I beseech Thee; but rather with the prophet Samuel, I humbly and earnestly entreat, "Speak, Lord, for Thy servant heareth."

Let not Moses speak unto me, nor any of the prophets, but rather do Thou speak, O Lord God, Inspirer and Enlightener of all the prophets; for Thou alone without them canst perfectly instruct me, but they without Thee can profit nothing.

They indeed may sound forth words, but they cannot give the Spirit.

Most beautifully do they speak, but if Thou be silent, they inflame not the heart.

They bring the letter, but Thou openest the sense; they bring forth mysteries, but Thou unlockest the meaning of sealed things.

They declare Thy commandments, but Thou helpest us to fulfil them.

They point out the way, but Thou givest strength to walk in it.

What they can do is only without, but Thou instructest and enlightenest the heart.

They water outwardly, but Thou givest fruitfulness.

They cry aloud in words, but Thou impartest understanding to the hearing.

Let not Moses therefore speak unto me, but Thou, O Lord my God, the Everlasting Truth; lest I die, and prove unfruitful, if I be only warned outwardly and not enkindled within. Lest it turn to my condemnation—the word heard and not fulfilled, known and not loved, believed and not observed.

Speak, therefore, Lord, for Thy servant heareth: for Thou hast the words of eternal life.

Speak Thou unto me, to the comfort, however imperfect, of my soul, and to the amendment of my whole life, and to Thy praise and glory everlasting.

II.

From the "Imitatio Christi."

Blessed are the single-hearted, for they shall enjoy much peace.

We are too much led by our passions, and too solicitous for transitory things.

We also seldom overcome any one vice perfectly, and are not inflamed with a fervent desire to grow better every day; and therefore we remain cold and lukewarm.

Resist thine inclination in the very beginning, and unlearn evil customs, lest perhaps by little and little they draw thee to greater difficulty.

O if thou didst but consider how much inward peace unto thyself, and joy unto others, thou shouldst procure by demeaning thyself well, I suppose thou wouldst be more careful of thy spiritual progress.

Those things that a man cannot amend in himself or in others, he ought to suffer patiently, until God order things otherwise.

Think that perhaps it is better so for thy trial and patience, without which all our good deeds are not much to be esteemed.

Thou oughtest to pray notwithstanding when thou hast such impediments, that God would vouchsafe to help thee, and that thou mayest bear them kindly.

Endeavour to be patient in bearing with the defects and infirmities of others, of what sort soever they be; for that thyself also hast many which must be borne with by others.

If thou canst not make thyself such an one as thou wouldst, how canst thou expect to have another in all things to thy liking?

We would willingly have others perfect, and yet we amend not our own faults.

We will have others severely corrected, and will not be corrected ourselves.

The large liberty of others displeaseth us; and yet we will not have our own desires denied us.

We will have others kept under by strict laws, but in no sort will ourselves be restrained.

And thus it appeareth, how seldom we weigh our neighbour in the same balance with ourselves.

If all men were perfect, what should we have to suffer of our neighbour for God?

But now God hath thus ordered it, that we may learn to bear one another's burdens; for no man is without fault; no man but hath his burden; no man sufficient for himself; no man wise enough for himself; but we ought to bear with one another, comfort one another, help, instruct, and admonish one another.

Occasions of adversity best discover how great virtue or strength each one hath. For occasions do not make a man frail, but they show what he is.

III.

From "Psalms of the West."

Let us bring unto God more than praise, let us honour Him with more than prayer.

Let a joyful spirit be our anthem, and unceasing righteousness our service.

When thou criest to Him, He cannot break His laws to help thine error.

If thou pleadest with Him and givest not all thy strength for that thou desirest, thou dishonourest Him that gave thee a mind after His image.

Let us not ask for more than a right spirit, nor supplicate for more than a wise father would hearken unto.

Let us act for the highest good in holiness of purpose, and we shall gain strength as He desireth.

Hath He not given us a heart to behold righteousness, and reason to discover His law?

The child that asketh for much and doeth little causeth sorrow and weakness, and shall fail in the time of trouble.

The gifts of heaven are poured upon thee; the sun giveth light that thou mayest work, and the darkness of night provideth for thy rest.

Thou knowest that the rain cannot always refresh a thirsty land, nor the warmth whiten thy harvests duly in every season.

Pray not especially for thine own case, for the winds are not made for thy choice herbs, nor the clouds apportioned by the measure of thy cisterns.

Dig deep thy wells in the time of plenty, store thy goods against the evil day, and spare thy substance that in famine thou mayest arise as a deliverer.

By storms the tree acquireth strength, from the barren hills cometh nobleness, by resistance the soul giveth forth the sweetness of music.

A good ship is safe in the stormy waters; if every eye and hand be quick, the billows will menace in vain.

A clean city escapeth plague, and by continual care may a nation be preserved in health.

Wait not therefore for the evil day, to fall on thy knees in sharp distress, for thou knowest now that disease is in the world, and that loving thoughtfulness is the prayer beloved of God.

Consider every enemy and prepare strenuously for every ambush; make thy house safe against infection, and thy children against deception.

Bring knowledge abundantly to bless the people, and science to overthrow the creatures of darkness;

Let every man be instructed in the world's laws, and let every mind be trained in reason and skill;

Let him learn in lowliness and walk humbly in wisdom; let his heart be full of zeal, and his life a sacrifice of thanksgiving in sure obedience.

IV.

From the "Psalms and Litanies" of Rowland Williams.

Lord, who art gracious to them that wait on Thee, be our arm of strength every morning.

Blessed art Thou, who givest labour and rest, our salvation also in time of trouble.

Grant us day by day quietness and peace, while we follow those already called to their rest.

Perfect Thy strength in our weakness, and let Thy grace be sufficient for us.

Say to us, Be of good cheer, and open our lips from shame, that they may show forth Thy praise in joyfulness.

Increase and multiply upon us Thy graces: to our faith add virtue, and to our knowledge charity.

With charity make perfect patience, and with patience strength, and peace towards God and man;

That we forget not the Giver of our health, but give diligence to make our calling sure;

That we abound in all works of sincerity, and hold fast the anchor of our salvation.

When we call Thee Father, give us the mind of children; and as a father pitieth children, be gracious to us for ever.

When we own Thee Lord, make us obedient servants, and let the breath of Thy holiness be the law of our deeds.

As our fathers who trusted in Thee were holpen and not confounded, so in the need of the times that are, and shall be, be Thou our hope, and that of all generations.

Lighten with freedom the dark places of the nations, and give peace and godliness to the world.

As the round earth is balanced by the counsel of Thy wisdom, so in Thy truth let our minds be established.

O everlasting Teacher of mankind, from Thee come the workers of good for ever.

Thine are the revivers of godliness in the world, and the sowers of winged seeds of truth.

Thine, O Lord, is the great company of our ancestors, the sacred truth-tellers, and glorious patriots.

All makers of story and song, and the masters of harmony are Thine, and the pure sufferers for godliness.

Whoever have vanquished evil, and in faith and hope gone through labour for right.

Glory to Thee, Lord, for Thy Spirit in them; and in their spirit let us praise Thee.

Thou Lover of the holy and upright in the East and the West, let us love Thee with unity of mind.

Shall not all nations, each in their tongue and home, because Thy judgments are known, praise the living God?

For the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth now as of old; let us rejoice because He dwells among men.

The humble and meek shall be His people, from whose eyes He shall wipe all tears away.

There shall be no more fear of pain at His hand; neither strife nor crying over prayers; for the evil things pass away.

Lord, perfect Thy work in us, and for us; and let us live as children of the Eternal.

THE Unitarian Society of Wellington, New Zealand, to which Dr. Tudor Jones is going out next month, celebrated the first anniversary of its formation by a social meeting on Wednesday evening, October 11, in the Masonic Hall, Boulcott-street, about eighty friends being present. Mr. John Gammell, B.A., the president, in the course of his address emphasised the fact that the society deprecated an attempt to withdraw churchgoers from their present allegiance; but sought to gain adherents only from amongst those who had ceased attending religious services. On Sunday evening, November 12, at the usual fortnightly service in the Masonic Hall, an address was given by Sir Robert Stout on "Theology and the Universe," and the report which has reached us added that Sir Robert would in the near future give another address on "The Death of Socrates."

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

THE annual meeting of the trustees of Manchester College was held at the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Thursday afternoon. A report of the proceedings we shall publish next week, but give here some account of the Annual Address of the committee, presented to the meeting. The opening passages were as follows:—

At the beginning of their Annual Address the committee wish to express, not as a mere form, but with sincere feeling, their sense of obligation to the Teaching Staff of the college. The committee congratulate themselves and the trustees on the character, learning, and devotion of all the members of the Teaching Staff, and they thank them most cordially for the way in which they maintain the high traditions of the college, and for the influence which they exert upon the thoughts and lives of the students committed to their care.

By far the most important event of the year is the resignation of the revered Principal of the college. Dr. Drummond wrote to the committee in the autumn stating that, after most serious consideration, it was his desire to withdraw from the active work of the college at the close of the present session, and devote the remaining years of his life to literary work. The committee felt that the decisive tone of the letter did not leave them any alternative in the matter. They accepted Dr. Drummond's resignation, fully recognising at the same time the serious event which had occurred, and the great loss which the college would sustain in many ways through the severance of his long connection with it.

The following resolution was sent to Dr. Drummond:—

"That the committee of Manchester College, in receiving the resignation of Dr. Drummond—the revered Professor of Divinity for thirty-six years and principal of the college for twenty years—cannot but do so with heartfelt regret that the time has at length come for the severance of a connection consecrated, on his part, by service which have been rendered with such true devotion. They wish at once to express their deep sense of the value of his life and work to the college, their gratitude for his unflinching allegiance to its principles, their admiration for his scholarship and saintly life, and their hope that he may long be spared to advance by his writings that catholic and spiritual religion of Christ which during his long tenure of his chair and of the principalship, he has served with so constant a fidelity."

No resolution can convey the feelings of gratitude, affection, and reverence which are so widely felt for Dr. Drummond. He is known and admired at Oxford, and amongst all Biblical scholars, as one of the most painstaking, learned, and impartial Biblical scholars of our time. His friends see in him, further, a man of rare humility, self-effacement, and spirituality. To the students who have come under his influence he must always stand out prominent, not only for learning and faithfulness, but as one of the most Christlike men whom they have known. It is much that they have learnt from him to understand something of the self-denial, the discipline, and the patience demanded by exact scholarship. It is even more that he has taught them by his life and spirit to understand the inner meaning of Christianity, which is, as Dr. Harnack expresses it, "Eternal life in the midst of time and under the eyes of God."

Before it was known that Dr. Drummond intended to resign, some of his old students met together on the occasion of his seventieth birthday, and decided to ask him to allow his portrait to be painted and presented to the college. A committee was formed, with the Rev. V. D. Davis as hon. secretary. It is gratifying to report that Dr. Drummond has agreed to the request, and that a sum of money was at once raised amongst Dr. Drummond's old students and friends amply sufficient to allow of his portrait being painted by Sir George Reid, R.S.A. It is expected that the portrait will be finished next spring, and that it may be presented at the trustees' meeting at the close of the session, when Dr. Drummond lays down the offices which he has filled so long and with such honour to himself and to the college.

The question of his successor and of the various changes involved in his resignation is now occupying the serious and anxious consideration of the committee.

[Since the adoption of this address by the committee the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., has accepted the office of principal of the college.]

Having recorded the losses sustained by the college through the death of friends and supporters, including Mrs. James Worthington, Mrs. Greenhow, Mrs. Wells, Sir Bernard Samuelson, Messrs. John Edward Taylor, H. J. Morton, Charles Harding, T. Smith Osler, John Crompton, J. Cogan Conway, John Warren, of Nottingham, and John Warren, of London, the address proceeded:—

The death of Rev. R. A. Armstrong, one of the Visitors of the college, and one of its most distinguished alumni, took place after the last address was printed. A resolution was carried at the trustees' meeting, in January, expressing the deep sense of loss which the college and the cause of liberal Christianity had sustained through his death. The committee would express the affectionate reverence in which they hold his memory. Time does but deepen in the hearts of all his friends the feeling of how much they and the college and the Free Churches owed to Mr. Armstrong. They will ever remember him as one of the bravest, sincerest, and most devoted servants of truth and righteousness whom they have known. His loss as friend, counsellor, and inspirer in the work and ideals of the college must be long and deeply felt.

The address then reported the acceptance by the Rev. C. C. Coe of the office of Visitor, in succession to Mr. Armstrong, and in a financial statement noted a deficiency of income during the year amounting to £564 3s. 2d. The Permanent Fund of the college, which benefited by the late Mrs. Worthington's bequest of £1,000, stands at £92,228 19s. 11d.

For the session 1904-5 there were nine regular and two special students in the college, and ten external students, working for graduation at Oxford. For the present session the numbers are eight regular and three special students and six externals. The following University honours were recorded:—Mr. J. Park Davies, Prize in Syriac; Mr. M. Rowe, First Class in the Honours School of Natural Science; Mr. R. K. Davis, Third Class in the Honours School of Theology; Mr. R. J. Hall, Third Class in the Honours School of Modern History; Mr. E. J. Pickering, an Exhibition of £30 from Exeter College for his general work.

Satisfaction was expressed in the continuance of the arrangement by which one student in turn spends the week-end during term at Mansford-street with Mr. Gordon Cooper. No better sphere for initiation into mission work could be found.

The Dunkin Lecturers for the past year were Professor Henry Jones, of Glasgow, during the Michaelmas term, on "Working Hypotheses of the Science of Social Life"; and Professor Patrick Geddes, during Lent term, on "Civics as Concrete Sociology."

During the current year the Dunkin Lecturers are Professor James Seth, of Edinburgh, for the Michaelmas term, on "The Principles of Social Ethics: Individualism and Socialism"; and Professor J. S. Mackenzie, of Cardiff, for the coming Lent term, on "Humanism."

The Tate Lectures for 1904-5 have been given by Rev. L. P. Jacks, M.A., in accordance with the arrangements by which he is Tate Lecturer as well as Tutor in Philosophy. They include (a) a course of lectures of a practical character in pulpit rhetoric. (b) Conferences with the students on practical questions connected with the Ministry. (c) A short course on Pastoral Theology, intended to show the application of the central truths of religion to the needs of daily life. (d) Attendance at the weekly preaching exercises of the students, followed by private conference with the preacher.

The Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, M.A., Hibbert Lecturer in Ecclesiastical History, during the autumn, 1905, gave a course of six public lectures on Sunday evenings, in the large lecture-hall, entitled, "Chapters in the Religious History of England." The subjects were as follows:—"Church, King, and Pope," "Monks and Friars," "Wycliffe and Oxford," "Cross-currents of Reformation," "The Settlement of the Church," "Nonconformity and Separatism."

Grateful acknowledgment was made to Mr. Addis for his untiring devotion to the interests of the students, both as teacher and head of the residence, and on his report of unexpected difficulties which had arisen as to the legal position of the Hall, it was said:—

The difficulty to which Mr. Addis refers in regard to the license of Addis Hall is a purely technical one, and is one for which he is not in the slightest degree responsible. There has been no change since the license was originally granted in the arrangements relating to the Hall. It is simply that, although when the license was granted the Vice-Chancellor who was then in office, considered that the arrangements sufficiently complied with the University statutes to warrant him in granting the license, the present Vice-Chancellor regretfully intimated that he did not consider that the arrangements did satisfy the conditions of the statutes, and asked that the license should be surrendered. Under these circumstances Mr. Addis and the committee agreed that it was desirable to surrender it. In the case of students who have taken their degree at Oxford, the loss of the license will make no difference whatsoever. In the case of the men who have taken their degrees at some other University, an arrangement can be made by which they will be affiliated with the non-collegiate students, so that they will be able to avail themselves, as at present, of all the advantages of the University.

The address concluded :—

The centenary of Dr. Martineau's birth was celebrated at the college on Monday and Tuesday, May 1 and 2. The actual day for the centenary, April 21, being Good Friday, was unsuitable for a celebration at Oxford. On Monday evening, May 1, a service was held in the College Chapel, the sermon being preached by Dr. Drummond. On Tuesday there was a luncheon in the Randolph Hotel, consisting chiefly of trustees and old students of the college. Speeches in honour of Dr. Martineau were delivered by the president, the principal, and by Mr. Carpenter and others. On Tuesday evening a soirée was held in the college, at which an address was delivered by Professor Henry Jones on "The Philosophy of Dr. Martineau." The address has since been published, and will be felt by all to be an important contribution to the understanding of the present relation of Dr. Martineau's thought to current philosophy.

In conclusion, the committee would appeal not only to the Free Churches, but to all interested in liberal religion, for a more zealous support of the college and a fuller recognition of the work which it is called upon to perform. The committee are confident that in these days of widening thought the opportunity for the college is larger and more important than ever before. One of the great needs of our time is for unpledged, earnest religious scholars, students, and preachers. Manchester College offers a training for such men in one of the greatest intellectual centres of the world. By its freedom from all doctrinal tests, by its noble religious traditions, by the zeal and devotion of its tutors, and by its position at Oxford, it is qualified to do a great and ever-growing work for free religion.

Without haste, but without rest, the college would press on to a complete and more effectual fulfilment of its sacred work, the free "imparting of theological knowledge without insisting on the adoption of particular theological doctrines."

JESUS impressed the world with a new idea of Divine sonship, and left in the hearts of his disciples a sense of grace and truth, of spiritual soundness and beauty, which they knew not elsewhere; and if this ideal became clearer and more potent, after he had passed from their earthly sight, what then? The ideal reveals itself through forms of imperfection and limitation; but it is the abiding reality, the hidden man of the heart, which remains immortal when the clogs and chains of earth have dropped away.—James Drummond.

TOWARDS SOCIAL REFORM.

THE LAND AND THE UNEMPLOYED.

THE discussion of questions like this commenced in your columns by Mr. Millin cannot fail to be productive of good results, for few lines of advance towards social reform offer such possibilities of future improvement in the condition of the people as the solution of the dual problem of the land and of the unemployed.

To take Mr. Millin's last point first, the individual responsibility of each member of the Christian Church to assist as far as possible in thought and action towards a solution of these problems is admitted by almost every one. It seems still, however, a matter of grave doubt on the part of many, whether the Church, collectively and as an organisation, should itself intervene in the matter, and throw the weight of its combined influence in the direction which promises best for the well-being of the community.

I agree with Mr. Millin. I cannot imagine any conception of active Christian duty, which surely is included in the idea of the functions of a church, which would exclude the corporate and united efforts of a body of worshippers to ameliorate and to elevate the conditions of life among their less favoured fellow creatures.

The practical proposals which Mr. Millin advocates are those to which public opinion seems steadily tending as the best measures to ensure two important results, viz., the provision of remunerative work for those who at present are unable to find it, and the relief of the congested population of the large cities. The advantages of farm colonies for land cultivation on these lines are, as Mr. Millin points out, plain, in that this method of providing work provides a market as well, the consumption of a large portion of the produce.

I think that Mr. Millin exaggerates the difficulty of finding a market for the produce not consumed on the spot. He omits to notice that previous experiments of the kind have for the most part depended entirely upon private enterprise, or existing trade agencies, to distribute the produce to the consumer. Any well organised scheme of municipal or national land cultivation should, as a necessary part of the scheme, include a municipal or national organisation of transport and distribution.

A large part of the advantages to be expected from any considerable adoption of Mr. Millin's admirable suggestion would consist in the additional foodstuffs which would be available to cheapen the cost of living to the large portion of the population of the municipalities unable to obtain a sufficient quantity of the necessities of life.

The enormous possibilities in the increase of consumption of dairy produce, of vegetables and fruit, will only be realised when a well organised public system of control and distribution takes hold of the entire business, and does for the consumer of these things what our greater municipalities have already done in the provision of water, gas, and locomotion.

The only point in which I find myself at issue with Mr. Millin is just here. He claims for land cultivation the advantage over municipal workshops, not only because the former provide a market for themselves, but because the latter would "overstock an already fully supplied market." With what necessary of life is the market already fully supplied? What ordinary comfort of life could not find a much larger market if it could be produced at a less cost? Think, for instance, of the number of boots and shoes which would be used were not the price of a sufficient number out of the reach of the purchasing power of large numbers of the community. This point, however, belongs properly to another social reform.

Mr. Millin wisely points out the necessity for differentiation of treatment in regard to differing classes of those who are at any particular time "out of work." Probably it will be found necessary to still further sub-divide them into more than two classes of colonies.

The able-bodied families, who take kindly and rapidly to land cultivation, are obviously benefited at once and permanently by such a scheme. The physically weak and defective, whose conditions of life have disabled them for continuous and exhausting labour, must be gradually brought up to the necessary standard, and out-door life, fresh air, simple diet, and wise control may be trusted to do more for them than almost any other conceivable process.

There remain the loafer and the ne'er-do-weel, the minority of the actual number of the out of work, but the element that looms largest in most speeches and writings on the subject. The difficulty of dealing with this element is immensely increased to-day by the fact that we offer the same remedy to them as we offer the honest and the trustworthy, or to those who are willing to become so. We cannot deal trenchantly and satisfactorily with the shirker and the beggar, until we have placed it beyond possibility of doubt that a man can earn a living for himself and those dependent upon him by means within his command if he will; when we are sure of this, those at either end of the social scale who endeavour to exist by sponging upon the necessities or the good nature of their fellows can be dealt with as they deserve, care being taken that the method of treatment meted out to them should be of a reformatory character.

Mr. Millin's proposals presuppose public ownership of the land upon which the farm colony or colonies are situated. Care should be taken at the same time that the improvement in surrounding land thus created should be secured for the public benefit, and not be allowed to pass into private hands. For this purpose it is well to emphasise the importance of a sufficiently large public purchase of land in the neighbourhood of such an experiment. With this end in view, the promised tax or rate upon land values should offer favourable opportunities, provided power is given to the public authorities to purchase at the assessed price if so desired.

Mr. Millin does not include in his recommendation the cultivation of timber so strongly recommended now by various authorities, expert and otherwise.

An extract from an article on this subject in this month's Contemporary Review by Mr. C. F. G. Masterman may not be out of place here :—"There are 3,000,000 acres of suitable waste land . . . upon some of which experimental planting could be immediately commenced. The work would be performed in the winter months, in just those times when the normal labour market is at its lowest ebb. It would provide a considerable demand for unskilled labour, as well as skilled, and when properly worked would give employment to many thousands of workmen under such conditions as would make for physical efficiency. The Departmental Committee of 1902, presided over by Mr. Munro Fergusson, reported in the United Kingdom a smaller area of woodlands than that of any other European country except Portugal."

Such an undertaking would not show a sufficiently early return to attract private enterprise, but is eminently suitable for a national undertaking.

The experiments already carried out by the Salvation Army at Hadleigh, Essex, in America as reported on by Mr. Rider Haggard, by the New Hollesley Bay Colony, show what can be done on a comparatively small scale.

It is probable that with a public system of cultivating the land, having at its disposal the best scientific advice and able control, the amount of produce of which the land is capable could be enormously increased. Mr. Cadbury recently stated that land in the neighbourhood of Bournville previously producing as pasture land £4 per acre, now under careful spade culture produced £59 15s. per acre. What is done by intensive culture in the Channel Islands, France and Denmark can be read of in "Fields, Factories and Workshops" by Prince Kropotkin.

Very few alterations in the law are required: the rate or tax on land values already alluded to, increased power and facilities to local authorities to acquire land, extended terms for repayment of loans on the security of the land.

The principal requirement is the will and determination on the part of the local governing bodies, and of the people who elect them, to see to it that these measures are pressed forward, and that such powers as are possessed shall be exercised to the full.

What prevents such action and such determination?

Partly ignorance of the extent to which unemployment exists. This can be ascertained now by reference to the registers being kept by the Distress Committees already established in the large towns, and by an examination of the trade union payments for out of work benefit, and also by visits to the assemblies of unemployed workmen, which in most of our large cities are very frequently held.

Nor is this evil confined to the artisan or labouring classes, as any employer who has occasion to advertise for assistance in his office can testify, and the constant crowd searching the advertisement columns at the newspaper offices will show.

The reluctance to act is also partly due to the fear that public enterprise will in some way merely displace labour already employed, and so not cure, but merely shift the evil.

Careful consideration of the problem will, I think, show that the unemployed exist because of a lack of purchasing power on the part of a large number of the population. Any increase in the purchasing power of the people by an increase in the home production of foodstuffs, by the improved earnings which would be possible when the surplus labour always available to an employer was profitably engaged elsewhere, and by a fairer distribution of the produce of labour among the workers, must result in such an increase in the purchasing power of the many as would not only occupy those at present employed under private enterprise, but immensely increase the demand for labour.

Mr. Chiozza Money in his recent book, "Riches and Poverty," estimates the income of the United Kingdom in 1904 at £1,710,000,000, distributed amongst 43,000,000 people, of which he says 1,250,000 persons take £585,000,000 and 5,000,000 persons, including the previous number, take £330,000,000. A fairer distribution among a much greater number would raise the whole level of condition of life, and consequently the fructifying influence of purchasing power which has been produced would pass back again to those who produced it.

The indicated change in the substitution of public for private ownership of land on a large scale, and the public employment of those left stranded by the present system of private ownership of land and capital, might be expected to accomplish this gradually and effectively—at least it is worth trying. The nation cannot much longer allow the conditions of life which exist in its midst to continue. The civic if not the national conscience is awake; the sufferers themselves are becoming conscious of the improbability of their conditions. The combined effort will produce results which will compel action.

We shall be wise if we deal with the dual problem at once and together lest a worse thing befall us; and there are hopeful signs that legislators and administrators only want to see their way to adequate public support.

In the series of "Homeland Reference Books," "Where to Live Round London (Southern Side)" are some charming pictures, and there is a chapter on the geology and subsoils by Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, F.G.S. (Homeland Association, 22, Bridelane, Fleet-street, E.C. 1905. 1s. net.)

THE Rev. Odon Löfi, who will be remembered by many of our readers as a student at Manchester College, Oxford, has recently been elected to succeed his father in the ministry of the Church at Bölon, Transylvania. This church has the largest Unitarian congregation in Hungary, numbering 1,800 souls. Mr. Löfi, senior, was an officer of the Kossuth Hussars during the War of Independence in 1848—1849, and distinguished himself in many battles. He has been 52 years in the ministry, 47 of which have been spent in the charge which he has just relinquished. He is now 81 years old and, we are glad to learn, enjoys good health. Fellow believers in England will wish the aged warrior and preacher peace at eventide, and will wish his son God-speed in following in his footsteps as minister at Bölon.

ON AN UNEMPLOYED RELIEF COMMITTEE.

I.

As an illustration of the way in which charitable effort seeks to supply the need of a national treatment of the problem of unemployment, the following account may, perhaps, prove of interest.

The Committee, concerning whose work the present information is supplied, was called into existence by the distress which ensued as a result chiefly of discharges of employees from H.M. Dockyard, Chatham. About 2,300 men were turned off, who, with wives and children, brought the number of persons affected to 10,000.

The facts I have been able to glean through my work upon this Committee largely confirm the validity of the predictions made by students of labour questions regarding the results of such discharges. Observations have been tabulated with sufficient care to enable one to foretell, upon the basis of knowledge of the kind of work a man performs, how long a period he will endure after losing work before he needs assistance.

Thus, an unskilled labourer comes to the bottom in nine or ten days. Then the Sunday clothes have to be pawned; afterwards, the furniture is sold, and in very few weeks the family is beggared. So close to the margin do they dwell, who live from hand to mouth. An ordinary mechanic will endure six weeks to two months, though here, as everywhere, the more sober and thrifty hold out longer.

Nothing has astonished me so much as the rapidity with which this descent in the social scale is made. Among the cases I have visited I have observed the various steps in this painful retrogression from the date of possession of the first pawn ticket to the day of eviction for arrears in rent; and from that to the stage when husband and wife, with their bundles under their arms, call to wish me good-bye, having "taken to the road."

I dare not trust myself to expression of my sentiments upon the callousness of the past governors of the richest nation in the world, who, in face of these facts, over and over again reported, dare not risk the inevitable conflict with vested interests involved in a radical solution of this economic problem. My experience has at least interpreted for me something of the frenzy with which social reformers contemplate the imbecility of those who ask to be entrusted with the privilege of seeing to the prosperity and happiness of this nation, yet allow to run to waste the splendid animal energy (to put it at its lowest value) of thousands of our producers who are ready to give their brawn and vigour in return for so little. In this great naval and military centre the contrast between the honour paid to trained destroyers and the neglect of trained producers has been somewhat forced upon one's attention.

Of the unemployment in this district, it is to be related that it comes about as an indirect consequence of war. Without entering into the merits or demerits of the South African War, it is easy to understand that the Government responsible for spending two hundred and fifty millions in that terrible undertaking, were under necessity of economising somewhere, and one method was to lessen the work carried on in the Dockyards, which involved the dismissal of a large portion of the workmen. The least we had a right to expect, therefore, was that an employer's consideration for the men he has to discharge be shown. If, on behalf of one section of the community, the nation could be plunged into an expensive war, it was a legitimate expectation that something should be done on behalf of those who suffered through this belated policy of economy. But the Government turned a deaf ear to every appeal. Opportunities of work, obtained by opening up the mines in the Transvaal, were offered to loafers in the Chinese seaports, but there was no room for respectable British workers in enforced idleness at home.

It is to the credit of the Labour Representation Committee in Chatham that its members were the first to draw attention to the condition of things in this district. In April, 1905, they opened their room as a Registry, where the workless might have their names and trades, and number of dependants registered. Over fifty kinds of occupation are to be found upon this list, though the major portion of cases, as always happens, consists of general labourers. A public meeting was convened, and a Relief Committee formed, who made an appeal for funds, and invited among the roll of workers representatives from all the charitable organisations and friendly societies. This Committee will shortly cease to exist, the cluster of towns on the Medway, of which Chatham is the centre, having adopted the Unemployed Act of 1905, and co-opted members from this Committee to assist the municipal bodies in carrying out its provisions.

Each town had its own Committee, the members of which divided the sphere of their labours into districts, and it was the business of every member to investigate the nature of the cases registered or reported; and, if satisfied of their genuineness, to give relief. No money was tendered, but cheques or vouchers were made out in the name of the recipient, in return for which bread and groceries to the value specified could be obtained from accredited dealers, whose names were also written by the visitor who signed the voucher. When I state that these cheques were mostly of the value of one or two shillings, the precautions taken against imposture may seem extravagant; but the amount of the funds collected (which allowed only the expenditure, for three towns, of £40 a week, among about 600 selected cases of the most deserving) and the deep sense of their responsibility to the public in the administration of the money entrusted to their care, made the investigators most careful in their distribution.

We had not the power to relieve all deserving cases. Single men without dependants were reckoned outside our jurisdiction. And out of the 800 cases registered in Chatham alone (apart from the adjacent towns and city of Strood, Gillingham, and Rochester) we had to pass by a large number. In the task of discriminating the deserving from the cadger and the loafer, the working men, who formed almost the entire body of our Committee, were most vigilant. I cannot speak too highly of the earnest spirit in which they undertook their task, and the devotion with which they gave up every moment of leisure to this voluntary labour. I trust I have learnt many a salutary lesson in businesslike and efficient methods from contact with them. Indeed, so thorough were their ways of investigation, so keen their insight (one or two were as ready as Sherlock Holmes himself) that we were very rarely "taken in." We had the confidential testimony of the traders who transacted our business, that relief went into proper hands, and to the benefit of the most deserving. If we erred, it was probably on the side of caution and watchfulness. We were, on occasion, veritable griffons on the side of righteousness. A man who might be found to have submitted to a treat of beer, or not to have reported a day's jobbing, or scamped a possibly too arduous task, was most relentlessly dealt with.

Sometimes it happened that when a "job" was obtained for one of our clients he was found unable to perform it through lack of proper nourishment. So closely neighboured are the two tracts, so narrow the line that divides from the unemployed the unemployable.

STATE CONTROL OF EDUCATION.

SIR,—As the subject of religious education in schools is likely to come to the front shortly, a few particulars as to the manner in which the matter has been dealt with in another country may be of interest to your readers.

In Hungary the control of education by the State began more than a century ago. In 1868 elementary education there was made compulsory. At the present time, while the Hungarian State is actually the owner of all the 695 technical schools, it only owns about one-eighth of the primary schools. It also owns about one-half the training colleges and more than half the middle-grade schools.

It makes grants to most of the schools and colleges, and in such cases controls the appointment of teachers, and in all cases controls the teaching.

Hungary, besides having several sub-nationalities to deal with, has also a complexity of religions. In 1900 the statistics of religious bodies were about as follows:—

Roman Catholics	..	9½ millions.
Greek Catholics (two sects)	4½	„
Presbyterians and Lutherans	..	3½ „
Jews and Unitarians	..	1 million

Now, it might be thought from these figures that a serious religious difficulty would have arisen. Although I have travelled much in Hungary and had much intercourse with all classes of the people, I have not heard of any difficulty of this kind. The complete control of education by the State has been attended by the best results. The sectarian idea has been minimised, and the national idea has become supreme. There is no established Church, and consequently no struggle for supremacy and preferential treatment.

Both Catholics and Protestants have schools under their own management, subject to State control. In these the scholars are generally all Protestants or all Catholics.

In the primary schools owned by the State the children are of various religious denominations, and all receive similar instruction in secular and ethical subjects.

But religious instruction is not neglected. Ministers of all the churches regularly visit the schools, and impart religious knowledge at convenient times. The Rev. N. Jozan, Unitarian minister at Budapest, gives religious instruction at stated times to all the children of Unitarians in that city, and he regards this as the most important part of his ministerial work.

In some of the schools Unitarian children are sufficiently numerous to form a class by themselves. From schools where the number of such scholars is small, concentration at one school, conveniently central, is easily arranged and carried out.

I have visited nearly all grades of schools in Hungary, and have been much pleased with the intelligence, order, and cheerfulness which prevailed, as well as with the course of studies. I may add that I have had the pleasure of giving in several schools lessons in Tonic Sol-fa, which may lead to a wide diffusion of this method of teaching singing.

In order that apprentices and other young people who are at work during the week should not be deficient in useful knowledge, they are assembled for two hours on Sundays for instruction in secular subjects.

On a Sunday morning, a few weeks ago, quite unexpectedly, I visited a school where the students were engaged in practising advanced geometric drawing under the guidance of a skilful teacher, and much good work was being done.

My impression is that in nearly all the Sunday-schools in Hungary attention is confined to secular subjects.

This seems to show that our Hungarian friends fully recognise the great importance of a thoroughly good education.

Owing to their intelligence, the influence of the 4½ millions of non-Catholics is much greater than the numbers would suggest. It is true that Hungary has its troubles, but they do not arise out of theology or religion. The State does its duty to the various religious bodies apparently in a way which satisfies all. As an example, I may mention the State Houses of Correction for juvenile offenders; they are five in number, all managed on a similar plan. The State does not leave the matter to chance philanthropy, which in this country is generally dominated by theological bias.

These Houses of Correction are models of their kind. The inmates are called boarders, and are grouped in families of twenty under a head who is charged to practise and inculcate kindness, love, and courtesy all the time. The boarders are taught various trades, and are allowed games and gymnastic exercises, and receive excellent instruction in history, mathematics, natural history, physiology, physics, chemistry, music, and several other subjects. At Kassa, a few months ago, I visited one of these institutions, and was much interested and edified with all that I saw. The boys at their work appeared happy and contented; the buildings were spacious, light, and airy, and the surrounding grounds were beautifully kept. The Catholic chapel, the Protestant chapel, and the synagogue are in good architectural style, and the interiors are beautifully decorated. I found that religion and morality were systematically taught by four chaplains or pastors at stated times, according to the several religions of the boarders. Not only are the heads of families charged with the moral teaching of the inmates, but the State prescribes forms of prayer which are to be used by each boarder every day, on rising and going to bed, before and after study, and before and after meals. The use of these prayers is incumbent upon all, irrespective of creed, and they are therefore framed so as to represent general rather than special religious ideas, and particularly those which appeal most to the young. As a specimen I give a translation of the prayer before study:—

"Bless us, O Almighty Father, and influence our minds so that we may profit by what our master teaches us, to the greater good of our souls, so that we may understand and lay hold of it, and also become by it children more worthy of Thy compassion, O our Heavenly Father. Amen."

Respecting the practical results of this excellent system, it is stated that from the Kassa home during the three years of its existence 36 boarders have been discharged. With regard to 72.23 per cent. of these, it has been ascertained that the subsequent conduct has been "good," and only 10 per cent. "bad." As the conduct of all must have been bad at starting, this result amply justifies the means employed.

It must, at any rate, be interesting for us to see that the system of State regulation even of religious teaching works smoothly and yields good results; and it is, to say the least, curious that a State which is largely composed of Catholics should prescribe purely theistic prayers and daily ethical teaching. Yet I venture to think that it is in some such direction as this that we shall find the solution of our religious difficulty.

UNITARIANISM AND METHODISM.

SIR,—The paragraph in your last issue referring to Mr. Spedding's proposal to celebrate the beginning of that "Methodist Unitarian Movement," which gave rise to our churches at Clover-street, Rochdale, and at Padiham and Newchurch, has moved me to remind your readers that there has been at least one other "Methodist Unitarian movement" which is well worth remembering—I mean, of course, the "Christian Brethren" churches, which came out of the Methodist New Connexion in 1841.

The name of Joseph Barker no doubt excites mixed feelings in those Unitarians who know anything about him; but just as Joseph Cooke's expulsion from the Wesleyans in 1806 led to an accession of strength to Unitarianism in Rossendale and Rochdale, so the expulsion of this other "Joseph" from the Methodist New Connexion in 1841 brought a number of churches over to our body, not three only, but many more, for it is recorded that nearly thirty Methodist societies, with about 4,000 members, left the Connexion along with Barker at that time. These took Barker's open "Christian" position, as against anti-Scriptural creeds and dogmas, many of them soon to realise that their new position theologically was identical with that of the Unitarians, and some of them, like those of Mossley, Mottram, and Pudsey, remain associated with the Unitarian body to this day. They called their people "Christian Brethren." They came by direct descent from John Wesley's great movement. The Methodist New Connexion was a split from original Wesleyanism in 1797 under Alexander Kilham, soon after Wesley's death. I am collecting information concerning this "Christian Brethren" secession, so as to preserve a record before some of the evidences are hopelessly lost. I shall be glad to receive assistance in the possession of any who read this note.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Aberdare: Highland Place.—The annual distribution of prizes to the children of Highland-place Sunday-school took place on Thursday evening last week. The proceedings commenced with a tea, a number of the ladies presiding at the tables. A meeting followed, the chair being occupied by Mr. J. L. Rowlands, Councillor L. N. Williams, of Cae-od, distributed books to the children for faithful attendance at the Sunday-school. He delivered an address brimful of interest and advice to the children, and remarked that he was exceedingly pleased that the average attendance at the Sunday-school for 1905 was much higher than in previous years. At the close Mr. J. W. McEwen delivered a brief address, after which Mr. F. W. Hall proposed, Mr. D. Davies seconded, and Mr. Howell Howells supported, a hearty vote of thanks to Councillor Williams for his work in distributing the prizes.

Birmingham (Appointment).—The Rev. Thomas A. Gorton has accepted a unanimous call to Moseley Unitarian Church, and has entered upon his ministry.

Bristol: Lewin's Mead.—The Rev. A. N. Blatchford's annual address on "The Dead Year: Its Memories and Lessons" is published in the Western Daily Press of January 15. In the record of those whom death had called away, after speaking of Sir George Williams and Dr. Barnardo, Mr. Blatchford continued:—"And even as I speak I catch with my mind's eye the earnest gaze, and through the chambers of memory echoes the well-remembered voice of Richard Acland Armstrong, my fellow-student, my brother-minister, my friend. If ever man strove valiantly to arouse his fellow citizens to manly and worthy social and public life, it was he. No one set himself with a nobler or a more persistent resolve than he to fight the battle of good against evil in the streets and parlours of Liverpool. He rebuked sin, he did curtail the sweep of its dark monarchy, and the life of that great northern city is the sweeter and the worthier for Armstrong's words and deeds. A life strenuous in its labour for the moral elevation of his brother men, a spirit aglow with the consciousness of God, and with the love of God, and a mind clear and strong for the commendation of such thoughts to every earnest seeker after God—these are the noble memories that cling to my old friend's name, and which hallow the quiet resting-place of him who spoke and wrote so well and so persuasively concerning 'God and the Soul.'

Cefncoed.—The anniversary was celebrated on Sunday and Monday, when the Revs. R. J. Jones and Dr. Tudor Jones officiated at the four services, and the chapel was well filled. The Rev. J. Hathren Davies has been minister at Cefncoed since 1887. The congregation is flourishing, and the Sunday-school averages 150. On the Sunday before the anniversary the deacon of a neighbouring chapel warned the people not to attend, but the minister repudiated his deacon's suggestion, and himself attended and took part in the Monday evening service.

Halifax (Resignation).—The Rev. F. E. Millson has announced to the congregation of the Northgate End Chapel his resignation of the charge, which he has held for thirty-four years. Mr. Millson's resignation is to take effect at midsummer. In his letter to the congregation he said:—"It is not easy for me to think of separation from friends who have treated me so kindly as you have done, so many of whom have been such active helpers of the work of our congregation at Northgate End, but my advancing age and my belief that the interests of our work call for more service than I can give have led me to the decision which I now announce to you."

Ilford.—Under the title of "Liberal Religious Thought," a series of services have been commenced at the Central Hall, Seven Kings, a central position for Unitarians in Ilford, Seven Kings and Goodmayes, the latter two rapidly growing districts. The opening address was given by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards (to whose exertions the commencement of the services are due), upon "The God we Worship." Last Sunday evening the address was by the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones, of Woolwich, on "The Christ we Love." In spite of the pouring rain, the first service was well attended, and on Sunday last the attendance improved a good deal. Considerable enthusiasm is being shown by the Unitarians of the district, who hope to build up a permanent congregation in the district. A committee, with Mr. E. R. Fyson as chairman and Mr. Walter W. Welford as hon. secretary, has matters in hand, and is promoting a social evening at an early date, to enable those attending to get to know each other. Mr. Welford will be glad to give any information required. His address is 61, Mansfield-road, Ilford.

London: Bermondsey.—The scholars' annual party and prize giving was held on Wednesday, January 17. About eighty scholars sat down to tea and rose up to play. After the games, those whose attendance had been good during the previous year were rewarded with gift books, the presentation being made by Mrs. Ginever after she had delivered a beautiful address on the small plain duties faithfully performed, which go to form a noble character as a goodly edifice built up of small plain stones.

London: Islington. (Presentation).—An event of much interest connected with Unity Church took place on Tuesday, January 9, when a testimonial was presented to Mr. J. T. Mackey upon the completion of twenty years service as superintendent of the Sunday-schools. A large company of friends, including past and present teachers, assembled in the schoolroom to do honour to the occasion. The Rev. E. Savell Hicks, who presided, said twenty years was a long time to look back upon, but it was a very much longer period since Mr. Mackey became a scholar in Carter-lane Schools nearly fifty years ago. The memory of the services accomplished by his patient and devoted labour during those many years, made all feel that some acknowledgment should be made, and the testimonial had been subscribed to by eighty friends of all classes. The presentation consisted of a portrait of Mr. Mackey in oils painted by Mr. W. Savage Cooper, and a time-piece. Mr. Hicks concluded by reading the address from past and present teachers and scholars of the Sunday-school and other friends, which accompanied the gifts. Mr. Gore, on behalf of the teachers and scholars, Mr. Alfred Wilson, as treasurer of the church, Mr. F. L. Sargent, as secretary and president of the Young People's Society, and Mr. Harold Wade, as an old teacher, all added their testimony of admiration for Mr. Mackey, more than one speaker referring to the help his cordial friendliness had been in welcoming people at the door of his church. The portrait was unveiled and the presentation made by Miss Preston, who had been a teacher in the old Carter-lane days, and said she had known Mr. Mackey from a boy. Mr. Mackey, in gratefully accepting the gifts, recalled old memories, and spoke of two friends, Miss Preston and Mr. Frederick Nettlefold, as specially connected in his mind with the early days, when they were teachers at Carter-lane. What he had done in the school, he said, had certainly been beneficial to himself, and if it had been helpful to others he was amply rewarded.

London: Lewisham.—Professor B. Nath Sen addressed an appreciative audience of about a hundred on "Some Indian Problems of the Twentieth Century" in the Lewisham church on Monday last. While admitting that there is a growing feeling among Indians that they should exercise an amount of self-government in purely Indian affairs, Mr. Sen spoke most loyally and feelingly of the providential contact of Britain and India; both had profited in the past by the union. But India is different to Canada, Australia, and New Zealand in that it has a past, a history, a literature. Unfortunately, Government says it is unable to provide money for education even in the primary schools. Now that the Russian danger to India, real or imaginary, is over, because of Russia's crippled condition at home, our position in Thibet and our alliance with Japan, could not some of the money which is at present spent on the maintenance of the army to suppress rebellions which do not take place, be spent on that incomparably more profitable investment, education? Professor Sen said England's higher duty to India was to attack the moral, social, and spiritual problems, and he was convinced that the educated British would see justice done. The questions of caste, marriage, and the position of women were ably dealt with, and the lecturer made an eloquent appeal for sympathy with India in her struggles and future development which must be through peace only.

London: Mansford Street.—Last Saturday, Jan. 13, the members of the Mansford-street Guild united with other friends in entertaining seventy cripples from the neighbouring County Council School. Forty visitors and a similar number of helpers from the Mission were present. Tea, an entertainment by the cripples and their friends, the mysterious feats of a conjuror, the Sunday-school children's play, and an illuminated Christmas tree with prizes and presents, gave genuine delight, as eyes brimful of mirth abundantly proved.

Loughborough.—On Wednesday, Jan. 10, a service was held to celebrate the re-opening of the organ, and the Rev. W. H. Burgess gave an address from the text "Praise Him with stringed instruments and organs." A recital by Charles Lynn, organist of the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham, followed. A selection of music from Handel, Bach, Wagner, Mendelssohn, and other composers, ably rendered, demonstrated the capacity of the small but sweet-toned instrument, which Porritt & Son, of Leicester, have put in thorough repair. On Saturday the annual Sunday-school tea and prize-giving were held, an enjoyable evening being spent.

THE principle of love, whether exercised towards our relatives or our country, whether manifested in courtesy or compassion, can only become virtue, can only acquire purity, consistency, serenity, dignity, when imbued, swayed, cherished, enlarged by the power of a virtuous will, by a self-denying energy. It is inward force, power over ourselves, which is the beginning and the end of virtue.—Channing.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE second week of the General Election has been not less significant than the first, the counties having gone overwhelmingly with the boroughs for Liberalism. This week's Christian World reckons that by Wednesday evening there were already 130 Free Church members in the new Parliament, and that of these 61 (apart from members of the late Parliament) have captured seats from Conservatives. Among the new members are Mr. J. T. L. Brunner, son of Sir John T. Brunner, Bart.; Mr. Wentworth Brooke, son of the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke; and Mr. Percy Alden, formerly Warden of Mansfield House, Canning Town.

On Tuesday afternoon, February 6, a meeting will be held in the Council Room, Essex Hall, to bid farewell to the Rev. W. Tudor Jones, Ph.D., and Mrs. Jones, on their departure for Wellington, New Zealand, where Dr. Jones will become the minister of the newly formed Unitarian Free Church. Tea at 5 o'clock. The proceedings are to be over by 6.30 p.m.

WE publish this week a delightful article by the Rev. S. Farrington, who, with Mrs. Farrington, is spending some weeks at Rapallo, on the Riviera, south-east of Genoa. If any friends are asking for his address, the last we have from him is Hotel Miramare, Rapallo, Riviera di Levante, Italy.

THE present series of performances at the Court Theatre of "The Electra" of Euripides, as so beautifully translated by Professor Gilbert Murray, must be full of charm and interest to all lovers of Greek drama or of English poetry. Professor Murray's name sufficiently vouches for the accuracy of the rendering; and as to the quality of the verse none with an ear and a soul need be in doubt. The play is staged with a simple beauty, for which we are very grateful, and which serves as relief to a mind at times almost overwhelmed by the terror of the action. The acting is interesting, and in places true and strong, though the spectator is left to feel how superlatively difficult it is for the modern English actor to represent the whole tragic power of a bygone tradition and civilisation. But if there is some incompleteness here, and if the speakers of the drama are not always audible throughout the auditorium, there is still much to give us gladness in this too infrequent opportunity of witnessing the action of that appalling complication of fate and human passion which led up to the death of Clytemnestra.

ALL the spirit and the insight and the skill of Euripides are here. That pervading spirit of sympathy for the weak, that love of the lowly, which so justifies the comparison of the Greek dramatist with the Russian Tolstoy, and which sets the peasant husband of Electra before us in so attractive and magnanimous a figure; the cunning reading of the soul which can touchingly portray the oncoming madness of Orestes. But the central figure of all is, of course, Electra. We admire, if admire be not too cold a word, her loyalty to her father's memory. We flinch at the unrestrained and petulant lament over her own wrongs. We shudder as at a thing we barely understand when she grasps so sternly the keen flashing sword. We protest against the doom wrought on Clytemnestra though we cannot altogether deny the conclusion of the chorus—

"Yet hast thou justice, justice plain
For a sire's blood spilt of yore."

BUT the deed is done. Our sympathy cannot withdraw from the brother or the sister, matricides though they be, for Orestes has learnt at last—

"But the deed is anguish clear;
And the gift long nights of fear," and Electra—

"What clime shall hold
My evil, or roof it above?
I cried for dancing of old,
I cried in my heart for love.
What dancing waiteth we now?
What love shall kiss my brow
Nor blench at the brand thereof?"

And so we move to the dramatist's bold conclusion. The deed done is evil, and brings its curse, yet also its austere blessing. By the evil deed the evil of the heart is purged, for—

"Now is thine heart made clean within That was dark of old and murder fraught."

We must not stay to discuss the intricate moral subtlety and truth of the conclusion. We part from Electra the terrible, "soft-eyed at last." The glorious music of the poetry in which all is wrought rings still in our ear, and the certainty is confirmed in our heart that no judgment of wrong is true till it is touched with an infinite pity.

THE London Sunday-school Society, it will be seen from the letter of Mr. R. A. Wooding, the hon. secretary, is again taking up the Country Holiday work on behalf of the children in their schools. Mr. Wooding describes the method to be adopted and asks for subscriptions as early in the year as possible.

WITH reference to the passage in the Manchester College report, which we published last week on the licence of Addis Hall, a correspondent, writing apparently quite seriously, asks what licence Mr. Addis has surrendered, and thinks that "the Unitarian and Temperance public should be fully informed on this point." That public may have a quiet mind, for there is no question of licensed victualling, only of the status of a private hall, as recognised by the University authorities.

OF Mr. G. J. Holyoake, who died last Monday at Brighton, the Rev. Priestley Prime writes in another column. Tuesday's Tribune contained a memoir and appreciation by Mr. A. E. Fletcher, which concluded as follows:—"To a friend who visited him in his last illness he cheerfully quoted Landor's well-known remark, 'I have warmed both hands at the fire of life, and am ready to depart.' A braver champion of righteous causes than George Jacob Holyoake has not arisen in our time, and his death removes from us one who loved and tried to make others love all that can help us to become larger-souled and larger-hearted men."

A BURIAL SCANDAL.

A PAINFUL and unusual incident arose in connection with the interment at St. Mary's Church, Penwortham, on Thursday, the 18th inst., of the cremated remains of Richard Percival Walton, solicitor, of London, and only son of the late Mr. H. C. Walton, a well-known and highly respected Preston auctioneer.

The Walton family for several generations have been interred at Penwortham, for a long time in the church and subsequently, commencing with the deceased's father, in the churchyard. The late Mr. H. C. Walton became connected with the Preston Unitarian congregation, and for many years was its leading member. On his death the service was taken in Penwortham Church by the Church of England clergyman and at the graveside by the Unitarian minister.

About seven years ago his daughter died, and her remains were cremated, the burial service read over the ashes in Penwortham Church by the present vicar, and the service at the open grave taken by the Unitarian minister.

In remembrance of the long connection of the Waltons with Penwortham, a stained-glass window was subsequently placed in the church by the late Mr. R. P. Walton and his mother.

The late Mr. R. P. Walton, who was fifty-three years of age, and a trustee of the Preston Chapel, died in London a few days ago after a long and agonising illness; and to carry out his father's wish his cremated remains were brought to be interred in the grave at Penwortham, the same procedure to be followed as in the case of his sister.

The curate, in the absence of the vicar, was seen by the undertaker, and arrangements duly made for this purpose.

About 12 o'clock the funeral party, including the deceased's mother, arrived at the church. The weather was cold and rain fell in torrents. After a very long and painful interval of waiting in the church, which had been heated for the occasion, it appeared that the curate had failed to keep his appointment. The Unitarian minister at Preston, the Rev. Chas. Travers, after consulting with the executor of the deceased, proceeded to the lectern and read the service he usually reads at a Unitarian funeral, and then took the usual service at the graveside.

The sexton then took him to the vestry and asked him to sign the register. On the ground that he had no right to take the service in the church, he declined to sign the register unless in the presence of the vicar or curate.

It appears that the curate, the Rev. T. F. Douglas, subsequently signed the register. The vicar, the Rev. A. M. Winter, sent a note next day to Mrs. Walton, regretting that she had been kept waiting for the curate, and hoping she had not suffered by the inclemency of the weather. The curate wrote to Mr. Travers:—"Though I gave a kind of consent to read the Lesson, I thought, on further consideration of the matter, that, as the interment of Unitarians in consecrated ground is contrary to Church law, I had better not, in the absence of the vicar, take any part in the ceremony, as I had no authority to make precedents. It was my intention to let you know, or rather Mr. Bell (the undertaker) know, but the pressure of parish work among the many sick, and other duties, put it out of my mind till it was too late to do so. I hope you suffered no inconvenience thereby through the great inclemency of the weather."

To a representative of the Lancashire Daily Post the curate had said he did not intend to have anything to do with the funeral, "because it was not a Christian burial." To Mr. Travers's request that he would explain what he meant by "a Christian burial" no reply, so far as we are informed, has been given. The undertaker's account is that proper notice was given to the curate, all the circumstances being clearly stated, and that he made at the time no objection to taking the service.

A complete statement of the case will, we understand, be forwarded by Mr. Travers to the Home Secretary and to the Bishop of Manchester.

GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE.

THE death of George Jacob Holyoake, which, at his advanced age—he would have been eighty-nine in April—can hardly come as a surprise, was peaceful and happy. A long life of arduous effort, working, teaching, lecturing, organising, writing books, and contributing to newspapers, with an abstemious moderation of habit, left him in old age serenely active till within a week or two of his death. He received with interest and great satisfaction the news of the results of the General Election now in progress, so far as they had been made known, and a letter of congratulation to Mr. John Burns on his appointment as a member of the Cabinet expressed his keen delight in this recognition of labour, and the accompanying increased influence of working men that is to be expected in the government of the nation.

Though he was the most persistent advocate of Co-operation, the historian of the movement, and of the Rochdale Pioneers, and consistently taught and practised self-help as the means by which personal and general improvement might be attained, he warned co-operators against the delusion that by voluntary association, apart from politics, any secure position could be attained. He dissented from those who deprecated political activity, and who held that their social remedy would do everything for the people, because "the politician, if you do not watch him, will come some day and throw the savings of a century into a sea of imperial blood." Hence his interest in the last in politics, and his quotation in his letter a few weeks ago to Mr. Burns, "Lord, now lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace, according to Thy word: for mine eyes have seen Thy salvation."

One can but briefly recall some of the many stirring events and the long, patient effort of Holyoake's life. He was a Chartist, and one of the lecturers appointed to explain the system of Robert Owen; he was not a systematic or State Socialist, but believed in voluntary association as the social remedy. He was imprisoned at Gloucester for a remark about man's duty to God, which raised a laugh, made in reply to a question after a lecture on "Home Colonies" at Cheltenham. He was the founder of "Secularism," a system which sought to concentrate attention and effort on the attainment of personal and social good in this world by mutual service, organisation, education, self-help—"to substitute the piety of usefulness for the usefulness of piety."

He was closely associated with Mazzini, of whom he gives most interesting memorials in "Bygones," and acted as secretary to the British Legion sent out to Garibaldi in 1861. He was fined £600,000 for having published the Reasoner for years without the Government newspaper stamp, and offered to pay the fine at the rate of a shilling a month. The fine, of course, was an absurdity, and the stamp duty was speedily abolished.

John Stuart Mill said that he was chiefly instrumental in obtaining the Affirmation Act. It was he who suggested the series of Blue Books on the Condition of the Industrial Classes in Foreign Countries, issued by Lord Clarendon, 1870-72.

He was a prolific writer, and the last of his many books, "Bygones Worth Remembering," published last year, is full of reminiscences of men and movements with which he was intimate.

Holyoake was a native of Birmingham, and in early years was connected with Carr's-lane Congregational Chapel, of which John Angell James was minister. But he revolted against the harshness of the "evangelical" creed, and found more congenial associates among the Unitarians. For some time he was connected with the New Meeting Sunday-school, where he taught secular subjects.

A lecture by Robert Owen, which he heard at the Birmingham Institute, increased his doubts, and, being called a "sceptic" by fellow-workmen, he examined the writings of some of the sceptics, and, to his own dismay, at first, found himself in general agreement with them.

Though not in later years a member of any religious body, he has frequently shown sympathy with Free Christians and Unitarians. At the church in New-road, Brighton, he has addressed the congregation from the pulpit and in other ways shown his sympathy with their work and teaching. He has joined in the welcome to a new minister, and with him the Rev. Alfred Hood was, during his ministry, associated in public work, especially in connection with the Co-operative movement.

Mr. Holyoake wrote recently to the Secretary of the Church in reference to Unitarianism:—"Its great doctrine of the Fatherhood of God is the simplest and loftiest conception of Deity extant. There are noble aspirations manifested in other Churches here, but there are retributive misgivings among them that disorder the soul. In my 'Bygones' I have recently described how much I owed to Unitarianism in my youth. Hence I count a town fortunate in which its principles and influence are maintained."

Contrasting the present with the past which he had known, Holyoake was cheerful and optimistic. A short time ago he referred in conversation to the great improvement in general conditions of life that he had experienced since his Chartist days, days of cruel child labour in the factories, of slavery in British possessions, taxed bread, taxed newspapers; days when bequests were confiscated, and men imprisoned, because of theological persecution; when Parliament consisted of landowners, and the universities were open only to members of the Church of England.

He regarded death with calmness, and wrote recently:—"To act according to conscience, and speak according to knowledge, never ceasing to consider what we can do for the service of others, is the one duty which a future life, if it comes, will not contradict."

His directions were that his body should be cremated, and the ashes buried in the Highgate Cemetery, near the graves of his friends George Eliot and George Henry Lewes.

There will be a memorial service on Sunday evening at the Free Christian Church, New-road, Brighton.

PRIESTLEY PRIME.

WE are so accustomed to the treatment of the education question as though it were of merely sectarian interest that it is the more refreshing to find the religious difficulty discussed as a problem of social justice. The dispute, which is so often degraded to the level of a contest for supremacy between the Nonconformist (evangelical) and the Churchman, is thus lifted on to a higher plane by Mr. Frank Lenwood, of Mansfield College, Oxford. Mr. Lenwood foresees the gravest injustice, if the lines of settlement suggested by the present Minister of Education are followed. He fears that by paying State money for "some form of Bible teaching or Fundamental Religion (which latter, heaven forbid, especially if it is likely to galvanise the Free Church catechism into an artificial life) we may put many a strong Churchman into exactly the same position as the old Passive Resister." Mr. Lenwood exposes very neatly a fond Nonconformist fallacy. The Free Churchman (evangelical) argues that the Churchman seeks to teach what is positively false, while he, of the "simple Bible" party, can only be accused of not teaching enough. Mr. Lenwood points out that from the standpoint of the Churchman "Bible teaching" without something more is positively as well as negatively objectionable. And he continues: "I fancy some Nonconformists might be a good deal tested if a Unitarian teacher, in following his syllabus, always insisted on speaking of Jesus as 'this man,' 'this great prophet.' Yet this is all that his syllabus legitimately allows. . . . We must on no account allow simple Bible teaching to be paid for from the rates unless we also allow Church teaching, and the truest principle will be to allow neither."

Ah, if you knew what peace there is in an accepted sorrow!—Madame Guyon.

EUCKEN'S PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION.

IV.—RELIGION AND CHRISTIANITY.

It was pointed out in the third article how, in the various operations of the human mind in its dealings with the world, the superiority of the spiritual life to the things that are known manifested itself. Its superiority was also shown over the ordinary natural life. Problems without end have now presented themselves to the spirit of man. The spiritual life gains its independence by a recognition of this superiority, and it is now held as in its very nature a portion of the highest reality. Man must conceive that it is the highest and most fruitful of all truths or the most deadly of all errors; it is either the work of the divine or a child of deceit and darkness. Such an alternative must present itself to man, and when it does present itself he is on the ground of religion.

Eucken divides religion into two grades—universal religion and characteristic religion. Universal religion deals with the question concerning the reality of the spiritual life—whether an independent spirituality touches directly the life, and whether there is in this a proof of an over-world, whether there is a breaking through the ordinary existence. The investigation, although it is largely the work of reason, does not simply take certain aspects of the life into consideration—aspects of thought or feeling or action—but it holds before itself the whole of the life as well as its connection with existence as a whole. Religion must mean something more than an investigation into the various manifestations of consciousness when these are taken singly. It is on account of the necessity of this wholeness that Eucken calls it universal religion. The starting-point of this grade of religion is not empirical or psychological proceeding from a fragment of the bare individual but noological proceeding from a real spiritual world. The existence of such a world is made clear not by any kind of presupposition or analogy, for the reality is not a matter of any bare speculative idea apart from the activity of life itself in its various manifestations; but reality is the realisation of life and its aspirations together with the conceptions which are formed through the results of such activity. The old conception of religion as being something of the intellect on its logical and speculative sides has to be given up, for in this way a fraction of the self only is present, and that fraction not the most important one. Our truths concerning reality are truths which are formed on the results of the activity of the whole of man's higher nature. Here comes clearly before us the value of Eucken's chief conceptions on the Philosophy of Religion, especially as regards Personality, Energy, &c.

The spiritual life conceives itself, at one and the same time, above the world and in the world, and so passes to the idea of God. How is this idea to be obtained on the ground of universal religion? The reality of the spiritual life must be recognised, it must be held as constituting the very essence of being, for in this way alone is it able to exercise its superiority over against ordinary experience. It is, therefore, the necessity of such a superiority as well as the need of finding a permanent ground for itself that carries the self to the conception of the Absolute. Thus is given to the spiritual self a character of unity, world-superiority, and power. In the province of universal religion the conception of God has this meaning: the idea of an absolute spiritual life, a life which is at the same time above the world and in the world. And, as the chief point in connection with such a conception is the inward presence of the whole, all anthropomorphic ideas as well as all particular ideas must be banished. In all this Eucken's position is far removed from Pantheism. Pantheism ignores the opposition between the world and the over-world, and its weakness consists further in that it has no place for freedom and the ethical handling of things, and in that it gives to the spiritual life a natural character only. Eucken is also removed from a dualism in this place—i.e., there is no cleft, in so far as their natures are concerned, between the spiritual life on the one hand and the Absolute on the other hand. Although the spiritual life is other than the natural world, it has to do its work in that world. He points out that all religious conceptions must work chiefly in three directions. They must be of a pure spiritual inward kind; they must work especially not upon the fact of the development but of the substance of the spiritual life; and, lastly, they must not be limited to a particular province of life but must encompass the whole of existence. The spiritual life, working in these directions, gains new convictions, and these add to the perpetual content of the life. This movement of life, this striving towards the Infinite, this deepest longing towards freedom, this aspiration towards the Eternal, is a movement from unity towards inwardness, towards morality, and towards greatness. The life must ever move in these directions or else it will sink back into its previous natural level. By moving forward, by perpetual striving, it gains the certainty and the nature of its new world. There is no middle way between the two great alternatives, for without religion there is to the life no absolute truthfulness and greatness.

Eucken passes from the level of universal religion to that of characteristic religion. This characteristic religion means the province where dealings take place between man and God in a form of immediateness without the intervention of the world. The chief difference between universal and characteristic religion consists in the fact that in the latter the conception of God comes more prominently forward than in the former. In universal religion reason played a most prominent part in making clear the "grounds" of existence and the content of the spiritual life; in characteristic religion love comes to the foreground and reason moves for the time being to the background. The necessities and demands of love carry the life over the colourless conceptions of the Godhead to a living and personal God who is present in the soul of man, and with whom intercourse can take place as "between an I and a Thou." This religious communion is needed by the soul and is its truest nourishment when it is obtained, for in this manner the new reality which comes clear to the soul is able to hold itself fast against all the dangers and enmities of an alien world which surrounds it. Man and God meet at the deepest point in the soul, and a strength is obtained to take up all the struggles of life with a divine courage and to overcome all obstacles that stand in the way of growth. This, as Eucken points out, is the religion of the spirit. But the reason aspect must not be ignored. There are grave dangers if it is placed on one side—dangers which narrow the conceptions of life and which have the tendency of humanising and particularising the idea of God in a purely subjective sense, thus leaving provinces of truth outside our consideration and therefore outside our experience.

How this characteristic religion transforms things and rises to ever-higher levels is depicted by Eucken in a beautiful manner in his last great book, "Der Wahrheitsgehalt der Religion." He starts with emphasising the truth that a fundamental distinction must be made between the permanent and the transient in Christianity. Christianity is a religion of salvation in a sense deeper than any other historical religion. In it there are great negations and great affirmations. In its negations it allies itself with Buddhism, but in its affirmations there is a distinct difference of nature between these two religions. Buddhism brings forth its great negations, but its affirmations are weak; it has given up the heroism of overcoming the world in an open battle, and so it fails to give its true place to the potency of the spiritual self. Eucken places himself on the side of Christianity, and states that it is at one with what he designates as characteristic religion. Christianity, in this way, is not one religion by the side of another, but the religion of religions, the historical realisation of an eternal truth, the longing which dwells in the human breast realised. It is a religion of salvation in the sense that it emphasises the all-important truth of the raising and the transformation of the life through an immediateness of the divine in the human soul. Christianity thus brings to a clear expression a fact which is found in the depth of the heart of mankind. It is, therefore, not a development or strength of one side of the natural life, but the possession of a new life in the whole. Its central idea is the kingdom of God and the opening of the presence of this kingdom to the soul in this life. This brings about the great-becoming of life through a participation in the divine and through a perpetual call to rise above the natural world and its ordinary existence. On this road the soul gains an ever greater depth and an ever more inward freedom. In this sense Christianity can only strengthen as time passes, for in it is enclosed an eternal truth which all the changes of time cannot destroy.

But Eucken insists that in order to recover the deeper spiritual elements of Christianity, the historical aspects must undergo very great changes. Many are the points which must be changed—indeed, given up, for they belong to a past and modes of thought and expression which are no longer ours. The geocentric and the anthropocentric modes of thought have to be discarded entirely; all the sensuous miracles which present views of the universe and of human life discredited by knowledge must be laid aside—miracles like the birth and the bodily resurrection of Jesus. Eucken points out that this historical aspect of Christianity is alien to its original freshness, and does not belong to its inmost nature; it is a fact of knowledge and not of belief, and all the facts of knowledge are facts brought about by mental conceptions exactly as science has been brought about, and thus cannot possess more than a temporary character. But belief in its legitimate sense can be built only upon the results which bring about an inward movement in our own nature. Whoever gives belief another meaning than this externalises religion and reduces it to the level of sense-impressions. The essence and strength of Christianity are weakened in such a manner, and its eternal nature is in danger of being lost under a load of archaic semi-intellectual notions.

When we pass to Eucken's remarks concerning the person of Jesus as the Christian Church has crystallised it into an immutable dogma we find words of grave warning. How often does he point out that many of the friends of Christianity, without knowing it, are its enemies! The significance of great personalities for religion has been worked out by Eucken in several of his great works, and he does not hesitate to give the superiority to Jesus. In what does this superiority consist according to our author? It does not consist, he tells us, in accepting the dogma of the godhead of Jesus, not in conceiving of a trinity of persons in the godhead, for, as we are told, the divine cannot be limited to one point in human history: it runs through the whole of the world-history, and has been the cause of all the upward movements and conquests of the race. The significance of the life of Jesus rests on something infinitely deeper and truer than wonders of sense and the dogmas of distant days. It rests on the fact that Jesus gave a turning-point to history, brought to the clearness of the shining day what was obscure concerning the deepest life of man. It is not, therefore, in any theories about his person that the value of his life consists, but in the truth that he reached the highest spiritual level possible for man. In this way he is our moral and religious hero. Any other way of viewing him is to place the historical above the eternal, and thus reducing Christianity to a lower level. We thus see in drawing these articles to a close that Eucken's position resembles that of Unitarian Christianity. In the midst of the great difficulties and obstacles with which as Unitarian Christians we have to contend, it is at least to me a matter for rejoicing that on our side in this great liberal movement there is to be found one of the leading religious idealists of the world. We cannot do better in this struggle for the reality of the spiritual life and of a Christianity which can be true to-day than to reflect upon these words of Rudolf Eucken, which are to be found at the close of his address, "Das Wesen der Religion" (The Nature of Religion):—

mediate and original manner and condition of man. In ourselves a higher course of life has been evolved which begets its own contents and necessities, and, through these, governs our actions so far as they place themselves in the service of spiritual tasks. Through this arises an unceasing struggle of man against himself; the former kind of life becomes insufficient and a new one must be worked out—a new one that will lift man beyond himself and will expel all that is petty-human out of the formation of the spiritual life. As this requires changes at every point of our inherited condition, it is then true in the province of religion that much which formerly satisfied all claims will be found too petty and anthropomorphic. Not only must the ideas be changed, the inmost life itself requires a clearing, a purification, a transformation, in order to prevent what is and must remain religious from sinking into the mere subjective and mythological. Here we do not mean easy shiftings but fundamental changes. It is necessary to look at things steadfastly and firmly and to take up courageously the fight for truth. It is easy to see that to many a one this indispensable development will appear at first as a threat and a danger to religion, but it is and it remains perverse to see in changes only dangers and losses and fail to see an inducement and a challenge to a positive development of the inherited condition and to an increase of our own ability. It is by an insight like this into the nature of things that we become superior to all that is hostile and are able to transform the apparent danger into a true gain. The anxious fear of a close touch and of a clear settlement with the movements of the time betrays only cowardice and want of faith. For if it is really our firm conviction that in religion of the Christian kind there exists the deepest and final revelation of spiritual Reality, then casual changes in the work of culture may give us much trouble and care, but to the cause of Christianity itself they can but prove useful, because they place by the side of the struggle the characteristics, greatness, and magnificence in a clearer light.

"The task to-day is to work energetically, to labour with a free mind and a joyful courage, so that the Eternal may not lose its efficient power by our rigid clinging to temporal and antiquated forms, so that that which we have recognised as human may not bar the way to the Divine as that Divine is revealed in our own day. The condition of the present time contains the strongest motives for such work. For once again, in spite of all the contradictions which appear on the surface of things, the religious problem rises up mightily from the depth of life; from day to day it moves minds more and more; it induces endeavour and kindles the spirit of man. It becomes even plainer to all who are willing to see that mere secular culture is empty and vain, and is powerless to grant life any real content and fill it with genuine love. Man and humanity are pressed ever more forcibly forward into a fight for the meaning of life and the deliverance of the spiritual self. But the great tasks must be handled with a greatness of mind, and such a mind demands freedom—freedom in the service of truth and truthfulness. Let us therefore work together, let us work unceasingly with all our strength as long as the day lasts, in the conviction that 'he who wishes to cling to the Old that does not age must leave behind the old that ages' (Runeberg), and that an Eternal of the real kind cannot be lost in the flux of time because it overcomes time by entering into it."

W. TUDOR JONES.

FROM RAPALLO.

CORRESPONDENTS ask, "What are your resources at Rapallo? What is there to see, hear, or do? Are the hills near you wooded? And can you freely roam over them?"

The kindness of THE INQUIRER permitting, let one answer serve them all. Not the least resource is Rapallo itself. It shelters itself snugly in a sharp deep angle of the rocky Mediterranean shore, far, far back from its storm-swept flood. Above it rises a great semi-circle of mountains, which forbid the north wind to come rudely trumpeting down upon it. These mountains, from two to three thousand feet in height, begin to rise directly from the shore itself. One enters, or departs, from the place (unless he comes by boat) only through piercings of the solid rock of which they are built. They are not barren heights, but clad from base to highest reaches with varying shades of evergreen trees, olives, palms, cypresses, yews, oranges, the ilex and the pine. They are also clad from base to summit with human habitations. Very few are the wretched ones among these. Even the labourer's abode has an air of comfort, its little carefully tended garden, with its vegetables, its fruit-laden olive trees, its fig, orange, and cherry trees, and hardy plants or flowering shrubs in bud and flower at mid-winter. While the highly ornate villas of the wealthier families, each founded on the solid rock, crop out one above another from the water's edge nearly up to the line of the blue sky. Each has its extensive, almost park-like grounds, beautifully laid out and cultivated. Each commands some charming prospect. Each tells the tale of its own costliness. The carved marble portals, delicately wrought loggias, long flights of polished steps leading up to main entrances. The decorative work expended on exteriors and, especially, the amount of delicately wrought iron-work that meets the eye in gates, inter-doors, and long lengths of fences, all testify that the Italian is, as he ever has been, a lover of beauty for its own sake. Smug comfort is not enough for him. Having it, he delights even more in those creations which many unhesitatingly pronounce superfluous, useless, a waste of the precious money that might "have been given to the poor." Well, all these features of Rapallo, which the eye rests upon day after day as one walks the roads that run everywhere along the shore, or wind up the valleys amid the hills—these, with the soft, sweet, genial air of the quiet nook—render the place itself a resource of which one is not likely to tire. Before coming we were warned not to remain here too long. If we did, we should become lotus eaters, and have no will to move on. The question has even now become serious—are we not already lotus eaters?

Another unfailing source of interest is altogether indescribable. It is new every morning. By no art or device of man can it be presented as it presents itself. Before one rises from his bed he looks out through the ever open window upon the marvel and rapture of it. Far, far out as eye may see, the blue-grey waters of the bay and of the great and wide sea beyond it, stretch like the polished surface of some vast metal mirror. It is as steel or as silver. A certain solemnity seems to brood upon the broad expanse—born not of light nor yet of darkness—a kind of gloom such as one has felt in the aisles and beneath the arches of some grand cathedral pile. But, even as we look, all along the horizon's line a suggestion of colour appears. It strengthens; its radiance increases. Colours define themselves. No longer one, but many. Some begin to glow as they lie in long horizontal lines quite across the east. What a variety now; and what a splendour! Pink, delicatest purple, dull copper, and copper burnished to utmost brightness, and streaks of gold! In almost less time than we take to tell of it this spectacle has come forth from the Invisible. Now it begins to pale; to be withdrawn. He who inhabiteth eternity has filled our eyes, and fed "all that is within us," with this marvellous manifestation of His power and glory in the dawn of day. But though all the glow and splendour at length are over and gone, the sun itself has not appeared. Several seconds, perhaps minutes, pass; and he has not risen. Then, just as we wonder at his tarrying, he comes rounding up with great suddenness into full visibility, and another day is born. This little delay, and this rapidity of the sun's ascent above the horizon's rim, are novel phenomena to eyes long accustomed to imagine a sunrise somewhere beyond the neighbourly chimneys, and the brooding of chronic fogs. As one sees how fast the king of day rises up out of the Mediterranean, he realises how rapidly this ball of earth rolls over toward the east. The sunrise, varied only, but constantly varied, by subtle atmospheric changes, is a great source of pleasure here, as all along the Riviera are eyes that long and wait for it.

Not far away, too, are quiet places interesting both in themselves and in their history. For hundreds of years they were homes of religious endeavour and experience. The nearest of these, a thirty or forty minutes' walk from Rapallo, is the Valley of Christ—Val Christi. To it the visitor is likely to make pilgrimage again and again. Into this broad, fertile, well wooded valley, flooded by the bright sunlight, abounding with flowers, bearing, in their seasons, apples, cherries, oranges, figs, grapes, and nuts, with a river of water clear as crystal flowing through, there came in the year 1204 a few seriously-minded women belonging to noble families of Genoa reacting and retreating from "the sin of the world." Hither they came to abide in Him who, from his faithful, taketh it away. Here they would hide their lives with Christ in God. No longer, in this tranquil and grateful retreat, would they be of the world, or in it. They built their little church, costly and beautiful as wealth and art could devise. Love spares no labour, no treasure, to outwardly express its devotion to its Lord and King. No labour, no treasure was here withheld. It was indeed a little church, holding not more than twenty or thirty persons. A little church of Christ. From it the whole peaceful valley was soon known as the Val Christi. At one corner of it they built a tall, graceful bell tower, or campanile, with triple-arched windows in its upper story, and all in age-lasting masonry. This campanile is now alone intact. For more than three centuries this religious home flourished; and, as best it could, pursued and attained the purpose for which it was founded. Around it grew dependencies, abodes of those who tilled the earth, and brought from it "the fruits of increase." But the world, by brute force, invaded. For beauty it gave its ashes. Now all lies in utter ruin, and has so lain for four centuries. Only the ivy-clad campanile stands solitary in its pathetic witness to the vanished life of other days. But all such places, where religious persons have lived and died, are haunted places. The sentiment that consecrated this charming spot still is felt. It brings to soul, if not to sense, the high ideal. It still preserves through the ages its breath of poetry; and, after standing long by these ruins, the visitor turns away moved and thoughtful. It is yet Val Christi.

More difficult of access is the sanctuary on the height of Montallegro. The other afternoon I climbed up to it, along a path very steep and rough, in two hours—as stiff a pull as it is good for so young a man to take. It stands something more than two thousand feet above the town. The climb is as interesting as it is trying. The path winds between tall cypress trees, olive groves, ilex avenues, and most venerable pines, giving at every turn a view of land and sea, each broader and better than the last; until, turning round the angle of an obscuring rock, you face the white marble facade, in the Lombard Gothic style, erected so recently as 1896. But the sanctuary itself dates from July 2, 1557. On that day, on precisely this high summit (so runs the accepted scripture) Notre Dame herself appeared to Jean Chichizola, a butcher well known in neighbouring hamlets. Why to him is not obvious. Was it to turn him from his deeds of blood and death? Would she make of the man an apostle of vegetarianism? Rome has not pronounced. But the popular imagination seized upon his vivid statement of the glory then and there to him revealed; and ever since the spot has been holy ground. Barabino painted a graphic representation of the wondrous event; the adoring butcher on his knees, with hands clasped; the Blessed Mother of all goodness on radiant clouds, with cherubs attending. Other pictures adorn the interior of this high sanctuary. Among others, framed in silver, a miraculous one by St. Luke. Another, of The Trinity, in which the artist has clothed that orthodox imagination in an unorthodox manner. Not only are the Father and the Son in human form as we are, but the Holy Spirit as well; whereas, the Latin Church throughout presents the third of its eternal personalities under the form of a dove. But this Montallegro, with its extensive outlook, its deliciously cool mountain air, its hospitable hospice, where small furnished apartments may be had at moderate prices, is not only well worth the cost of the climb, but every day receives interested visitors from the winter sojourners in Rapallo. There are other similar heights; some of much easier access; one higher and more difficult to reach. There is no lack of hill and mountain expeditions.

Last Sunday we came upon an altogether unexpected Rapallo resource. It will probably be one or two thousand years before to anyone it will be available again—the Blessing of the Bells. The old church of San Michele has a new bell tower, up into which, this week, four new bells, silvery-toned bells, such as one does not hear outside Italy, are being lifted and hung. When we saw them on the Friday they were unconsecrated—just ordinary metal bells and nothing more, though beautiful in their modelling even so. But on Sunday the change was wrought in them that a bishop effects when he renders a bit of earth's common crust quite different and distinct from that in which the unbaptised and the dissenting may be buried. Henceforth, in the regard of all resident here, they are different. A thousand tapers have blazed, psalms have been chanted, prayers said around them. The bishop has laid his hands upon them, has signed them with the sign of the cross, has anointed them, has spoken to them in God's name, has seen that they were duly incensed, duly blest. For two hours, with great variety of ceremonial detail, they were converted into consecrated bells. More than a thousand eyes of rich and poor, of high and low, of great and small, witnessed on January 14 this blessing of the bells.

Let me not end by forgetting the flowers everywhere coming into bloom. The great army of them has not yet been marshalled. But jack-in-the-box is popping up beside all paths. Blue campanulas greet you as you go. Clumps of white hellebore abound in open fields, clean as those Christmas roses we can only have at home under glass. Yesterday I saw an almond tree all clothed in purest white. The mimosa is full and heavy with its fragrant yellow balls. Roses, white periwinkles, deep purple iris, and golden gazanias in every garden on this mid-January day. Such, dear friends, are some of the things that make life resourceful and interesting at Rapallo.

SHE doeth little kindnesses

Which most leave undone, or despise;
For naught that sets one heart at ease,
And giveth happiness or peace,
Is low-esteemed in her eyes.

She hath no scorn of common things,
And, though she seem of other birth,
Round us her heart entwines and clings,
And patiently she folds her wings
To tread the humble paths of earth.

Blessing she is—God made her so;
And deeds of week-day holiness
Fall from her noiseless as the snow,
Nor hath she ever chanced to know
That aught were easier than to bless.

J. R. Lowell.

SINCERITY, a deep, great, genuine sincerity, is the first characteristic of all men in any way heroic.—Carlyle.

LENDING OUR MINDS OUT.

"POWER CAME FORTH FROM HIM AND HEALED THEM ALL."

WE are familiar with the effect of body on body. A small-pox patient spreads disease; we say we "catch" this or that ailment. Ingersol says, somewhere, that he wishes we could "catch" health. But people have firmly believed this to be possible. As late as 1745, in England, it was thought that scrofula—"king's evil"—could be cured by the touch of a Royal hand. In the gospel story a sick woman presses through the crowd to touch the fringe of the Master's robe that she may be healed. The lives of the Saints are full of narratives of cure by a touch—by a look. To this day multitudes believe that the very bone of a saint long ago departed from the earth, a fragment of drapery, a footprint on the rock, the water in which holy hands were washed, have power to cure bodily ills—that the laying-on of a bishop's hands will convey the spiritual power that animated apostles; that the eternal welfare of a baby can only be secured by its baptism at the church font. We smile; but it is not easy to draw the line between reasonable belief and superstition. Many things that were accounted follies are found to belong to the world of reality; mesmerism, for instance, has survived ridicule. Is it related to the latest wonder-story of science—that there are such phenomena as "human" rays, that we all emit such rays, that they vary in colour and form according to our moods and thoughts and dominant aims? In the grossest superstition there is an element of truth. The influence exerted, bad or good, is not the influence of matter, but of mind. It was because the king was the representative of God that his touch could heal; it was because the witch was the creature of Satan that her glance could blight and destroy. We ourselves know perfectly well that strength and courage come to us in pain and sorrow by the grasp of a friend's hand, that a look can nerve us to endure, or send us forth, like Peter, to weep bitterly. An acquaintance said to me lately of a mutual friend, "It makes one better to be near Mary"; and a young man, the other day, speaking of his employer, said, "To have five minutes' talk with him is like taking a tonic." These touches of personal experience led me to dwell on those words of Browning:—

"God uses us to help each other so,
Lending our minds out."

God uses us, and often we are quite unconscious, and perhaps then are used to best effect. It is so with the blessed influence of children. Myriads of times has the birth of a child healed heart sores, created love anew, and hope, and forward looking thoughts. Myriads of times has baby innocence put wickedness to flight. I think of that story of Bret Harte's—of the mountain camp of ne'er-do-wells, gamblers, immoral and violent; and how the baby born amongst them made rough men gentle, silenced evil words, and changed evil ways. I think of sham and untruths and deceit that crumbled into nothingness before the questions or the comments of a child; and of Pippa, the little silk weaver of Asolo, whose holiday songs reproved sin, and inspired courage and true love. As she lay down at the long day's end, and thought of the various people in the town, she said, you remember, "Now one thing I should like to know, How near I ever might approach all these;

Approach, I mean, so as to touch them—so As to in some way move them, if you please,

Do good or evil to them some slight way."

This unconscious virtue is for ever going forth from good mothers—so often saints without their knowing it!—meeting with cheerful patience the unending succession of household tasks; mending, making, preparing for meals, cooking, nursing, teaching, cleaning; with resources for every accident and comfort for every misfortune; ready to welcome a neighbour's child into the tiny kitchen; ready to take a turn in sitting up with a sick friend. Not that such blessed fulfilment of love and duty is confined to the poor—but it is perhaps more apparent among these. Very old people are often, visibly, but all unwittingly, "used" by the great God. Their work is done. They wait for the great change. How beautiful is their simplicity, their acceptance of infirmities, their interest in younger lives, and in the movements of the world, and, best of all, their cheerfulness.

The sense of responsibility is, and should be, strongest among men and women in the heyday of their powers. Unless they are mere cumberers of the ground they know that they must help, and not hinder; that, wherever they can, they must give light, knowledge, guidance; that on them depends the welfare of children, scholars, students, the poor, the helpless, the afflicted, the ignorant; that as citizens of their country and the world they are called upon to play their part well for the brief time they are on the stage.

To "lend a hand" is good, but the hand must perish; lend a thought, and it is immortal. When death removes, the mind's work is left. It is the persistent, imperishable force of mind that pushes our race onwards, further and further from the animal, nearer to its God-like destiny. As we trace the working out of the faithful purpose of the Creator in His creation—the evolution of the ape into the angel—we see this has been the means. All progress and civilisation, all advances in the "art of living together," have come by inheritance of knowledge, ever increasing in its sum as the generations pass.

"The thoughts of men are widen'd by the process of the suns."

"God uses us to help each other so,
Lending our minds out."

"Two men I honour, and no third. First, the toilworn craftsman, that with earth-made implement laboriously conquers the earth, and makes her man's. Venerable to me is the hard hand, crooked, coarse, wherein, notwithstanding, lies a cunning virtue, indefeasibly royal, as of the sceptre of this planet. Venerable, too, is the rugged face, all weather-tanned and be-soiled, with its rude intelligence; for it is the face of a man living manlike. . . . Toil on, toil on; thou art in thy duty, be out of it who may; thou toilest for th altogether indispensable—for daily bread.

A second man I honour, and still more highly, him who is seen toiling for the spiritually indispensable, not daily bread—but the bread of life. Is not he, too, in his duty, endeavouring towards harmony; revealing this by act and by word through all his outward endeavours, be they high or low? Highest of all when his outward and inward endeavours are one; when we name him artist; not earthly craftsman only, but inspired thinker, who, with heaven-made implements, conquers heaven for us. If the poor and humble toil that we may have food, must not the high and glorious toil for him in return that he may have light, have guidance, freedom, immortality?"

But it is not "the high and glorious" alone who give to men these best gifts. All service ranks the same with God. The statesman who brings the laws of earth into nearer accordance with the laws of God; the reformer, who tries to make the crooked straight; the prophet, the preacher, the poet, who speak forth the word of the Lord; the revealer of things hidden from the foundation of the world, the creators of lovely sounds and lovely pictures, the inventor of appliances for human welfare and comfort, the healer of physical ills, the workman who needs not to be ashamed, all good parents and teachers, every faithful humble soul—these, all, are blessed, being "used" by Him to advance the coming of His kingdom.

Every new generation is richer than the last. There is more thought—stuff—more for minds to feed on and thrive on. No one should "go short." "Lending" implies receiving. There must be willingness to lend—to give—willingness to take, a constant outflowing of experience and help, a glad readiness to be benefited. How pleasant are those pages of Marcus Aurelius in which the great emperor—a sick and lonely man among his legions on the far Danubian frontier—beguiles the hours by recalling the lessons in right living and right thinking he had received as a youth, and pays his debt of generous gratitude.

Here are a few of the passages. He enumerates sixteen persons as benefactors and builders up of his character: "From my grandfather Verus, integrity and command of temper. From the reputation and the memory of my father, self-respect and manliness. From my mother, to be God-fearing and liberal, to check not malicious action only, but each malicious thought; simplicity in daily living, and avoidance of the ways of opulence. Thanks to my great-grandfather, I . . . was supplied with good masters, and learned that in such matters free outlay is no extravagance.

"From my tutor, not to take sides with the Greens or the Blues, the Big Shields or Little Shields; to be industrious, of few wants, and to wait upon myself, to mind my own business and to scout slander.

"From Rusticus I first conceived the need of moral correction and amendment. [He taught me] to be encouraging and conciliatory towards anyone who was offended or out of temper, at the first offer of advances upon their side. He taught me to read accurately, and not to be satisfied with vague general apprehension, and not to give assent to chatterers.

"From Apollonius, to keep free, and to stake nothing on the hazards of chance.

"From Alexander the grammarian, to be uncensorious, not to be carping and severe upon lapses of grammar or idiom or phrase, but dexterously to supply the proper expression, by way of rejoinder or corroboration, or discussion of the matter rather than of the language, or some other graceful reminder or hint.

"From Alexander the Platonist, seldom and only when driven to it to say or write, 'I have no time,' and not to indulge the tendency to cry off from duties arising out of our natural relations with those about us on the pretext of press of business. From my brother Verus, love of belongings, love of truth, and love of justice . . . not to withhold the expression of disapproval and not to leave friends to conjecture what one wanted or did not want, but to be plain with them. From Maximus, self-mastery and concentration, cheerfulness under sickness or other visitations, a pleasant blending of affability and dignity, with unruffled alacrity in the performance of appointed tasks.

"From (Hadrian) my father I learned gentleness and unshaken adherence to judgments deliberately formed, indifference to outward show and compliment, industry and assiduity, and disinterestedness of purpose;" and a long discriminating eulogium follows.

Such an exercise of grateful and reverent memory would be profitable to every one of us. Two other tributes of affectionate recognition of benefits bestowed by mind on mind let me recall: Wordsworth says of his sister:—

"The blessing of my later years

Was with me when a boy;

She gave me eyes, she gave me ears;

And humble cares and delicate fears;

A heart, the fountain of sweet tears,

And love, and thought, and joy."

Helen Keller, shut away from hearing and from sight, still knows herself the heir of all the ages, and can gather in a thousand fields. In her latest book, "My Key of Life," she says: "I remember an hour when I was discouraged and ready to falter. For days I had been pegging away at a task which refused to get itself accomplished. In the midst of my perplexity I read an essay of Stevenson, which made me feel as if I had been 'outing' in the sunshine instead of losing heart over a difficult task. I tried again with a new courage, and succeeded almost before I knew it." To how many souls has Robert Louis Stevenson brought courage and cheer! To how many more will he be a true brother and example? Helen Keller, too, so crippled by sad fortune, has a "mind to lend," a mind happy and serene. Never before in the history of the world has such a voice come from such a prison. "Lift up your burden; it is God's gift; bear it nobly," writes this brave sister, this "more than conqueror."

The wealth of wisdom need be no longer, thank God, the blessing of the few. It is a moving sight to see a multitude of children with books open before them—poverty no longer a bar, the world of thought open to them, the ample page, rich with the spoils of time, unrolled before them, the wise dead speaking still, the great inheritance free to all who care to claim it. It is for parents and teachers to cry, "Enter ye in and possess the good land," and to be leaders and guides. As painters cannot paint well without knowledge and admiration of the work of the great ones who preceded them, as the poet must serve a long and arduous apprenticeship to the singers of an earlier time,—so he who would win new thoughts wherewith to bless the world must sit at the feet of the teachers of the Past. Rooted and grounded in the stored wisdom of the centuries, the plant of life must derive nourishment from present-day air and sunshine and rain, and give to the living beauty, fragrance, and fruit peculiar to itself. We enrich ourselves by giving—

"Since good,

The more communicated, more abundant grows."

If we learn some new wonderful fact about the ordering of the world, let us tell it; if a book interests us, let others know of it; if catastrophe impends, let our minds be "present" and active. We all like those stories of ready wit and helpfulness that appear in the newspapers almost every day: of the schoolgirl who knew that flour applied immediately lessens the anguish of a burn; of the boy who escapes and helps others to escape from fire by creeping along the floor under the stifling smoke; the story of the English ship in danger in a Norway fjord, and the husbands and wives sitting quiet, hand in hand, prepared to die; and of the staying of panic in a multitude by the "lending out" of one mind of courage and resource.

If some reform appeals to us as desirable, let us back it; if some ideal of righteousness is despised and rejected, let us be, among the faithless, faithful found. When a friend suffers in mind or body let us give our sympathy, love, and experience. Let all teachers freely give, let the preachers preach the whole counsel of God. If some aspect of truth seems to us lovely and real, let us urge others to come and see. Let us be faithful to our faith, dear brothers and sisters—live it, love it, lend it! We never know what heart it will bless, what despair remove, what strength and joy impart. We are few; the more need for every one of us to be true and steadfast; and may the Great Giver, "the primal source of all illumination," use us as good tools and instruments, as faithful servants, as dear and understanding children, for the doing of His holy and blessed will!

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THIS is all there is for the Children's Column this week! I should be more sorry, if it was not for the paper by Miss Edith Gittins on "Lending our Minds out," which comes just before.

And in connection with what was said last week about Duty, take this verse of Wordsworth's. Duty he called the "Stern daughter of the voice of God," by which even the stars were held in their true courses; and then he says:—

"To humbler functions, awful Power!

I call thee: I myself commend

Unto thy guidance from this hour;

Oh, let my weakness have an end!

Give unto me, made lowly wise,

The spirit of self-sacrifice;

The confidence of reason give,

And in the light of truth thy bondman let me live!"

A WORTHY SUCCESSION.

THE Annual Address of the Committee of Manchester College, Oxford, from which we published some passages last week, gave the first place in its record of the events of the year to the resignation of Dr. DRUMMOND, and his coming retirement from the office of Principal, which he has held for twenty years, in succession to Dr. MARTINEAU. At the annual meeting, which we report this week, the President and the mover and secnder of the adoption of the address, spoke with much feeling of the coming change, and of the reverence, gratitude and affection in which Dr. DRUMMOND is held by those who have been so long associated with him in the work of the College. The Committee's resolution in receiving the resignation expressed "their deep sense of the value of his life and work to the College, their gratitude for his unfailing allegiance to its principles, their admiration for his scholarship and saintly life, and their hope that he may long be spared to advance by his writings that catholic and spiritual religion of CHRIST which, during his long tenure of his chair and of the Principalship, he has served with so constant a fidelity."

After thirty-six years of teaching as Professor of Divinity, during twenty of which he has been Principal, and at the age of seventy, which, in the University of Leiden, for instance, is set as the fixed limit for their professors' active work in teaching, Dr. DRUMMOND may well claim his release, to secure, as we must hope, some quiet years of unabated strength to concentrate upon literary works of scholarship and religious inspiration, which will be his greatest and most abiding gift to us. We wrote of this on first making the announcement of his resignation, in THE INQUIRER of November 4, and only repeat here our thankfulness that this retirement from active work does not imply any withdrawal of Dr. DRUMMOND from the circle of College influence, where we trust that his will long be a presence revered and beloved, exercising still that quiet personal influence, which has been so profound upon students of successive generations, ministering still to his friends of the things of the Spirit, with the wisdom and grace which have already borne such ample fruit.

Dr. DRUMMOND has brought to Manchester College during its first years at Oxford the distinction of his high scholarship and noble character; and if now we look to the coming time, it is with great thankfulness for those honourable memories, which will remain an abiding possession of the College, cherished the more thankfully because we are so sure that its high tradition will be safe in strong and worthy hands which are to take up the work.

When it became clear that the time for Dr. DRUMMOND's retirement had come, there could be no doubt as to who his successor ought to be, and it was with the utmost satisfaction that the President announced at the annual meeting the Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER's acceptance of the office of Principal. Mr. CARPENTER is no longer a young man. Dr. DRUMMOND was fifty when he became Principal, JOHN JAMES TAYLER was fifty-six; Mr. CARPENTER is sixty-two. Only Dr. MARTINEAU was older, by two years, when in 1869 he entered on that office. He and Mr. TAYLER were each Principal for sixteen years; Dr. DRUMMOND, next June, will have completed twenty-one years of service. We will not attempt to count up in anticipation the years of Mr. CARPENTER's Principalship, but simply rejoice that the College is now to regain full possession of his services.

There is no one whose life has been more intimately bound up with the College. Long before he was born, his grandfather, Dr. LANT CARPENTER, of Bristol, was one of the Visitors of the College, then at York; his two uncles, RUSSELL and PHILIP, were York students; and before he himself, in 1860, became a student of the College in London, seven years of his boyhood had been spent at University Hall, of which his father, Dr. W. B. CARPENTER, was Principal, and where Manchester College also had its residence. Nine years of active ministry followed his student course in London, and then in 1875 he returned to the College as Professor, and for twenty-four years was in full work, the last fourteen also as Vice-Principal. Seven years have passed since his resignation of those offices, years of many occupations and a boundless activity. He has lectured a great deal throughout the country, and has rendered manifold services to the churches. With mission work he has always been in close touch, and in connection both with the National Conference and the International Council has gained a wide and intimate knowledge both of our people and of the present conditions and the possibilities of liberal religious life. And all the while, as Case Lecturer in Comparative Religion his connection with the College has remained unbroken, and his home at Oxford has been, as before, open to the students.

It is not necessary that we should recount here Mr. CARPENTER's achievements as a scholar, in the fields both of the Old and the New Testament, and with special distinction in that of the Comparative Study of Religions. We know him as an inspiring teacher, a devoted and stimulating friend of young men, an administrator of marked ability. His appointment as Principal of Manchester College will command the confidence of the churches, in the training of whose ministers it has so vital a part, and friends of the College will be grateful to Mr. CARPENTER for accepting this trust, and so taking what we must feel to be his natural place in that succession of Principals, rendered illustrious already by the names of TAYLER, MARTINEAU, and DRUMMOND.

WANTED, MINISTERS.

IN the Essex Hall Year Book for 1906 the editor has compiled a list of vacant pulpits, from which it appears that there are at the present time 25 congregations in want of ministers, and 10 other congregations where ministers would be welcomed if it were possible to discover ways and means of paying them a salary. There is also in the Year Book a list of 14 ministers who are open to accept engagements, permanent or temporary; and to these may be added two or three others, who are unfortunately in ill-health, but who may be able soon to resume work.

These figures for a small religious community like ours reveal a state of affairs that calls for serious consideration. It devolves upon the members of our churches, the committees and tutors of our colleges, the managers of sustentation funds, and the administrators of our denominational societies to discover some adequate and satisfactory remedy. It is to Manchester College, Oxford, and the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester, that our congregations should naturally look for a supply of educated, capable, devoted ministers; but anyone who is familiar with what goes on in our circle of churches knows quite well that the colleges do not supply the men wanted in sufficient numbers. There have been years in the history of both institutions when not a single student has gone out from the college to take up ministerial work, and with considerable fluctuations in the numbers, the average has never been sufficient for the need. It is easy to blame the colleges for this defective supply, but in reality the ultimate responsibility rests with the churches themselves. They do not produce, as with greater fulness and energy of religious life they ought to produce, enough men of capacity, ready to devote themselves to the ministry, and in the first instance to fill up the ranks of the student in the colleges.

Meanwhile, what happens? Now and again an orthodox student or minister of high character, ability, and earnestness joins our ranks, and a congregation is soon found for him. Anyone who examines the list of ministers in the Year Book will perceive that we are under deep obligation to men who have entered the Unitarian ministry from the outside. Occasionally, indeed, there is a tendency on the part of congregations to run after the new-comer, to the neglect of men of greater worth reared in our own colleges, and with large experience of the thought and life of our churches.

It is, however, when congregations, owing to lack of knowledge or of means, appoint men who are unfit for the high and sacred office of a minister of religion that mischief is done. The Unitarian ministry has never been a close corporation, and we have no desire to see a rigid standard of educational fitness set up. There are several of our most efficient and devoted ministers who would find it difficult to construe a passage of Greek or Latin prose, and who would not know which was the beginning or the end of a line of Hebrew. At the same time we do not hesitate to affirm that, in the broad sense, an uneducated ministry in these days, so far as our churches and movements are concerned, is a ministry doomed to ineffectiveness and failure. Only in cases of men possessing natural gifts of a high order should the educational standard be lowered; and everyone of experience knows that men with gifts are greatly aided by a reasonable and suitable course of theological study.

But what are we to say about the selection and appointment of ministers whose attainments and character render them unfit for the position of leaders and guides of the moral and religious life of men. No greater calamity can befall any church or religious movement. Such appointments mean weakness or rottenness at the very core of a religious society. There is no justification for placing men of this type in a pulpit, or giving them an entrance into the inner circle of the family. To say that a man is willing to accept a small salary, that he is well-meaning, that there is nothing serious to be said against him, this is to submit very poor reasons for appointing him a minister of religion. It were better a thousand times that congregations said their own prayers and read other preachers' sermons, than that they should be ministered to by men whom no responsible public body would think of putting in any position of trust.

We have no desire to attack the principle of liberty enjoyed by congregations in the appointment of their ministers. We believe in that principle: it is its occasional application which we deplore. The scandal hardly exists now, we are happy to believe, in our religious community, but we would that it did not and could not exist at all.

How can it be prevented? By the exercise of greater caution and prudence before inviting unknown and untried men to preach even for a single Sunday, by resolving not to allow benevolent sympathies to run away with judgment, by realising anew the dignity and serious responsibility of the ministerial office. By observing these very simple rules, congregations may avoid the troubles which they sometimes bring upon themselves. We believe the managers of the Sustentation Fund and the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association take up a strong attitude on this question, and decline to make grants in aid of the salaries of ministers unless there is positive evidence of unblemished character and real fitness. We trust this wholesome rule will be followed by other societies, and be observed generally by those to whom our churches look for information and guidance, so that it may become an established principle that in the ministry of our religious community there is no opening for men upon whose personal character and general fitness there rests a shadow of doubt.

One word more. If inefficient and weak men are to be kept out of the ministry, efficient and strong men must be brought in. This can only be done, if in the fellowship of our churches as a whole a high standard is maintained, both of what is demanded of ministers, and of the honour, sympathy, and earnest co-operation rendered to their ministers by the congregations themselves.

STILL, we must remember that religion is after all beyond the range of mere tuition. It is not a didactic thing that words can give and silence can withhold. It is a spirit; a life; an inspiration; a contagious glory from soul to soul; a spontaneous union with God.—James Martineau.

THIS Divine relationship was not confined to Christ. If in one sense he was the exceptional, in another and far higher sense he was the typical man, and we are to interpret our own nature and its possibilities through all that was most exalted in him. A man, according to the Apostle, "is the image and glory of God," and "as many as are led by the Spirit of God, these are Sons of God." In separating Christ from our race, and placing him on a pinnacle of Divine solitude, instead of accepting him as "the first-born among many brethren," we are offering him a spurious honour in place of obedience, and spurning the gift which he died to bestow upon the world.—James Drummond.

God's mightiest agents are yet in reserve—not in the cogeny of convincing arguments—but in the incalculable spiritual force which streams from the inspired lives of devoted men.—J. H. Thom.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of Manchester College was held on Thursday afternoon, January 18, at the Memorial Hall, Manchester, the President, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal in the chair. The other Trustees present were Mr. David Ainsworth (Vice-President), the Revs. J. Estlin Carpenter and J. Edwin Odgers (of the Teaching Staff), the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson (Chairman of Committee), Mr. Charles W. Jones (Treasurer), Mrs. Dowson, Mrs. John Harwood, Mrs. Taylor, Mrs. A. H. Worthington, the Revs. A. Bennett, V. D. Davis, George Evans, F. K. Freeston, E. I. Fripp, C. Hargrove, J. Harwood, P. M. Higginson, E. Ceredig Jones, J. Collins Odgers, C. T. Poynting, A. L. Smith, C. J. Street, B. Walker, and Joseph Wood; Messrs. W. B. Bowring, H. R. Bramley, J. H. Brooks, R. D. Darbishire, J. Dendy, H. P. Greg, John Harrison, John Harwood, T. Harwood W. Long, G. H. Leigh, P. H. Leigh, J. K. Lister, F. Monks, A. Nicholson, F. Nicholson, F. Pinnock, R. Robinson, A. E. Steinthal, Grosvenor Talbot, J. B. Wolstenholme, G. W. R. Wood, A. W. Worthington, P. S. Worthington, S. B. Worthington, T. Worthington; the Rev. Henry Gow and Mr. A. H. Worthington (Hon. Secretaries), and Mr. E. W. Marshall (Assistant-Secretary).

Mr. CHARLES W. JONES, the treasurer, presented the accounts, which were printed and in the hands of the Trustees. There was nothing unusual, he said, in the year's accounts, which called for any special remark, but he noted the adverse balance of over £500. An annual subscription list for the College of less than £1,000 from their whole body was not creditable. It ought to be £2,000, and the accounts would then be in a satisfactory condition. Later in the year he should make an appeal for more subscriptions. He moved the adoption of the accounts.

Mr. F. NICHOLSON seconded, and the resolution was passed. The Annual Address of the Committee, which had been previously printed and circulated, was taken as read. Of this we gave an account last week.

THE PRESIDENT, before proceeding to the next resolution, referred to the approaching retirement of Dr. Drummond from the principalship of the College. They all deeply felt the severance of such a tie. That was not the time for the expression through a formal resolution of the gratitude, and more than gratitude, they felt towards Dr. Drummond for the long and faithful services he had rendered to the College. They would have their opportunity at the next meeting of the Trustees in June. As to the future, while the detailed arrangements involved in the change were still under consideration, he announced that they had secured the invaluable services of Professor Estlin Carpenter to succeed Dr. Drummond as Principal of the College.

THE Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON moved the adoption of the Address. He referred to its notice of the coming retirement of the Principal, and said that, as an old fellow-student of Dr. Drummond's, it had been a delight through all these years to be associated with him in the work of the College. He remembered what his influence was among his fellow-students; and that same influence of his noble spiritual character had been deep and strong through all the generations of those who studied under him. Whenever a crisis arose and there was need to have the principles of the College clearly stated, Dr. Drummond rose to the occasion, and the high quality of his scholarship was known to all. He had been a worthy Principal of the College, and he would carry with him into his retirement their deep affection and reverence. They had just heard that Mr. Carpenter had accepted the office of Principal. There had been no moment of doubt or hesitation, when they resolved to ask Mr. Carpenter. Those who knew his work as a teacher, and what he had been as a friend of the students would understand that he was the only man of whom they could think, and they looked forward with high hope and confidence to his influence in the College, where Martineau and Tayler and Drummond had served before him.

Mr. Dowson then noticed other points of special interest in the Address, the appointment as Visitor of the Rev. C. C. Coe, one of the most respected and beloved of the old students of the College; the first class gained at Oxford by Mr. Rowe, one of their students, in taking his degree, the first, he hoped, of many such honours to be gained by their men; the increase of the practice for their students to take curacies on leaving College, as the best way of entering upon their ministry. He had himself had early experience of the benefit of that practice, and he strongly recommended it to congregations and to his brother ministers. He was glad to see that the work of their students at the Mansford-street Mission in London was also maintained. The Trustees could not too highly appreciate the work done by Mr. Addis as tutor in the Residence; what he did was far beyond the requirements of his regular duties, and they were greatly indebted to him. He also noted with satisfaction the new arrangement by which Mr. Jacks had undertaken to supervise the studies of their undergraduates. In conclusion, he referred to the fitting celebration of the Martineau Centenary at the College, from which it had been a grief to him to be absent, and he spoke of the high calling of the College, which had been as the Holy of Holies in his own religious life, where they could study with a spirit free as the breath of heaven. His prayer was that it might long uphold that banner of Truth, Liberty, and Religion before the world.

Mr. W. B. BOWRING seconded the resolution, and endorsed all that Mr. Dowson had said as to the coming retirement of Dr. Drummond. His name had been a household word for them all, and they hoped that in his retirement he might have long life to enjoy the leisure he had so well earned. As to Mr. Carpenter's appointment, they welcomed it. They all knew him, and respected and loved him, and they were quite sure that the College would have in him a Principal in whose hands the office would lose none of that high station to which it had attained.

The resolution was unanimously passed.

Place and Time of Annual Meeting.

Mr. DAVID AINSWORTH then moved on behalf of the Committee the following resolution, of which notice had been given:—

“That from and after the year 1906, the January meeting of the Trustees shall be discontinued, and there shall be held only one Annual Meeting of the Trustees, viz:—in June, at Oxford.”

That question, he said, had been before the committee in a more or less informal way for some time, and he thought they were unanimously in favour of the resolution. The principal reason for it was that the headquarters of the College were now at Oxford, and it was natural that the business should be transacted where the College was. Another reason was that Oxford was much more convenient for London subscribers than Manchester, and it was well that their interest in the College should be cultivated. At the Midsummer meeting students were admitted and certificates were given to those who had completed their course, but the January meeting was the more important business meeting, when the report was presented and the officers and committee elected. It would be of great advantage to put the two together, and have only one annual meeting. It would save the secretaries a considerable amount of work, and June was a much pleasanter and more convenient time to make the necessary journeys to attend such a meeting. He hoped the change would bring the Trustees from the North and the South together in larger numbers, and, by having one really good annual meeting, strengthen the position of the College.

Mr. CHARLES W. JONES, seconding, said that June was undoubtedly a better time than January for the meeting, and although the change of place might be unpopular in Manchester, in the interest of the College and the Trustees as a whole, it ought to be at Oxford. It would be much better to have a large attendance of Trustees there, when the session was being brought to a close and the students were going out. And, notwithstanding the personal inconvenience it would involve, he should be glad if all the meetings of the committee also were held at Oxford. It would be a great inducement to people in other parts of the country also to join the committee. He seconded the resolution with great confidence, and earnestly hoped it would be carried.

Mr. A. NICHOLSON said that he should not vote against the resolution, but he thought there were some serious objections, and he thought they wanted more time for consideration. He suggested that the question might be postponed for twelve months. The College must depend for support on its popularity, and from the four millions of that district the greater part of its support was derived. If they took away the meetings from Manchester, he thought they would lessen the interest in the College there. He also thought the difficulty of attending meetings at Oxford a serious objection, and June a bad time, because of other business engagements. He suggested the beginning of the Oxford term as a possible time, but asked that the question might be left over for a twelvemonth.

Mr. A. H. WORTHINGTON said that there was a good deal of weight in the argument for delay, if the Trustees generally wanted more time for consideration. What had been said was chiefly from the Manchester point of view, and he felt it perhaps as much as any. Manchester was extremely convenient as the place of meeting for a secretary who lived in Manchester. And yet even the Manchester district, and still more the South and the West, would be in closer touch with the College, if the annual meeting were held at Oxford, where the College is. If they concentrated the interest into one meeting in June, or perhaps in March, with the advantage of having more business, and the presence of the students, the Visitor's address, and the Valedictory service, they would have a better attendance, and it would be to the advantage of the College. It was not so much by attending the annual meetings and passing resolutions that the College became known to its Trustees, as by being on the spot, seeing the buildings and associating with the students and the staff. There would then be a more living touch between the Trustees and the College. The argument for the change was not that it was for the convenience of those at Oxford, or for the officers; but it was, as the committee very nearly unanimously (not quite unanimously, as Mr. Ainsworth had thought) had agreed, that the real interest of the College and its purposes, and the vital connection between the churches and the College, would all be benefited by the removal of the annual meeting to Oxford, and combining the two meetings in one.

Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON did not see why the matter should be delayed. The advantage of a Manchester meeting, he thought, could be retained, by holding other meetings, in addition to the annual meeting, in London, or Manchester, or some other large centre, when the interests of the College could be brought before the people of the district.

Mr. F. MONKS said that, as a possible working arrangement might soon be come to between Manchester College and the Home Missionary College, and then it might prove to be well still to hold the annual meeting in Manchester, delay in coming to a decision might be advisable.

Mr. A. W. WORTHINGTON thought that a very large proportion of the supporters of the College were resident in the North of England, and joined in the plea for delay.

Mr. AINSWORTH and his seconder agreed to the suggestion for delay, and withdrew the motion for a twelvemonth.

Election of Officers.

Mr. A. W. WORTHINGTON proposed, the Rev. JAMES HARWOOD seconded, and it was unanimously agreed that the Rev. S. A. Steinthal be re-elected President. Mr. Steinthal gratefully accepted the honour for another year.

On the motion of Mr. GROSVENOR TALBOT, seconded by the Rev. P. M. Higginson, the Vice-Presidents, Mr. David Ainsworth and Mr. William Colfox, were re-elected.

The Rev. J. COLLINS ODGERS proposed the election of the committee. It would be, he said, a year of great importance, owing to the changes that were taking place, but in that committee, with Mr. Dowson at its head, they had every confidence. The committee was the same as last year, except that Mr. John Harrison takes the place of Mr. David Ainsworth, one of the Vice-Presidents of the College. The following is the list:—The Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, Rev. S. Alfred Steinthal, Rev. C. T. Poynting, Rev. P. M. Higginson, Mr. G. W. Rayner Wood, Mr. Robert Harrop, Mr. S. B. Worthington, Mr. Russell Scott, Mr. A. H. Werthington, Rev. V. D. Davis, Mr. Charles W. Jones, Mr. Henry P. Greg, Rev. Charles Hargrove, Mr. William Long, Rev. Henry Gow, Mr. George H. Leigh, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, Rev. F. K. Freeston, Rev. R. T. Herford, Mr. J. W. Scott, Mr. A. Ernest Steinthal, Mr. F. W. Monks, Mr. John Dendy, Rev. Joseph Wood, and Mr. John Harrison.

The Rev. E. I. FRIPP seconded the motion, which was passed. The committee he said, was a fine combination of business power and scholarship. Ten ministers and fifteen laymen, a safe majority. He noted that of the 25, 16 were from the Lancashire district, 6 from London, and 3 from the rest of the country.

The South and the West were unrepresented, and he thought it would be wise to enlist as wide a sympathy as possible.

On the motion of Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON, seconded by Mr. JOHN DENDY, Mr. Charles W. Jones was re-elected treasurer; and on the motion of the Rev. C. HARGROVE, seconded by Mr. ERNEST STEINTHAL, Mr. A. H. Worthington and the Rev. Henry Gow, secretaries. The auditors, Mr. F. Nicholson and Mr. Egbert Steinthal were also appointed, and the local treasurers, Mr. F. W. Monks taking the place of his father, Mr. Frederick Monks, for Warrington.

A vote of thanks to the President, moved by the Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, and seconded by Mr. A. H. WORTHINGTON was carried by acclamation, and the meeting terminated.

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION.

A DRAWING-ROOM meeting in the interests of this Society was held on Wednesday afternoon, through the kindness of Miss Constance Martineau, at 1, Clifton-place, Sussex-square, W. The President, Mr. P. M. Martineau, took the chair, and Miss Jennett Humphreys read a paper entitled "Among the Poor: how to serve them best."

The PRESIDENT, in opening the meeting, said they were there in the interest of charity, in the good old Bible sense of benevolence, a holy kindness. They had heard a good deal lately about "the swing of the pendulum," and they found it applied to such societies as theirs. Fresh interests were constantly claiming attention, and the older societies, however admirable, suffered from lack of adequate support. Whatever they might think of the Queen's Unemployed Fund, and perhaps it had not been entirely wise, it had undoubtedly diverted money which might have gone in other directions, and might have done more good if had gone to some of the older societies. The London Domestic Mission Society was seventy years old, but it was still vigorous and doing admirable work. At the time of its establishment it was rather unique, and had a distinct success. Its aim was declared in the original prospectus to be "the improvement of the moral and religious character of the poor, and the amelioration of their condition." The method was to plant a missionary among the people, and by gifts of heart and soul, more than of money, to establish a centre of personal influence, which should become a home for the poor. This they had done in the old days with notable success in Spitalfields, where they had an ideal missionary. Another centre in St. Luke's was still maintained, and a third, more recently, in Marylebone. Two other missions they had, under separate management. (Mansford-street represents the original Spitalfields Mission.) They would gladly do more, but lack of means prevented it. Old subscribers fell away, and those who took their places did not always subscribe as their fathers did. But though they wanted more money, there was something wanted still more, and that was personal, loving help. There was constant need of teachers, visitors, and help in the manifold activities of the missions. They hoped by that meeting to awaken fresh interest in the work.

Miss HUMPHREYS in her paper noted four things as specially needed to help the poor; work, health, the giving of good things, and mingling among the poor for the gaining of mutual knowledge. Work was the first need, but that could only be effectually met by the State. Health also, largely dependent upon sanitation, and the substitution of wholesome for evil conditions, must be the care of the State. Then they came to personal help, which many gave; but many others, who would gladly give, were prevented by the conditions of their own life. But they could love just as much as the others, and they could give towards the support of the good work. They sent a group of men, as their deputies, to live in touch with the people, like the best of the parochial clergy. These men won the confidence of the people, and gained direct knowledge of the conditions of their life; they saw where there was injustice and could go to the proper authority for remedy, and where there was need acted as link between the sufferers and the appropriate charity. Through their personal influence they became to the people channels of better life. And the missionary did not work alone, but gathered about him a number of voluntary helpers, who were able to devote a portion of their time to that beneficent work of "giving good things" in teaching and recreation and other helpful ways, and forming bonds of friendship with the poor. The opportunities for such helpfulness were manifold. Thus Miss Humphreys sketched the field of work, which for all who will enter upon it, even in the doing of the simplest things, is doubly blessed.

The Rev. F. H. JONES followed with a brief address, in which he touched upon the difficulties of thrift, and pointed out how the relations of dependence run through the whole of society. It was not merely carelessness, but the best impulses of generous sympathy which made it difficult for people to save. When they considered the conditions under which the poor had to live in great cities, there was an immediate call to them to do all that was possible to make their lives a little bit more worth living. That was what their missions were for. While they waited and worked for the larger movements effectually to remedy the evil conditions, they must do at once all they could to brighten and uplift the lives of the people. It was sometimes complained that they were caring too much for material things, for mere comfort. But what finer word than "comfort" was there in the old prophets—"Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith your God"? That was what their missionaries were trying to do, to strengthen and uplift the people. It was in that effort their help was required.

The Rev. S. H. STREET, minister at the Bell-street Mission, Marylebone, said that the people of his district did not exactly belong to the "submerged tenth," but they were on the borderland, and it was their business to prevent them from slipping over, and to recover those who had fallen. Preventive work he felt to be best of all, and they needed personal service even more than money. He made a special appeal for teachers, since their Sunday-school had increased forty per cent. during the last two years, but they had no more teachers. They ought not to leave it to the girls of the district, who often worked twelve hours a day through the week, and even on Saturdays, to do that work.

The PRESIDENT earnestly enforced Mr. Street's appeal.

Miss ANNA SHARPE proposed a vote of thanks to Miss Martineau for her kindness in allowing them to hold the meeting there, and spoke of the great interest of the mission work, especially of the provident visiting, for which more helpers were needed.

Mr. PHILIP ROSCOE seconded the motion, and as treasurer asked for more financial support. Their income from subscriptions was only about £700, and they spent from £1,200 to £1,300. Thus they had only been able to carry on the work by spending the legacies they received. Last year he had been obliged to sell £600 of consols to meet the expense of necessary repairs to the missions. That was not satisfactory, and they ought to have a stronger subscription list.

Miss MARTINEAU, in acknowledging the resolution, which was very cordially passed, said it was a great pleasure to see them there, and concluded by moving a vote of thanks to the President. He, in his turn, expressed their great indebtedness to Miss Humphreys for her paper. The meeting then adjourned for tea, which was hospitably served downstairs.

You cannot run away from a weakness; you must sometimes fight it out or perish; and, if that be so, why not now, and where you stand?—R. L. Stevenson.

Is it not a plain inversion of the true order of things when we do our work for the sake of the following rest, instead of accepting our rest as preparative for work?

—James Martineau.

TOWARDS SOCIAL REFORM.

THE LAND AND THE UNEMPLOYED.

No rôle is easier or surer to meet with the ready approval of that vast majority who wish all mankind well, without having troubled themselves much to think, than that of the social reformer, and none is more ungrateful than that of the carping critic; yet as such must I approach the articles which you have already published on this subject. Many years' experience in charity organisation work and in contact with the working classes have not lessened my sympathy with suffering nor diminished my share in the Weltschmerz, but they have taught me how little lasting good we can do with all our endeavours, and how much harm we may do with the best intentions; and also how complicated are the problems and, therefore, how little likely it is that anyone can find a royal road to their solution. Your readers will not, therefore, wonder if I am a little impatient with those who cry, "Oh, pass a law or two, settle town dwellers on the land, nationalise that, give local authorities more power, and lo! a people prosperous and happy for ever." Underlying this line of thought are several fallacies, chief of which is that the development of society depends on Government and laws and not on individual character, as I have already argued in your columns.

Then there is the belief that there really exists a large body of deserving and capable people who want and cannot find work, and the further assumption that a material and permanent improvement can be effected by moving this supposed surplus to "the land," and, most gratuitous of all, that they would consent to be so removed, or, if removed, would long remain.

* Firstly, as to the number of unemployed. I do not deny that there are not a few in that condition, and that trades union returns have for some time past, and until the last month or so, shown a percentage of unemployed which, after allowing for the number not at work through illness and similar causes, considerably exceeds the average of recent years; but that could be fully accounted for by the waste of war, and is now rapidly returning to the small normal rate.

Meanwhile, Socialists and Tariff Reformers found it to their interest, as in 1882 and since, to make the most of the Unemployed Question, and produced those laboriously organised processions which, for London, must be pronounced to have been failures. Even the writing on the wall—"We want work; curse your charity; remember Russia"—was too obviously inspired by dramatic genius. Yet London is the place to which those wanting work and those seeking relief crowd from all parts; it is there that the most daring experiments in the new philanthropy are being made, and it is in those districts where Local Authorities and Boards of Guardians are most controlled by Socialists or influenced by good intentions, that the greatest poverty and the most miserable crowd together.

In the provinces the difficulty, although equally advertised, is less acute. In the town in which I write, for instance, we have a population of nearly a quarter of a million. A new workhouse is over-full.

The staple trade of the town has long been reputed to be bad, and is always a fluctuating one. The building trade had been very active for some years, and then almost suddenly collapsed. A year ago the usual outcry of want of employment arose. The Council voted money to the Charity Organisation Society, which multiplied its staff and encountered the emergency. Speaking from memory, £1,200 spent on three or four hundred cases sufficed. This winter we have the same sensation. An Unemployed Committee has been formed under the new Act, and, if I mistake not, the number of applications never rose above six hundred, and the helpable cases were less than a third of that. To-day I read in the Liberal newspaper that a private savings bank here holds working class savings amounting to £945,684—say £20 for every family in the town—being an increase of £25,922 during the past year. In the same year the number of investors has increased from 33,887 to 35,016, besides 333 with £22,500 in another department. All this is, of course, besides what is invested in the Post Office Savings Bank, in provident societies, trades unions, municipal bonds, and many other ways.

There is no reason to suppose that the circumstances in this town are exceptional, and I should like one of your correspondents to tell me what is the matter with a social system under which such results are possible, and how it is likely to be improved by the abolition of individual enterprise and the destruction of private ownership and thrift.

A useful commentary on the subject is supplied in THE INQUIRER by Mr. Davis's account of relief works at Chatham, which illustrates all the phases of the philanthropic mind.

We have the sympathy, the self-devotion, the services freely rendered, and then we see how inadequate it all is; but the question is not asked whether the "out of works" merited relief; I do not mean whether their character was good—that I take for granted—but whether men who had been in easy, steady, Government employ for years at good wages, ought not to have made better provision for the proverbially rainy day, than would last nine days or six weeks respectively. I think it likely that the very comfort and apparent certainty of their employment contributed to make them careless of the future. No doubt these men, most of whom would have been drawn from other parts of the country, have long since drifted back and found employment elsewhere, for the engineering trades are very busy; but it cannot be seriously maintained that the Government, or rather the taxpayers, should keep men it did not need employed or pensioned until it suited them to go elsewhere, or that these had any claim whatever on the public for "remunerative work." Labour, like capital, must go to where its investment is most profitable, and it is perhaps the greatest gain made by labour in our day that modern means of communication have made such migrations possible. Without it, the labourer would still be what he was, adscripti glebæ in substance, though not in name or law.

Let me protest that I do not disparage the charity, which is love. Help in money and by sympathy, "feeling with," given with personal painstaking, cannot but be beneficial, even if misapplied; "it blesseth him that gives and him that takes," but the help which your correspondents advocate is not of this kind. What they propose is that other people should be compelled by law to do something to accord with their personal theories.

"But," they will say, "there is a surplus. Something must be done." I deny it. "Doing something" is too often doing harm, and, although emigration has long been decreasing, there is, except temporarily and locally, no considerable surplus of men and women who can and will work. Readers of Rider Haggard's "Rural England" must have been impressed with one dominant note. It is "want of labour." Young men and women will not stay on the land; only the old and incapable remain, and so it goes to waste, and cows and other stock have to be given up. The work is too hard, life too monotonous, its chances too small. Yet I am aware that farm or labour colonies in Holland and in Germany for tramps and beggars, and here for some of the destitute, have been a qualified success. Mr. Haggard is now trying to get Government support to extended schemes of this kind, and I certainly join in wishing success to this movement. There is plenty of agricultural land to be had for less than the cost of draining and fencing; and if there are many able and willing to work on it, it may be well that they should have the chance. Yet I do not regard it as a very rosy one. The disinclination to work on the land, the desire to live in towns, are not found only in England. They show themselves in protected Germany, where Poles have to be imported for harvest work, and in France, that land of peasant proprietors. They exist in America, supposed to be less rent-ridden than England, although there, possibly, the mortgagee stands in place of the landlord; and in Australia, though that vast country is governed by workmen and socialists, and there, too, "the unemployed" are a permanent factor.

Besides the other attractions of towns, higher wages in other kinds of labour naturally draw the best men, as in England, where the agricultural population has largely migrated to the iron mines and collieries. Besides, it is not enough to dump the reclaimed slum dweller on the land and to give him a spade. Capital is wanted for buildings, stock, seeds and implements, and the whole is more or less at the mercy of the seasons. Yet it might be well if more of us were content to live the simple life and "laborious days." It is again a question of character, and present day character is not of that type.

Mr. Rider Haggard favours peasant proprietorship or allotments; and here we come into contact with the land laws, dissatisfaction with which leads your contributors to advocate land nationalisation. This has so often been painted in glowing colours, that many people may believe that there is "something in it," just as a week ago many thought that there was a good deal in Tariff Reform. In my opinion, Tariff Reform was the most gigantic mare's nest ever discovered, and Land Nationalisation runs it close.

This is hardly the occasion to discuss it, so I will only submit that, to ensure enterprise and industry on the part of the tenant, the first necessary condition is fixity of tenure. But giving fixity of tenure, even at a quit-rent, amounts to creating a new kind of private ownership, similar to the existing copyhold; and if the State retains the right of appropriating "unearned increment," it must equally remain responsible for "unearned decrement" (of which latter there has been a good deal, not only in the country, but also, specially owing to municipal trams, in the towns), so that a new element of instability would be introduced. Twenty or thirty years ago Liberals agitated to get the custom of entail abolished, and it is regrettable that much progressive energy has been diverted from this and other tangible reforms, to wander in the wilderness of Socialism or to flounder in the bog of Nationalisation.

Here, again, the best intentioned have been themselves the greatest obstacles to improvement. Entail was, as is well known, invented by the lawyers to obtain security at a time when the Sovereign too frequently exercised his powers of forfeiture, for it was realised that, without stability, there could be no progress; but it has severed its purpose, and now only prevents the natural dissipation of landed property. If it were made illegal to settle land on the unborn heir, great and small estates would presently come into the market, and would afford opportunities to large and small investors, now unattainable, thus drawing capital and labour "back to the land."

Although not admitting that want of employment prevails to anything like the extent generally supposed, nor believing that legislation can achieve what is expected from it, I do not shut my eyes to the existence of much poverty and suffering; but I do not presume to offer a sovereign remedy in a few lines. If we seek to remove the causes rather than to treat the symptoms, we may find that wastefulness, slothfulness, self-indulgence, ignorance of house-keeping, are concerned. We may have something to say about marriages of boys and girls who have made no provision for the future, and of the remarkable slackness of family ties in England, where the children, the sons especially, so often do not think it any part of their duty to help their parents, not to mention other relations. And the conclusion I come to is, possibly, that if Parliament cannot do much, there is yet plenty of work for the teacher and the preacher.

RICHARD SIMON.

To undermine veracity is to undermine the secret springs of all progressive activity.—John Morley.

THE law requires men to be honest in all their dealings, and lays down various rules forbidding modes of conduct by which this principle would be violated. But a man is not necessarily honest because he cunningly keeps himself outside the meshes of the law. He is honest only when the soul of honour dwells within, acting according to its own intrinsic law, and so rendering him independent of those lower and extraneous laws which he is now never tempted to violate.—James Drummond.

ON AN UNEMPLOYED RELIEF COMMITTEE.

II.

It has been mentioned that the funds at the disposal of the above Committee in the Three Towns on the Medway permitted no farther relief than just the supply of bare necessities to those in actual want. To pay rent or doctors' bills, or redeem goods from pawn were beyond our scope. During the summer we simply tried to prevent actual starvation. In fact, the relief only came to about 2½d. per head per week. Yet this little to many a household meant a refuge from dire want, and its first coming the long-prayed-for ray of hope breaking on a night of black despair. We have good warrant for supposing that we saved many from crime and not a few from suicide. For with the relief there went in every case the human interest, the brotherly word of cheer, the token that someone cared; and these things kindle the dying embers of hope in the most desolate. Many were the confidences reposed in us. And, as the members met week by week to communicate their reports and discuss the most difficult cases, many a tale was told which proved how silent tragedies are enacted in the most humble home, unsuspected by the world as it rolls past unheeding. What a prey the poor are!—to the aggressor and the exploiter! How like sheep without a shepherd, ready to be victimised by any loquacious tongue and crafty mind, completely at the mercy of the cunning and greedy! Many of them, indeed, though grown in years, are but as children—the child-souls of humanity, concerning whom a gracious spirit spoke that charter of defence—"Woe unto him who shall cause one of these little ones to stumble! Better for him to be cast into the depths of the sea."

Over and over again we realised the greatest need of the poor. It is for a friend, for a counsellor, a director who will guide them through the difficulties and perplexities in which they are intricately by their ignorance, and stand by them in their helplessness. Somebody to protect them from the vultures that prey upon them—a Father of the people. Somebody to whom they can confide their troubles—a Confessor who loves them. No one who has gone into a poor dwelling and seen the good man resting his head on his arms and the housewife in tears, and heard their superstitious talk about bad luck and the like, yet seen how readily they respond to a counsel of good cheer, but is convinced of the docility and responsiveness to good influences of which they are capable if the exertion of these influences were constant. There is such a store of native dignity and worth hidden away in their breasts, such a fund of endurance, such capacity for heroism. Among the poor, as in greater measure among the rich, days of prosperity breed much folly and thriftlessness and forgetfulness of the footsteps of Nemesis, but in adversity begins to flash and scintillate that precious jewel which our greatest poet tells us shines in the sweet uses of adversity.

Again and again have we been reminded of a line in Arnold's "Light of Asia," put into the mouth of the young mother of the snake-bitten child as she went from hut to hut asking for the seed that was to cure the stricken babe:—

"For all the poor are piteous to the poor."

Instances could be cited how a couple with but an income of ten shillings a week managed to make a margin to relieve those who had nothing; how, when a landlord had evicted a family and their few meagre bits of furniture into the street, a neighbour would take pity and share their already straitened quarters, so that sometimes two families consisting of nine altogether would live in one room about ten feet square. And even in such circumstances a certain modesty and fine delicacy was preserved through the chastening rod of fate. It is surely a noble shame that silences any direct allusion to the pawnshop. "I parted with them some time ago." "I have had to put them aside." Is it not in poor people, together with the very young and very old, and in women, that Maeterlinck found the "spiritual principle" nearest to the surface? Was it not among the downtrodden peasantry of Russia Tolstoy found a cheerful submission to the decrees of fate, while the favoured of fortune were deranged with pessimism and faithlessness?

I can testify that our relief was often declined because "my man earned a few shillings last week, and I haven't the heart to deprive those who are worse off than me." I can testify that the little food some of our clients received has been divided among those of whose distress we were unaware, or who were ethically unqualified to participate in the relief. I have also known of the wrestling that would go on in a small boy between spending the penny earned for carrying a parcel upon the long-coveted toffee or taking it home for his mother to buy bread, and the victory won by the nobler principle. I could quote cases where the only income a family of seven and even ten received consisted of the few shillings earned by the elder lad of thirteen or fourteen. Sometimes a boy, in order to increase this income, would leave a position wherein he earned eight shillings a week and accept a promise of ten. In one such case the boy was stranded after a week, and had the chagrin of knowing he had lost the slender security in hope of the wider insecurity. Yet who can blame this legitimate ambition? The whole chapter of distress is illumined by the faithfulness of lads and lassies, who made means of work, and carried every penny home. Much ingenuity was displayed toward this end, and it became a custom among the sympathetic to co-operate in the devices while revealing no sign of their knowledge of the projects which they furthered.

It is unto those who have brought from the ancestral home in some happy rural village a sacred sense of home-sanctities that the breaking up of their little household through a long period of unemployment has dealt the most cruel blow. I have known women go without food rather than part with some china around which clustered associations of other days and absent friends. To violate this sense is as much "moral murder" as the destruction of an artist's picture, to which Sir Oliver Lodge applies the phrase. We learnt to know the grateful saying that went with the news of obtaining work and the intimation that there was no further need of relief—"You helped us to keep our home together." And a peculiar pathos came into the voice when the absence of a family from their former residence was being reported—"Their home had to be broken up; they have gone away." I came to understand the soul of the fetish-worshipper in this way. One day I found a wife and six children eating a little bread and drinking water for their dinner; but amid the bareness some plated bauble had been kept as signal of a life that was fast slipping from their grasp, and I could not but look with reverence upon the dimly shining thing as reflecting some of the rays of the Shekinah—token of the presence of a sweet and gracious sentiment that would not be let die.

If unemployment did no more than destroy this homing instinct its condemnation would be amply justified. But all the time this passing of the exiles into mysterious sordid ways went on, signs of extravagance and wasteful prodigality abounded on every side, until one went about feeling that in the mere acquiescence with such an unequal civilisation he held the soul of a vampire and walked the streets of Doom.

LONDON SUNDAY-SCHOOL SOCIETY.

SIR,—It has been decided to resume the Society's Country Holiday Movement, a very general feeling having been expressed that in giving up their separate movement the Society would be depriving the schools of the advantage obtained by associating the Country Holiday with the Sunday School in the minds of the scholars.

The movement will be conducted on different lines than hitherto. The society will no longer make itself responsible for sending scholars away or for looking after them while in the country. This work, it is considered, can best be done by each individual school. It is, however, desired to form a list of persons in the country from whom information as to homes in their neighbourhood can be obtained, so that each school may be able to make the necessary arrangements for boarding out its scholars.

The society will form a Country Holiday Fund, and will be prepared to make a grant to each school sending scholars away into the country. It has been estimated that the inclusive cost of a fortnight's holiday, i.e., board, lodging, and railway fare, amounts on the average to 12s. a scholar. The society will be prepared (so far as its fund permits) to make a grant to each school at the rate of 7s. 6d. per scholar sent into the country, leaving the remaining 4s. 6d. (or whatever other sum may be required) to be found by the scholar.

A date will be fixed (probably June 30) before which all applications must be sent in, and only the amount received up to that date will be distributed. In the past years some 400 scholars were sent away by the society each summer, so that the amount required to enable the society to take up the work again will be at least £150, and for this sum the committee now confidently appeals.

Miss Pearson is the treasurer of the fund, and all subscriptions should be sent to her at her address, Redington Lodge, Hampstead, N.W. The earlier that subscriptions are sent in the better will the committee be able to let the London Sunday Schools know the amount of help which will be forthcoming next summer.

I would also ask all country friends, who are willing to give information as to country homes in their districts, to send me their names and addresses as soon as possible, so that a complete list may be prepared for the use of the different schools.

AN ENLARGED LECTIONARY.

SIR,—Your article on "An enlarged lectionary," with its four specimens of proposed "lessons" from books other than the Bible, rather surprises me. Many years ago I prepared and published "Readings for Public Worship and the Home." This volume contains much of what you now print as fresh suggestions. In it there are 13 lessons from Ecclesiasticus; 6 from the Wisdom of Solomon; 11 from the Koran; 24 from the "Imitation of Christ"; 22 from the Meditations of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, and 25 from Dr. Rowland Williams's "Psalms and Litanies." A fairly large edition has long been disposed of, and the book is now out of print. I understand that many ministers have used it for years. I myself have used it all over the country, and with more than mere acceptance.

The preparing of these lessons involved much patient and careful work, which any one who cares to take the matter up afresh is welcome to take advantage of.

Time has only deepened the impression that Unitarians and others are much to blame for their inconsistent treatment of the Bible.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Dover.—The children of the Adrian-street Sunday-school Band of Hope and boys' and girls' clubs (70) were entertained with a tea, followed by a Christmas tree, on January 19. The ladies of the Sewing Guild took the opportunity of presenting Miss Martindale with a gold brooch, as a token of their esteem and appreciation of her valuable work in the Sunday-school and juvenile clubs.

Framlingham.—A lantern lecture on Astronomy, entitled "The Worlds around us," was delivered in the Old Meeting House, on Monday evening, by the Rev. William Birks, of Diis.

Leeds: Hunslet.—The annual teachers' and parents' tea and prize distribution was held on Saturday, January 20. The Rev. J. Fox occupied the chair, and the Revs. C. Hargrove and W. R. Shanks and Mr. J. Thornton were the speakers. Miss M. Lupton presented the prizes. During the evening there were recitations by some of the scholars and selections of music by the singing class. There was a very good attendance, and an enjoyable evening was spent.

London: Stamford-street.—The anniversary meeting of the Band of Hope and Mercy was held on Friday, the 19th inst. There was a full muster of members and a good attendance of parents and friends. The report of the superintendent (Mr. A. W. Harris) mentioned that there had been an average attendance of ninety-seven in the year 1905, as compared with eighty-six in 1904. Various interesting meetings held during the year were reviewed. The Rev. W. L. Tucker, who presided, and Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, gave encouraging addresses, warmly commending the Society's work. Musical items were contributed by members and friends. The distribution by Mrs. R. Whitmore Cox of forty-five medals and prizes concluded a very successful meeting.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday-school Union.—The quarterly meeting of the Union was held at Stockport on Saturday last. About ninety-five persons were present to tea. A meeting of the committee was held immediately afterwards, at which twenty members were present. The president, Mrs. Dowson, occupied the chair at the evening meeting, and the Rev. B. C. Constable read an instructive paper on "The Meggitt Scheme of Sunday-school Reform," illustrated by charts. The discussion following the paper was taken part in by Revs. W. Harrison, A. R. Andreae, H. Kelsey White, W. F. Turland, G. Evans, and H. B. Smith, and Messrs. W. Woolley and A. Slater.

Nottingham.—A meeting of the High Pavement Historical Society was held in the schools on Tuesday evening, January 23, Mr. J. C. Warren (president) in the chair, when a lecture was delivered by the Rev. J. C. Grant, M.A., of the Belgrave-square Presbyterian Church, on "Highland Clans of Nottinghamshire Origin." A hearty vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Grant on the motion of Mr. P. D. Freeman, seconded by Miss Guilford.

Raloo.—On Thursday, January 11, a deputation from the non-subscribing Presbyterian Church paid a visit to the Manse, to congratulate the Rev. John and Mrs. McCleery on the occasion of their marriage. An address was presented, and also a very handsome purse of sovereigns, as a token of the good-will of the congregation.

Templepatrick.—The members of the Old Presbyterian Church, Templepatrick, assembled in annual congregational meeting on Sunday, January 21, 1906, desire to place on record the fact that, having read the address by Dr. John Campbell on "The Spirit of the Reformation," they are, as a congregation, desirous of (a) thanking Dr. Campbell for his timely and helpful word; (b) of expressing the hope that it may be the cause of a closer union among all our churches and of a revival of the Spirit both of the Reformation and of religion; and (c) that they, as a congregation, promise to do what in them lies to the end that Dr. Campbell's proposals may find realisation in the non-subscribing churches. Proposed by Rev. A. Turner, seconded by Mr. W. Kell, and unanimously resolved.

THE communion of saints brings to us their conflict first, their blessings afterwards; those who will not with much patience strive with evil can have no dear fellowship with the good.—James Martineau.

OPINIONS.

"Has many commendable features. A great many of the old fine tunes find places, and the new tunes are of a varied character. Both editions are produced in admirable style."

Birmingham Daily Post.

"The Musical Edition is well set out and printed. Many of the old favourites are to be found, and the selection of tunes is decidedly strong and judicious."—Manchester Guardian.

"There are aspects of devotion here brought to expression which have not hitherto been so clearly represented in our books. The Musical Edition has a special claim on our gratitude. We are confident that its merits will meet with growing appreciation both in our homes and churches."—The Inquirer.

"A good collection."—The Christian World.

"I congratulate the editors on the admirable way in which they have done their work. There is a breath of modern thought and life about the book which is most refreshing, while there is a real strain of poetic feeling from end to end."—H. Enfield Dowson.

"I am sincerely pleased with it. It has, as far as hymns will permit, kept the principle that some poetic feeling should exist in the hymns chosen. I also like the arrangement and the headings; and a spirit of care and wise emotion, and of attention to congregational needs, pervades the book. I hope it will be adopted far and wide. It deserves an extended circulation."—Stopford A. Brooke.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

OUR leading article this week calls attention to the appeal, which is also printed in full, for the “Boston Conference Fund,” the initiation of which we owe to the generous enthusiasm of Dr. Herbert-Smith. The purpose is to enable a large number of our ministers to attend the next meeting of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, which is to be held at Boston, Mass., in September, 1907.

THE proposed fund, it will be seen, has already received very influential support. It is hoped that every congregation will do something to help, with the feeling that this is an effort for the good of our body as a whole; and particularly, that those who know that their own minister could not in any case go to America, yet will not hold aloof, but will be glad to make a contribution to the common cause.

DR. HERBERT-SMITH has had collecting books printed for helpers, and these, with copies of the Appeal for distribution, may be had on application to him. In such an undertaking there must necessarily be a good deal of expense in printing, postage, &c., even when all the work is done for love, and Dr. Herbert-Smith is very anxious that this should not have to be deducted from the amount subscribed to the Fund. He is willing to speak or lecture during the coming year, wherever arrangements can be made, so as to meet those expenses separately, and let the whole of the Fund be devoted to its own purpose.

THE venerable King of Denmark, Christian IX., father of our Queen, of the Dowager-Empress of Russia, and the King of Greece, and grandfather of the newly-elected King of Norway, passed away by a sudden and quite peaceful death on Monday afternoon. He was a year older than Queen Victoria, and of all the Sovereigns of Europe was the man of simplest habits, and in closest touch with his people. His own family life was of the happiest, and while the opening of his reign was clouded by the war of 1864 and the loss of Schleswig-Holstein, he subsequently gave a more liberal constitution to Denmark, and did much to promote the prosperity of his people. “With God for honour and right” was his motto. On Monday morning he fulfilled his usual duties, and after lunch went to rest, and passed quietly away. For the personal sorrow of our Queen the deepest sympathy will be felt. Her brother succeeds to the throne of Denmark as Frederick VIII.

THURSDAY'S Times published a correspondent's estimate of the number of Nonconformists in the new House of Commons, with the admission that it very likely was not complete. It gave a total of 157, classified as follows:—Congregationalists 65, Baptists 18, Wesleyan Methodists 37, Primitive Methodists 5, United Free Church Methodists 3, New Connexion Methodist 1, Bible Christian 1, Presbyterians 3, Welsh Calvinistic Methodists 8, Society of Friends 6, Unitarians 10. The Christian World, on the other hand, gave a list of 176 Free Church Members, among them several Unitarians, though not the Chamberlains, and a separate list of 13 Scottish Presbyterians. To this Scottish list of Free Churchmen, though neither “Presbyterian” nor “Evangelical,” the Christian World might have added J. S. Ainsworth (Argyllshire,) and W. P. Beale (Ayrshire, S.)

THE number of Unitarians in the new House it is not easy to determine, but there are certainly more than ten. The following list we give with some hesitation. It contains names of those who will at once be recognised as well-known and active members of Unitarian congregations, others of old Unitarian families; one or two would possibly prefer to rank as unattached to any religious body. All but the group of three are Liberals:—J. S. Ainsworth (Argyllshire), T. Gair Ashton (Luton, Beds.), W. P. Beale (Ayrshire, S.), C. B. Brocklehurst (Cheshire, Macclesfield), Stopford Wentworth Brooke (Bow and Bromley); Sir John T. Brunner (Northwich), J. F. L. Brunner (Leigh, Lancs.), J. Chamberlain (Birmingham, W.); Austen Chamberlain (Worcestershire, E.), Jesse Collings (Birmingham, Bordesley), Lewis Haslam (Monmouth District), J. A. Jacoby (Derbyshire, Mid.), Sir James Kitson (Colne Valley), Arnold Lupton (Sleaford, Lincoln), F. Maddison (Burnley), H. Manfield (Northampton, Mid.), Athelstan Rendall (Gloucester, S.), C. E. Schwann (Manchester, N.), C. D. Schwann (Hyde, Cheshire).

MONDAY'S Tribune, in the column on “Religious Activity” had some interesting letters on the subject of Free Church Union in Canada. Dr. Monro Gibson, of St. John's Wood Presbyterian Church, and formerly a lecturer in Montreal Theological College, wrote: “I believe that the majority of Presbyterians in England will follow with interest and hopefulness the negotiations for union between the Methodist, Presbyterian and Congregational Churches in Canada: Though there is no movement of the same kind with us, the way seems to be preparing for it. It has been to many quite a revelation that the representatives of the many churches united in the Free Church Council should have been able to draw up a catechism covering the whole ground of Evangelical doctrine, not only without dissent, but with complete unanimity. This proves that now there is practically no barrier in doctrine. As to polity, there is no difference whatever in principle between Methodists and Presbyterians; and the Congregationalists are seeking after greater unity of organisation and action, while in the Presbyterian Church there is no longer that undue exercise of authority against which the earlier Independents found it necessary to protest: Thus, though the organic re-union of the churches is not yet within the range of practical politics in England, it is not at all improbable that, if the Canadian movement towards union be successful, it may be followed by a similar movement here.”

A POPULAR shilling edition of Holyoake's useful book on “Public Speaking and Debate,” revised and enlarged, was recently issued by Mr. Fisher Unwin, and will be found full of interest and good stories and valuable hints to public speakers, including ministers. The first edition appeared more than fifty years ago, and being reprinted in America, was highly valued by Wendell Phillips. The late Dr. Joseph Parker also warmly commended it to young preachers, and to him the later enlarged edition is dedicated, as one “whom tho author found to be fair in discussion, in days when few ministers were so; and who in later years was his friend, notwithstanding his divergency in theological opinion." There are chapters on "Delivery," "Conditions of Effectiveness," "Method in Expression," "Premeditation in Speech," and others as full of practical suggestions. Those on "Laws of Debate," "Contingencies of Public Meetings," and "Writing for the Press" should also be carefully noted.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

A MEETING of the Committee was held at the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Thursday, January 18, at which twenty-four members were present. Apologies for absence were announced from ten others, including the President, in whose absence the chair was taken by his predecessor, the Rev. J. E. Carpenter. Among other items of business, the following will be of interest to our readers.

Applications to be placed on the roll of the conference had been received from the congregations of Acton, Newton Abbot, and Broughton (Manchester), and were acceded to.

The scheme, prepared by a sub-committee, for a "Consultation Board," consisting of representatives of trusts and societies, for the assistance of congregations, ministers, and students for the ministry, was considered, and the representatives of the National Conference were requested to give it a general support at the adjourned meeting, which is to be held, probably, at Oxford in Easter week.

The programme for the Triennial Meetings was submitted and approved.

Through the generous kindness of some friends not residing in Oxford, the local committee will be enabled to offer to ministers and delegates who desire it accommodation which originally had not been contemplated. It was announced that as soon as arrangements were completed invitations and programmes would be issued to the congregations.

The draft Report was considered, and, with a few minor alterations, adopted as the Report of the Committee, and ordered to be circulated among the congregations, ministers, and delegates.

The sub-committee appointed to revise the rules recommended certain alterations which have become necessary or desirable. These will be proposed to the Conference at Oxford by the President on behalf of the Committee.

It was agreed that the next meeting should be held at Oxford on Tuesday, April 17, at 2.30 p.m.

It is only love that can penetrate behind the prison doors, where the spirit sits oppressed with the manacles of sin, nursing its hostility to God, because, having departed from Him, it believes that He can regard it only with detestation. Then, if it can be brought to see and feel that the Divine love is close to it, asking it to repent and be reconciled, and receive healing and eternal life in communion with God, the hard heart is melted, the love of God enters in, and works with redeeming efficacy as a new principle of righteousness.—James Drummond.

AN EXTENDED LECTIONARY.

SIR,—I read the article on "An Enlarged Lectionary" in your issue of January 20 with the warmest sympathy, but expected that you would have some more or less weighty replies to insert in the next number. Nothing of the kind, however. You get only one letter, and that in agreement with you. Are we to assume that your arguments are generally accepted as unanswerable? If so, it is time that our churches brought their practice more into harmony with them. Nothing has astonished me more, since I became connected with the churches which boast that they are the freest in the world, than the extent to which they remain in bondage to the Bible in their public worship. Even you, Sir, put hesitatingly your first great argument, which appears to me to be in itself overwhelming, namely, that non-Biblical readings are "a testimony to the true doctrine of religious inspiration." Surely such readings form the simplest, the most direct, the most uncontroversial, and at the same time the most edifying testimony which we can give to that doctrine. We preach an unorthodox doctrine of inspiration, but in many of our churches our practice is wholly orthodox. Meanwhile, our people remain ignorant of the uncanonical Holy Scriptures, and strangers ask why we do not act upon our principles?

There is much that needs saying upon this subject, but, so long as your arguments remain unanswered, those who agree with them may content themselves with little. Let me, however, point these arguments in the following way:—

The Rev. W. H. Drummond said:—"This Scriptural authority of the fit word perfectly expressed gives a fatal unreality to most arguments for an enlarged lectionary or extra-Biblical readings in public worship. Plausible as they may appear on the lips of some advocates, they touch no real need of the Christian society." (Italics mine.) On this I make the following comments:—

(1) Comparing Mr. Drummond's and every similar plea with yours, I find the "fatal unreality" in the former. I find such pleas fatally unreal, because they do not reckon with the facts of the situation. They appear to be founded on traditional habits and sentiments, which naturally strong in some persons and always worthy of a certain deference, should not have the final decision.

(2) In the light of Mr. Hopps's statement that he has found non-Biblical readings meet with "more than mere acceptance" and in the light of my own experience, I can form no other conclusion than that there is a very real and very widely felt need of the kind which Mr. Drummond disposes of in airy, a priori fashion. That this need has long been felt by some of the most devout and cultured minds amongst us there is striking evidence in the late Mr. Harry Rawson's paper in the Theo- logical Review for April, 1869, entitled "The Expediency of an extended Lectionary in Public Worship."

(3) Taking the following sonnet of Milton:—

"When I consider how my light is spent Ere half my days in this dark world and wide,
And that one talent which is death to hide Lodged with me useless, though my soul more bent
To serve therewith my Maker, and present
My true account, lest He returning chide,
"Doth God exact day-labour, light denied?"
I fondly ask. But Patience, to prevent That murmur, soon replies, "God doth not need
Either man's work or his own gifts.
Who best
Bear his mild yoke, they serve him best. His state
Is kingly: thousands at his bidding speed,
And post o'er land and ocean without rest;
They also serve who only stand and wait."

I would ask, Does this psalm of the "mighty-mouthed inventor of harmonies" and "God-gifted organ-voice of England" lack any authority of the "fit word (thought?) perfectly expressed"? And is it less appropriate for worship than the Hebrew psalms, often badly translated, in both versions of the Bible?

H. RAWLINGS.

SIR,—I think it must be quite thirty years since I advocated, in your columns and in those of the Unitarian Herald, the occasional use of extra-Biblical Lessons in our public services. I did not meet with any encouragement from either, but I am glad to see that THE INQUIRER is now not altogether unfavourable to the practice which I have followed for so many years, with the full consent of my congregation, and, as I believe, to their edification. I have not the advantage of being acquainted with the book to which Mr. Hopps refers, but I have long kept a copy of Conway's "Sacred Anthology" in my pulpit, although I do not now use it much. I find lessons equally good in Seneca, M. Aurelius, Plato, Cicero; in our own poets, especially Wordsworth and Tennyson; in the American, Lowell, also; in Carlyle, Ruskin, Emerson, Parker, &c. My usual custom is to give one lesson from the Bible and another from some other source, and I venture to think our ministers would render their services more attractive by adopting a similar plan where they have not already done so. I agree with Mr. Hopps in thinking that the exclusive use of the Bible is not very consistent with our principles, or indeed with any sort of recognition of the results of modern criticism. As to the Revised Version, I see no advantage in substituting it for the old one. Neither is perfect, and the many needless changes in the Revised Version are irritating. Why cannot the minister read his lesson beforehand with the Revised Version, or the original, before him, and then make such corrections as he thinks really called for, with or without an explanation as to the reason of the change?

ROBERT B. DRUMMOND.

10, Hartington Gardens, Edinburgh,
January 31, 1906.

SIR,—As the Rev. W. C. Bowie has compiled an admirable Service Book and Ministerial Hand-book for our churches, ought not our Unitarian Association to arrange with him to bring out a companion volume of "Sacred Readings" for the pulpit. Many of us feel that the public reading of a large part of the Old Testament is rather hurtful than helpful to the ethical and devotional spirit of many in our congregations, and even many of the Psalms have to be mutilated. We have found the truth of Dr. Martineau's remark that "the doctrine of the Bible, and the whole Bible, as constituting the direct instrument of all spiritual instruction—requires to be strongly resisted and plainly exposed." The orthodox habit of giving out and reading lessons from Old and New Testament, while the congregation follow the reading in their own Bibles, has largely prevented ministers from using other and newer scriptures. We find the benefit of reading "The Psalms of the West," &c., at our domestic devotions, believing that the great minds of each age in succession are the channels of God's special message which the needs of that age require. Is it not, therefore, high time that we Unitarians had a carefully prepared volume, that our members could also procure and use, the minister announcing the page or title? It becomes difficult to select suitable passages from those sixty-six books always; for we realise the confused and self-contradictory ideas which they contain of both morals and religion. No wonder Dr. Martineau said sixty years ago "the party-cry of the present day about scriptural education demands great plainness of speech," and I scruple not to denounce it as a demoralising and corrupting superstition. Our faith and sincerity call for that enlarged lectionary.

G. V. CROOK.

AUTHORISED V. REVISED VERSION.

SIR,—There is a practical aspect of this question which I have not yet seen touched upon. Our fathers in providing the Authorised Version for pulpit and lectionary use were careful to get fine large type editions. I have preached in a large number of our English churches, and in only two instances (Stand and Padiham) have I found similar large type pulpit Bibles in the Revised Version provided. In those cases, even in our larger congregations, the poor octavo edition in small pica, quite unsuitable for effective use in public reading, is found. Happily, on looking under the seat or in the bottom of the pulpit one can usually find the discarded Authorised Version in noble type. With the total disregard of the provision of ample light at prayer desk and pulpit by the designers of modern church buildings, it is all the more needful to have the Bible in large clear type.

BOOKS, NEW AND OLD.

A GUIDE-BOOK is a somewhat doubtful guest in a library. It is never quite sure of its position, and is often ill at ease in company with volumes of more aristocratic pretensions. And yet every traveller is fond of the battered guide-books that have gone journeying with him. As they look down upon him from his shelves, or he turns over their pages by the winter fire, they recall with a clearness, which even photographs cannot excel, the spacious days of adventure and the places of his soul's pilgrimage. His old Swiss Baedeker, or Murray's "Rome," or a poorly printed local guide bought in some French or Italian town, may arouse a human emotion or re-kindle intellectual interests with a swiftness which many masters of literary effect might envy.

These are the books of the open road, in which every detail down to the price of dinner at some indifferent inn is of absorbing interest. But there is another class of guide-book of an entirely different kind. It is written by a trained scholar. It deals with a special department of human knowledge. It has for its object to help us to study intelligently and in their proper historical setting the great treasures of the human past. I have on my desk as I write four shilling guide-books of this description, issued by order of the trustees of the British Museum. They deal respectively with the antiquities of the Stone and the Bronze Age, with Babylonian and Assyrian antiquities, and Early Christian and Byzantine antiquities. They are all profusely and beautifully illustrated, and even in this period of cheap books they must bear the palm as among the best shilling books in existence.

I have had occasion lately to read again the admirable introduction of fifty pages in the "Guide to the Early Christian and Byzantine Antiquities," and I should like to recommend it to readers who are interested in the subject, and not less to those who, with a little persuasion, are capable of having their interest aroused. It sketches the chief lines of study and the larger problems of artistic development with admirable clearness, and it is a real contribution to English scholarship in a department where much of the best work has been done by foreign students. On a much larger scale there is the useful handbook of "Christian Art and Archaeology," by Walter Lowrie, and there are German books like Schulze's "Archæologie der althristlichen Kunst," which are within the reach of ordinary students; but most of the books, like the monographs by Marucchi and Wilpert, and the more recent work of Strzygowski, are very expensive and difficult to procure.

The British Museum Guide is successful in bringing out the essentially symbolical character of Early Christian art. There is practically no interest either in painting a picture or drawing a portrait. The Old Testament incidents are used simply as Christian types. What we find most frequently are detached symbols—the alphabet of primitive Christian piety—the dove, the fish, the ship, the palm-branch, the sacred monogram. In the catacombs there is no attempt to fashion a portrait of any sacred person; even the likeness of the Saviour is conspicuous by its absence, for the youthful figure of the Good Shepherd, instinct as it is with the idea of saving love, is clearly not to be reckoned among the early portraits of Christ. Perhaps an exception to this statement may be found in a bronze medallion preserved in the Vatican Museum, bearing upon it the heads of the two Apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul. In the strongly contrasted individuality of these two heads it is tempting to see the influence of some traditional likeness. The date of the work is quite uncertain; but it may belong possibly to the end of the second century.

Our Guide has very little to tell us about Christian inscriptions, for the simple reason that they cannot be illustrated in the Museum collection. In this special branch of the subject the gallery of Christian inscriptions in the Lateran Museum retains its local monopoly. Fortunately, however, inscriptions can be studied quite as well in books, and the vivid historical impression which they make upon the mind is not confined to those who have seen and deciphered the original slabs of stone. For the English reader the best book on the subject is the second volume of Northcote and Brownlow's "Roma Sotterranea," though, unfortunately, it has become both rare and expensive. At first sight these inscriptions are distinctly disappointing. We are struck by their meagreness, by their silence, by their provoking brevity. It is when we view them as a study in contrasts that we appreciate their real significance.

Anyone who will take the trouble to read a large number of pagan epitaphs of the same period will be struck by their terrible hopelessness. "Dust we are and to dust we shall return," is their prevailing burden. "Vale, vale, dulcissima; semper in perpetuo vale." Even the noble cadence of the words cannot conceal the bitterness of heart that inspired them. Sometimes there is a quaint touch, as in these lines, placed by a father on the grave of his daughter: "Men fall like apples, some when they are young and sour, others when they are mellow and ripe." Here are other examples which tell their own story: "I have been seeking gain all my life, and always losing. Now death has come, and I can't do either the one or the other. I hope that you who read this will live happily." "I lived as I liked, but I don't know why I died." "Once I was not; now I am not; I know nothing about it; it does not concern me." Some are more serious, though with a curious touch of moral complacency, like the following: "I have restored everything committed to my trust; I have not committed adultery; I have not been quarrelsome; I have done what I could." "I have been pious and holy; I lived as long as I could; I have never had any lawsuit or grumbling or debts; I have been always faithful to my friends; I had a small fortune, but a great mind." Often love of parents and other family virtues are emphasised: "Our hope was in our boy; now all is ashes and lamentations." The virtues and accomplishments of children are recorded, their beauty and their skill in dancing. One little girl is described as obedient to her mother and the favourite of all: "Matri obsequens, placita omnibus." Many womanly virtues are recognised and praised: "She never gave a bad word to her husband." "I never had any complaint to make of her at all." "She never committed any fault except by dying." Here, in conclusion is the sweetest of all these pagan epitaphs. We catch still, as we read it the savour of womanly grace and the piety of a soul: "naturaliter Christiana"—"a mother to all the world; one who came to the help of all who were in need, and never saddened anyone." But this kind of memorial belongs to all times and places where the influence of a good woman is felt. I read its fellow once in a churchyard among the Alps, "Mutter der Armen"—a mother to the poor.

There are hardly any of these pagan inscriptions which could occur upon a Christian tomb. Death in most of them is the great enemy who holds man in his grip. Now there is an undertone of rebellion, now a bitter cry of despair. Nowhere is there any sure and certain hope, or any sign of that peacefulness of heart which is its fruit. The moving eloquence of the Christian epitaphs is their sameness and simplicity. Words like "Life," "Refreshment," "Peace," occur again and again. "Sweet Faustina, mayest thou live in God." "To dear Cyriacus, sweetest son. Mayest thou live in the Holy Spirit." "Peace to thy soul." "Thy spirit is in peace." "Called away by angels." "Mayest thou live among the holy ones." Multiply these brief sentences a hundred-fold, and you will have some idea of the cumulative effect of these Christian epitaphs. They are so pathetically brief and simple, because they are so full of an unutterable faith in God. We are in a new world, in which life and immortality have been brought to light through the Gospel.

But to return to our Guide after this long digression. The student of architecture will find much to interest him in the short account of the origin and development of church building. The prevalent tendency, however, is much more decided to trace the influence of Oriental types in Western building. In other words, we must look for the cradle of Christian architecture not in Rome, but in the vanished civilisation of Asia Minor. The best presentment of this point of view for people who are not specialists, is to be found in Mr. Lethaby's book on "Mediaeval Art." No other book tells the story of Christian building as a continuous development so admirably and with all the resources of modern knowledge. It is, moreover, the work of an artist, whose critical faculty and fine perception set many familiar beauties in a new light. What, for instance, could be better than this: "On consideration of the many surpassing excellences to be found in Gothic windows, both in their stone frames and the glass which fills them—the essential and high part that they fill in the economy of the building; the scale, frequently upwards of a thousand square feet, whereby the figured glass may be seen by a concourse of people; and, above all, the way in which such a window lends itself to and becomes part of, the glory of light—I am forced to say that the window of dyed glass is the most perfect art-form known. So anyone must feel who has watched the changing hues of the windows of Chartres Bourges or Rheims through a summer's afternoon, from the hour when the shadows of the flying buttresses fall in great bands across the burning glass, to the twilight when they fade and hardly glimmer in the gloom of the vaults." Enthusiasm like this is infectious. As I read I find my feet tingling to go on a pilgrimage, and my thoughts engaged rapturously in the delights of a guide-book.

W. H. D.

DR. SANDAY ON THE FOURTH GOSPEL.*

THE book before us contains the substance of eight lectures which were originally delivered late in 1904 on the Morse Foundation in New York, and afterwards, with some changes, in Oxford. They were intended to contest that view of the Fourth Gospel which is more or less common to Jülicher's "Introduction to the New Testament." Schmiedel's article on "John the Son of Zebedee" in the "Encyclopædia Biblica," Jean Réville's work on the Gospel, and Abbé Loisy's Commentary. Between the time when Dr. Sanday committed himself to a course of lectures on this subject and the time of their actual delivery, two works appeared which to a large extent covered the ground and performed the task which he had chosen. He offers this course as an appendix to those two books, "partly to reinforce points already made, and partly, it may be, in some small degree, to supplement them."

But Dr. Sanday's estimate of his own work is in one sense too modest. The plan which he follows, and the ability and resource which he employs, give to this book an independent value, quite apart from the interest it commands as marking the present line of defence in Anglican apologetic. From another point of view we must allow that this work is not in the first line of importance. It is not undertaken with an impartial desire to attain the truth of the matter with which it deals. It is a contribution to advocacy rather than to science. "I propose," says the lecturer, "to defend the traditional view, or (as an alternative) something so near to the traditional view that it will count as the same thing." Dr. Sanday seeks to justify this attitude in a series of arguments every one of which would be equally valid if pleaded by a traditional Buddhist, instead of a traditional Christian, and one of which seems open to attack on the ethical side. "No one undertakes to write on any subject with his mind in the state of a sheet of white paper. We all start with a number of general principles and general beliefs, conscious or unconscious, fixed or provisional." No doubt; but just so far as these are of a kind which predetermine our answer to the questions we pretend to investigate, they vitiate our methods and rob our conclusions of value. We ought to seek to escape from such limitations, and assuredly not to cherish them and boast of them:

Dr. Sanday quotes with approval the words of an American Methodist Bishop about the majority of his pupils: "They want to keep their faith; and yet they all want to see the realities of things." In this saying much depends on the meaning we attach to "faith." Dr. Sanday wants to keep his faith that the Fourth Gospel was written by John the son of Zebedee; and yet he also wants to see, so far as this faith will allow it, the realities of things. The result is in the highest degree interesting. While his work is, in form, a defence of tradition, it would be a "dangerous" book to give to a young orthodox person who knew nothing of these controversies. He would find in it an astonishing revelation of the insecurity of the traditional case.

The two books which, in Dr. Sanday's words, "did better than I could hope to do the very thing that I desired," are the first part of Professor Stanton's "The Gospels as Historical Documents," and "The Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel," by Dr. James Drummond. Dr. Sanday refers to Professor Stanton's work in two places, both of which are concerned with the duel between that writer and Professor Schmiedel in the Hibbert Journal. In the second reference Dr. Sanday seems to hold with Schmiedel, and against Dr. Stanton, that there is no really significant coincidence of expression between the Ignatian letters and the Johannine literature. The references to Dr. Drummond's book are much more numerous and important. Not only is the name of the Principal of Manchester College followed in the index by the longest list of figures, not only is he quoted at length again and again with delighted and sometimes enthusiastic approval; Dr. Sanday may be said to have adopted Dr. Drummond's position, and to figure in this work as his disciple. "I have indeed the ambition," he says in the second lecture, "not only to state a case in regard to the Fourth Gospel, but also at the same time to contribute, if I may, to the work, so admirably initiated by Dr. Drummond, of commending by the way what I conceive to be sound principles of criticism, as contrasted with others which I consider unsound." When we remember that Dr. Drummond's conclusion, while it assigns the authorship of the Gospel to the Apostle John, withholds from it the credit of a trustworthy historical document, we are made vividly aware how far the rear line of criticism has travelled during the last few years.

There is one passage in which Dr. Sanday's eagerness to agree with Dr. Drummond has led him to misunderstand his author. Dr. Drummond is dealing with the common orthodox assertion that a second-century "Gospel according to John" would be a literary miracle. "In making this allegation," he writes "people seem to forget that the book is in any case unique. Whether it be true history, or the offspring of spiritual imagination, or a mixture of both, no one, so far as we know, could have written it in the second, or any other century, except the man who did write it; and to assert that an unexampled, unknown, and unmeasured literary genius could not have done this or that appears to me extremely hazardous." Upon this passage Dr. Sanday comments: "Perfectly true; there doubtless is the possibility that 'an unexampled, unknown, and unmeasured genius' could have done what we find. But as a rule, where facts can be explained easily and naturally without having recourse to any such extraordinary assumption, the world is content so to explain them." This is to sway the balance of Dr. Drummond's observation to the opposite side—to make it implicitly deny the possibility which it explicitly affirms. In Dr. Drummond's mind the words "unexampled, unknown, and unmeasured literary genius" represent no "extraordinary assumption"; they describe the author of the Fourth Gospel, whether his name was John or not, and whether his father's name was Zebedee or not.

The debt which the apologist owes to the representative of free inquiry is undoubtedly very great. At each crisis of the argument the reader soon learns to expect, not in vain, an appeal to Dr. Drummond. He is called in to rebut the inference usually based on xxi. 23, that the last chapter of the Gospel is an appendix by a later hand (p. 81); to establish what Dr. Sanday calls the "pragmatism" of the Gospel—that is, its seemingly unmotivated precision in name and date—its wonderful variety of character, and the graphic nature of its descriptions (pp. 110 sqq.); to disprove the thesis that the discourses in this Gospel are longer than those recorded by the Synoptics (p. 166); to disconnect it from Philo, by asserting "the total absence of Philo's special vocabulary" (p. 192), and by suggesting that the term Paraclete is applied by Philo not to the Logos, but to the Cosmos (p. 197); to confirm, by a subtle agnostic argument, Justin's acquaintance with the Fourth Gospel as we have it (pp. 33 and 247); and especially to arm Dr. Sanday with one of his chief weapons, an invalidation of the argumentum a silentio (pp. 34 sqq.). The paragraph and note which are quoted from Dr. Drummond's book on this last head are certainly very weighty and telling; but our lecturer's delight in them leads him to extravagant lengths. He seems in some passages to imply that the fact that a book is not cited before a particular date yields the assumption that it must have existed long before. "It is a common thing among critics," Dr. Sanday complains, "to think it unnecessary to allow any but the smallest interval between the first production of a book, and the date of its first mention in the literature that happens to be extant." (p. 56). A similar point of view is revealed in a passage on p. 40. Barn. iv. 14 may be an inaccurate citation of a passage in 4 Ezra, or it may be (so far as the text goes) a citation of a saying of Christ as scripture. Schmiedel's contention that such an estimate of the Gospels, forty years before the earliest admitted instance, would be surprising, is dismissed as an argument from silence, and Dr. Sanday proceeds: "It is reasonable to suppose that there was a gradual development in the process by which the Gospels attained to the position that we call canonical; but the data to which we have access do not allow us to map out its stages with any precision." If this is not a bald truism it means that, when data fails us, we are at liberty to sketch in any hypothetical state of things which suits our predilections, and the objection that our fabric is baseless is invalid, because it is an argumentum a silentio.

In two cases, indeed—the omission of the raising of Lazarus from the Synoptic Record, and the silence of Eusebius about the slaying of John ὁ θεολόγος, which is asserted in a statement ascribed to Papias—Dr. Sanday allows to the argument some little weight. But about the first he afterwards says, "Even the conspicuous example of the raising of Lazarus does not shake me in my distrust of the argument from silence," and with reference to the second, "I do not feel that the statement altogether loses its force." It must be owned that the second case is much less cogent than the first. The use of the one phrase argumentum a silentio to cover such widely different kinds of inference is in itself a fallacy, and the indiscriminate condemnation of them all is a fallacy in a higher power.

The most interesting discussions are that in Lecture III. on the Identity of the Evangelist, on the Doctrine of the Logos (Lecture VI.), and especially on the Christology of the Gospel (Lecture VII.). In the first of these Dr. Sanday keeps a nice poise between Delf's hypothesis that the Beloved Disciple was at once the "other disciple" of John xviii. 15 and John of Ephesus, and the traditional view that he was John, the son of Zebedee; finally he bends the argument just a trifle to the traditional side. It would be an interesting exercise to accommodate the theory of Hugo Delf to that of H. H. Wendt. If the Beloved Disciple had a germinal historical basis, and the Gospel can be shown to embody a genuine historical record of the Judæan ministry of Jesus, it seems natural to connect the one with the other, and both with Professor Bacon's view that the Gospel had its origin in Palestine. In his treatment of the Logos our lecturer reduces as far as possible the connection between the Evangelist and Philo, and argues against any literary connection whatever. Here, of course, Dr. Drummond is of great service to him. Lecture VII. examines the relation between the Johannine and the Pauline Christology. Dr. Sanday will not allow that the Johannine is a development of the Pauline Christology, or that the Pauline is, in any significant degree, original in St. Paul. He assigns both to none other than Jesus himself. "There is no direct affiliation, but the parentage of both lies behind. Many a seed sprouted in the early years of the Pentecostal Church; but it was not this apostle or that who made them grow; the seeds were sown before Pentecost, and they had their watering and their growth and their increase from the same Hand." This is beautifully said, but the arguments adduced in its support are extremely weak. The ordinary theory, says Dr. Sanday, "involves that the Pauline Gospel not only conquered the West, but that it came flooding back in a great reflux-wave all over the East. The East, on this theory, has no power of resistance" (p. 229). The turn of expression in this sentence implies that by "the East" is meant Palestine; but if so, the statement seems to be directly at variance with fact. The ordinary critical theory excepts Palestine from the influence of the Pauline speculation. It is not Wernle, but Dr. Sanday himself, who says, "The Mother Church was not Ebionite, or St. Paul would have been in still sharper antagonism to it than he was," and to most minds the "antagonism" expounded in Galatians seems sharp enough.

Dr. Sanday's work is, it need not be said, characterised by a scholarly dignity, temperance, and refinement. In one respect however, it falls from time to time below its own best standard. In his review of other critics, in the earlier lectures, he adopts an almost zoological tone (pp. 26 sqq.); and the accent of the superior person is sometimes heard. "Samuel Johnson, excellent person as he was, is not the only critic who has had the misfortune to be born (metaphorically, if not physically) with a 'great foot' and a heavy hand" (p. 80).

The lecturer's apologetic bias inevitably colours his phrases, and leads sometimes to the suggestion of a false dilemma; as when we see implied on p. 143 that the only alternative to the theory that the evangelist was conscious of writing with authority is that of forgery; or, on p. 176, that we must choose between a belief in miracle and a belief that Christianity arose "out of a series of trivial misunderstandings." A pair of passages may be noticed where Dr. Sanday's argument seems especially weak. In discussing Wendt's distinction between the passages in which Jesus appeals to his "works," and those in which he appeals to "signs," Dr. Sanday says:—"We remember, however, that the combination of 'signs' and 'wonders' occurs markedly in St. Paul : : : and is indeed characteristic of early Christian literature long before the Fourth Gospel was written" (p. 23). This remark, with which the subject is dismissed, has no bearing whatever upon Dr. Wendt's literary analysis. In a section on the Nature of the Discourses Dr. Sanday observes:—"It has often been remarked that we are constantly left in doubt where the words of our Lord end and those of the Evangelist begin," and offers to produce from St. Paul "a parallel which has always seemed to me very exact and very illuminating." This turns out to be Gal. ii. 11 sqq., where the writer, after relating his experiences with the "pillars" in Antioch, up to the point where he rebukes Cephas (ver. 14), proceeds to comment upon them in what Dr. Sanday calls "one of his own abstruse doctrinal arguments" (p. 168). This is no parallel at all. The words are throughout the words of Paul, and we are left in no doubt as to where the story ends and the comment begins.

The book is furnished with a good index, in which there is one curious mistake. "The distinction which Bacon noted between the minds that are quick to observe resemblances and those that are quick to observe differences" is credited to Professor Benjamin W. Bacon, of Yale. E. W. LUMMIS.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Essex Hall Year Book for 1906, edited by W. Copeland Bowie, secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, is marked as the "seventeenth year of issue." It has appeared somewhat later than usual, because a considerable addition, involving a large amount of careful work, has been made to its contents. The list of ministers already had under each name a note of his successive settlements, but now the list of congregations has also (within limits) been similarly enriched by a record of their successive ministers. We say "within limits" to warn the historical student not to expect too much. "From about the year 1875," the record runs, which may be useful enough for practical purposes, but is aggravating for those who would like to see the honourable history of their church in the past also recorded. Thus, both under Hope-street, Liverpool, and Little Portland-street, London, Dr. Martineau's ministry is unrecorded. Ullet-road (Renshaw-street) begins with Charles Beard; York, with C. H. Wellbeloved in 1876; the Great Meeting, Leicester, with J. Page Hopps in 1876; Bank-street, Bury, with Douglas Walmsley in 1874. As a rule, only churches of quite recent origin have the list of their ministers complete. There is occasional latitude, as under the Free Christian Church, Leicester, W. Mitchell, 1866-69, and Southampton, Edmund Kell, 1853-74. It is a question whether the record might not usefully go back at least another quarter of a century. 1844, the year of the passing of the Dissenters' Chapels Act, would be a date of real historical significance from which to start, if 1882, the year of the foundation of the National Conference of our Churches, is too recent as a point of departure. For the rest, the Year Book is as full as ever of useful information, and the section on "Liberal Religion in Foreign Countries" is of special interest. (Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. 1s. net.)

The Schoolmaster's Year Book and Directory, 1906, is the fourth annual issue of this most useful publication, "a reference book of secondary education in England and Wales," including general information as to the administration of secondary education (with the full text of recent Acts), an account of educational Societies and organisations, Universities, Colleges, &c., a section on examinations and inspection, and a chronicle of the year. The second and larger half of the volume of over a thousand pages, has a Directory of Masters of Secondary Schools, and an alphabetical list of the schools, with their masters added. (Sonnenschein. 6s. net.)

The English Woman's Year Book and Directory, 1906, edited by Emily Janes, organising secretary of the National Union of Women Workers of Great Britain and Ireland, is well known as an admirable guide to all that concerns the educational, social, and industrial interests of women. The preface concludes with the following passage: "The untrained worker who seeks for paid work in the British Islands is much at a discount; it is some relief to know that the highly specialised person is less wanted in the Colonies, and that the girl or woman with good antecedents, good character, good sense, and ready adaptability, is there in demand. I know that this book is used by many persons who wish to help others to the choice of a career. Can I emphasise too strongly the need for parents to make home-life and home-training a fitting preparation for the serious duties of life—for their girls as well as for their boys? If the English Woman's Year Book can do anything to impress a sense of responsibility on the women of to-day with regard to the education of the young, the choice of a profession, or obedience to a vocation, the claims of the industrial classes, and of the weak, the helpless, and the fallen, the task of compiling the book will be its own reward." (A. & C. Black. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Writers' and Artists' Year Book, 1906, a Directory of Writers, Artists, and Photographers, will be found useful to those who seek to make their way by any form of literary effort. It will not teach them how to write, but may show them where to dispose of good writing. (A. & C. Black. 1s. net.)

Did Shakespeare Write "Titus Andronicus"? In this "Study in Elizabethan Literature" Mr. J. M. Robertson concludes, after systematic examination of evidence, external and internal, that this "most coarsely repulsive play in the entire Elizabethan drama" is merely Shakespeare's metrical revision for the press, of an old play more than once re-cast, the earlier collaborators or revisers being Peele, Greene, and perhaps also Kyd and Lodge. (Watts & Co., 5s. net.)

A new edition of John Stuart Mill's essay on The Subjection of Women is issued, with an introductory analysis by Dr. Stanton Coit, and some notes as to the progress of the Women's movement since the publication of Mill's essay in 1869. (Longmans. 6d. net.)

Philips' New Shilling Scripture Atlas, with thirty-six maps and index, measures about 11 inches by 9, and the maps appear to be very good and clear. One page shows plans of ancient and modern Jerusalem side by side, with a smaller view of Jerusalem from the Mount of Olives in a corner. There is also an interesting map of the environs of Jerusalem, and another of Galilee. The physical map of Palestine has also small sketches of the contour of the country in section, showing the height of the hills and the depth of the lakes, with their level and that of the Jordan below the level of the sea. (G. Philip & Son, Fleet-street, E.C., and South Castle-street, Liverpool. 1s.)

Two Services of Public Prayer, reprinted from "Home Prayers," by James Martineau, are the well-known "Ninth" and "Tenth" of the "Ten Services," in the production of which Dr. Martineau was associated with Dr. Sadler. This separate issue contains also the morning and evening collects and a prayer for the opening of a new place of worship. We may hope that in this form the two services will find their way into many new hands as a classic of devotional literature. The canticles no less than the prayers rank among the noblest and most beautiful of modern times. (Longmans. 1s.)

OBITUARY.

FREDERICK LONG.

MR. FREDERICK LONG died on January 24 in his sixty-third year. He was born in Bermondsey. Of late years he lived at Anerley, but for the greater part of his life he resided in Southwark, where, for a quarter of a century, he took an active part in public life, especially in connection with the Parliamentary candidature of George Odger, and the election of women as members of the London School Board. As honorary secretary to these movements he came into intimate connection with John Stuart Mill, Professor Fawcett, Peter Taylor, and other advanced Liberals of the time. In 1880, with the help of the late George Palmer of Reading, and others who held him in high esteem for his public work, Mr. Long founded the Nineteenth Century Building Society, of which he was manager up to the time of his death. For thirty years he was the treasurer of the Sunday Society, and an active member of its committee until 1896, when the doors of our National Museums and Galleries were first unlocked on Sundays.

In the sixties young Long was a member of Charles Spurgeon's congregation, but before he was out of his teens he found the theology of the great preacher too narrow to hold him, though he ever had a kind thought for his old pastor. In later years he was in sympathy with the Unitarian body, though he never joined any congregation. He always had a feeling that the Unitarian services are not in accord with the breadth of the Unitarian position. For instance, he strongly objected to the exclusive use of the Bible as if it were the depository of all the religious literature of the ages.

He was a deep political thinker, and, though an ardent Liberal, the term was to his mind synonymous with liberty. His last letter to me on a public question was in reply to one on the British constitution. He wrote: "As to 'conserving the fundamental principle of the British constitution—personal liberty and responsibility'—I am, of course, entirely in favour; while as to 'limiting the functions of governing bodies accordingly,' I am quite in favour of that also."

Mr. Long was an earnest worker for the causes he espoused, an excellent organiser, and one who was always where the detail had to be done, leaving to others the more attractive part of the work.

MARK H. JUDGE.

The funeral took place on January 27, at the Crystal Palace District Cemetery, the service being conducted by the Rev. Henry Gow, B.A., and in addition to the many members of the family many friends were present, including Sir Henry Lawrence, Bart. (chairman of the Nineteenth Century Building Society), Miss Eliza Orme, Mr. Mark H. Judge (honorary secretary of the Sunday Society), Mr. Marchmont, Mr. Brewster, Mr. Ascot, Mr. and Mrs. Serrano, Mr. Howard, Mr. Murray, the Misses Barker and Mr. Hefferman.

In the course of a brief sympathetic address Mr. Gow spoke as follows of Mr. Long:—

"You remember him with honour as an upright, faithful business man, a man to be relied on and trusted. You remember him as a free, true man, loving truth and freedom, working for noble causes with strong enthusiasm and wise counsels and tireless energy. He cared little for name and fame, but only that the work he had undertaken should be done. Men far better known than he looked to him and leant on him as one of the chief organisers of success. He was a self-made man, and he cared deeply for the interests of the poor and the ignorant. In his connection with the work of the Sunday Society, which lasted many years, he strove to give larger opportunities for instruction and culture and happiness to those who are without leisure in the week. His love for freedom, his desire for a fuller, more rational use of Sunday was united with a reverence for all that makes for true religion, and a longing that Sunday should become more truly sacred by being used for all good and noble purposes."

ABRAHAM SHARP.

BRADFORD has lost a veteran, an old Chartist, a teetotaler for more than sixty years, in Mr. Abraham Sharp, who passed away at the house of his granddaughter in Rhine-street, Wakefield-road, on Saturday, January 20, in his 91st year.

A native of Thornton Valley, where he was born at School Green, October 15, 1815, Abraham Sharp was, like his father, a handloom weaver, and early threw himself with great earnestness into the Chartist movement. He was also a prominent temperance worker, and later in the political field won the esteem of W. E. Foster and other leading men. At one time he was in America for over a year, but returned to his own country. The funeral, which took place on Tuesday, January 23, was marked by many tokens of respect, and was attended by several temperance veterans of over eighty years. The service at the Scholemoor Cemetery was conducted by the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, who, in the course of his address, said:—

"Mr. Abraham Sharp was a remarkable man in many ways. In this great community he was a unique personality. Born in the year of Waterloo, in days when there were fewer advantages for the children of hard toilers, it cost him much effort to improve his mind in the way he did. Even in his boyhood days he kept in close touch with the higher things. He took the deepest interest in unpopular causes at a time when it was dangerous to do so. He became a strong advocate of the cause of sobriety, and that of all free institutions. His memory reached back to the year 1832, which was the dawn of political liberty in this country. As we listened to him we felt that he was a man of strong convictions, who spoke because he believed that the principles which he advocated were based on truth and righteousness.

"As his minister and friend, I can also speak of his strong religious convictions. He summed up his views on religion in the two great principles—'The Fatherhood of God' and 'The Brotherhood of Men.' In his extreme old age he was much comforted by the thought that God was his merciful and loving Father, who would be his truest Friend for ever."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

We are glad because He cares for us.

It is a wonderful gladness which comes to us as we learn to do our Father's will, and understand what duty really means. That is just being true to the best that is in us, and doing what we know to be right, standing by it bravely, ready to suffer for it, if it has to be so.

I spoke of this a fortnight ago, when I described what might happen to a boy who went with his father through the excitement and danger of a public meeting in troubled times and the roughness of the crowd outside, and what boys who are true and brave often have to go through by themselves at school.

It is a secret strength that comes into one's heart, simply by being true to what we know is right, when something is bravely done, or just patiently and bravely endured, in the midst of violence or ridicule—a secret strength which brings with it a great gladness, because it tells us that there is Another who cares, and we are not really alone in that struggle for the right.

That is what Jesus said, and felt so deeply in his life: "I am not alone, because the Father is with me." It is God who cares. It is His love of the right, and love of us, His children, which makes us so glad, though we might seem to have been left all alone to fight our own battle. He is always with us. It is His strength, the strength of eternal righteousness, which nerves us and makes us so strong, with a rejoicing strength, when we dare to do our duty and suffer for the right.

It is God who is with us, and in the simple things of common life and daily duty we are beginning to learn those lessons of faithfulness, and trust, and love, which make the glory of full-grown manhood and the great heroes and martyrs of the world. In them we see the greatest examples of that glorious strength which is given to those who hold fast to righteousness, and at all costs do their duty. When in the days of persecution the early Christian martyrs refused to offer sacrifice to the heathen deities, and would not deny that they were followers of Jesus, it was because they knew that they had hold of the higher truth, it was a better life they had learnt to lead, and their duty was to declare its truth, and to do the loving service in which the truth was best expressed. It would have been cowardice and treachery to deny it, or pretend they did not really care, or in any way to conceal it and hold back from declaring it to the world. And when they were thrown into prison and cruelly treated and at last brought out to face a dreadful death—to be torn to pieces perhaps by savage beasts in the amphitheatre, with crowds of hostile people looking on and gloating over their death, they were really the conquerors, for they could not be moved, but had that great quietness of heart and strength and gladness of spirit given to those who dare to be true. They were not alone, in the midst of their cruel enemies, but had already a hold upon the deeper life, the life hidden with God, and knew that He was with them. The tumult of the people, the agonies they had to endure, faded into nothingness before that victory of their spirit, in the calm, strong trust with which they simply held to what they knew was right, and with perfect surrender and great love gave up their lives as faithful witnesses.

It was the same when the Roman Catholic Church, in its turn, became the persecutor of heretics, and men and women who dared to open their minds to truth, and to seek a simpler and more faithful way of following Jesus than that which the Church had taught, were imprisoned, tortured, and put to cruel death, or driven out of their country, if they would not submit to the authority of the Church, and profess what they knew was not the truth. So there were many who bore a brave testimony, often quite humble men and women, who declared they could not be false to their own conscience and the light which God had given them, and so endured to the uttermost. They had the quietness, the peace of God in their hearts, and were strong and true to the last, and with a great joy passed through the flames, because God was with them.

And there have been many other faithful witnesses who were not called upon to make that last sacrifice, and yet were ready to die for the truth, and have left us the example of their noble character.

So we think of Martin Luther, the great reformer, how he stood up at the Diet of Worms, a plain monk, in face of the Emperor, and the great ones of the Church, and refused to take back the brave words he had spoken or deny what he felt to be the truth. He had seen how much evil there was in the Church, how the people were being misled and corrupted, and had pointed out a better way of discipleship; and when they said that the Pope and the great Councils of the Church were against him, he replied that he could not help that, he must follow the truth as he found it in the Scriptures, and could not act against his own conscience. They could not move him from that brave determination, and he was ready to die rather than be false to the truth as it had possessed his soul. When after that scene he got back to his lodgings he was filled with a great gladness, and said, "I am through! I am through!" for he felt that he had not betrayed the trust committed to him, and whatever happened there was a strength on his side which he knew to be of God. And happily, though he was surrounded by enemies, and knew that he took his life in his hand when he went into that city at all, he had friends also, and they, when he started to go back to Wittenberg, where he was a teacher, carried him off into a place of safety, and he became the brave leader of the Reformation in Germany, a strong, true man, who had the confidence and joy of faith in his heart, and knew that God was with him.

Many other noble men and faithful witnesses we might recall, but what I want you specially to understand is that it must be the same with us also, however humble our place of duty may be. We have to be brave and true, exactly in the same way, that we also may have the gladness and strength of the same trust in God.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 3, 1906.

A GENEROUS PROPOSAL.

LAST autumn Dr. HERBERT-SMITH first made his suggestion of a "Boston Conference Fund," and at once took vigorous steps towards its realisation. A letter from him on the subject appeared in THE INQUIRER of November 4, and in the following week a report of his speech at the autumn meeting of the London District Unitarian Society, in which he further elaborated his scheme and urged its importance. We now lay before our readers the full text of the appeal, which has been issued, with the following note of approval and encouragement attached:—

We have read the annexed appeal with much pleasure, and warmly support its object, and wish it every success.

C. F. PEARSON, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

W. ARTHUR SHARPE, Past President of the same.

WILLIAM LONG, Past President of the same.

W. B. BOWRING, President of the National Triennial Conference.

LT.-COL. JESSE PILCHER, Chairman of the Committee of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester.

H. EPPS, President of the London District Unitarian Association.

H. CHATFIELD CLARKE, Past President of the same.

W. BYNG KENRICK, President of the Midland Union.

JOHN C. WARREN, Past President of the North Midland Association.

J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, President of the International Council held in London, 1901.

H. B. LAWFORD, President of the London Laymen's Club.

HAROLD WADE, Vice-President of the same.

The appeal speaks for itself, and is strongly enforced by the above note, with its influential list of representative names. Of Dr. HERBERT-SMITH, who is throwing himself with so much enthusiasm and generous devotion of his time and strength into this effort, we may say that he is a member of the Rosslyn Hill congregation at Hampstead, and was the first president of the London Laymen's Club. To many of our readers he will be known as the treasurer of the Stopford Brooke Lecture-ship Fund at University College, and now, in succession to Dr. BLAKE ODGERS, treasurer of the Sunday-school Association. He has already opened a banking account for this Conference Fund, and has received many subscriptions. It is important that the whole of the fund should be raised as speedily as possible, so that it may be placed on deposit, and the managers may then know what they have at their disposal, and may be able to make the necessary arrangements in ample time. It is obvious that if such a scheme is to be carried through to a happy issue it cannot be left over until a month or two before the Conference meets. If at least a hundred of our ministers are to go to Boston in the autumn of next year, it will mean a considerable amount of arrangement with congregations and the laymen (and women) who will have a fine opportunity of taking service in the vacant pulpits. The Conference Fund should, if possible, be completed by Midsummer, that the work of arrangement for supplies and the wholesale migration may be done without haste during the following winter.

We shall be glad to furnish the opportunity in these columns for any further elucidation of the matter that may be required, and are sure that Dr. HERBERT-SMITH will be ready to answer questions on the subject. He is also ready to pay visits to congregations, as he already has done in several cases, both in London and the Provinces, to speak or lecture in the interest of the Conference Fund. We would call special attention to the wish expressed towards the end of his letter of appeal, that every congregation may take part in this effort, not with the idea of sending its own minister, but of working for a common object, which, whoever may be enabled to go, must be for the good of all.

It is possible that the treasurers of some other funds still appealing to our people may grind their teeth at this fresh demand. This very week the Rev. ALFRED HALL reminds us once more of the urgent need of the MARTINEAU Memorial Scheme at Norwich; the Endowment Fund for the Unitarian Home Missionary College is, we believe, not yet complete; and the three new London congregations are still waiting for means to build their churches. But before this fresh appeal was made trusted advice was taken, and it is the conviction of the promoters that giving for one good object does not damage the prospects of another, but that, on the contrary, generous zeal in one direction kindles further generosity in giving. The hope of this Boston Conference Fund is one which, we believe, we do right to cherish, and to use every means in our power to promote.

THE INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER LIBERAL RELIGIOUS THINKERS AND WORKERS.

AN APPEAL.

ON May 25, 1900, the International Council was organised at Boston, U.S.A., by American and foreign delegates in attendance at the seventy-fifth anniversary of the American Unitarian Association.

It was agreed that the object of the Council should be to open communications with those who, in all lands, are striving to unite pure religion and perfect liberty; and to increase fellowship and co-operation among them.

The committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association extended a cordial invitation to the Council to hold its first assembly in London.

The Council met in London from May 28 to 31, 1901, and they were the largest and most representative gatherings of Unitarian and other liberal religious thinkers and workers ever held in England.

The second assembly of the International Council was held at Amsterdam, Holland, September 1 to 4, 1903. The president was Dr. Oort, of Leiden, the hon. sec. Professor Eerdman. About a thousand people attended, including a party of nearly two hundred from Great Britain and Ireland.

The third meeting of the International Council was held at Geneva, Switzerland, August 28 to 31, 1905, under the presidency of Professor E. Montet, University of Geneva. There was a large attendance, including upwards of two hundred representatives from the British Isles. The meetings were full of interest, and several prominent religious thinkers in Europe took part in the proceedings.

The fourth assembly of the International Council will be held at Boston in September, 1907, and it will be seen that this will commemorate the inauguration of the International Council. There is no doubt that the American Unitarians, who are indeed already at work, intend to make the next conference worthy of the occasion. Surely we in England shall not be behind in our efforts to second them! Professor Montet, the distinguished president, said at Geneva that the Americans and the English "were the strength of the movement."

It is very important that the Unitarians of Great Britain and Ireland should be represented by a large number of the ministers in active work; but owing to the heavy expense entailed by the journey few will be able to attend. The object of this appeal is to overcome this difficulty. Whilst it is most desirable that all the laymen and women who can attend should make a point of doing so, it is still more necessary that our ministers should be well represented at Boston. The knowledge, experience, and enthusiasm which would be derived from such a visit will be of incalculable benefit to them in dealing with the problems of religious work which constantly confront them at home. It is not the ministers themselves only who will benefit; through them the individual congregations will be inspired with new life, and thus the whole denomination will benefit.

There in a widely spread feeling in the churches, particularly amongst the younger members, that our work at home needs lifting up. As a denomination we do not appear to take our proper share in the social and religious work demanded of men in the present day. Some think it arises from lack of more effective organisation, and others from a lack of enthusiasm. If this really be the case, a visit to the Boston meetings will be an excellent method of infusing into our common work new faith and hope. No one who was present at Geneva can fail to recollect the splendid enthusiasm which those meetings evoked. In Boston we may expect still greater results so far as Unitarians are concerned.

One of the most noticeable and beneficial features of these conferences has been the feeling of being in touch with a great international movement. Unitarians in this country are proud of their complete freedom of thought in religious matters; but this, of necessity, produces much isolation for individuals and small congregations, which, in turn, often creates a natural feeling of depression. The experience of belonging to a great progressive movement throughout the civilised world helps to remove this sense of isolation, and one returns from these international gatherings not merely confirmed in one's religious faith, but strengthened by it.

In order that at least 100 of our ministers may be enabled to attend the meetings of the International Council at Boston, U.S.A., in September, 1907, a fund, to be called the "Boston Conference Fund," will be opened, towards which, as hon. treasurer, I appeal for donations. I estimate that it will require £3,000 to enable the committee to secure the attendance of 100 ministers. I hope that every congregation will take the matter up by forming a small committee to canvass its own members. Although there are some who can give largely, everyone can help, and any sum, however small, will be gladly received. The very fact of working together in this way is a good thing in itself, and draws the workers closer to one another.

The names of all subscribers will be published when the list is closed, but without giving the individual amounts subscribed, though, of course, all money received will be vouched for, and the accounts properly audited. As all the work of organisation will be done voluntarily, only the actual expenses will be deducted from the sums received. A small representative committee, whose proceedings will be confidential, will allocate the fund among the ministers who will go to Boston.

Donations may be sent to me direct, or given to the treasurer of the congregation to forward to me.

Letter from the General Secretary of the International Council:—

To Dr. C. Herbert-Smith.

MY DEAR SIR,—I cannot refrain from expressing to you the delight with which I read in THE INQUIRER the account of your admirable and generous proposal to raise a fund and assure a large attendance of Unitarian ministers from Great Britain at our forthcoming Congress of 1907, in Boston, U.S.A.

A number of gentlemen who were at London, Amsterdam, and Geneva are to meet in Boston in a few days, and organise the movement for the proper entertainment of our expected guests.

You may be sure that the good news of your enterprise in our behalf will rejoice them and kindle in them a responsive sentiment of hospitality equal to the pleasant emergency you place upon us. The more brethren you send us the greater the call upon us for entertainment, the more and greater will be our satisfaction. Count upon our hearty fraternal co-operation. Our British brethren in the Liberal Faith have already placed us under large obligation by the splendid reception they gave us in 1901.

If now they increase the debt of goodwill which we are carrying by bringing to a successful issue your well-conceived plan, it will greatly increase in deed our personal responsibility for a right return of all your kind services, but also give us new cause for gratitude that we have across the sea such true, devoted, and generous fellow-workers for "pure religion and perfect liberty."

The present prospect is for a large, well-attended, and interesting meeting in 1907. We will certainly do our best to make it a notable occasion in the history of Unitarianism and Liberal Christianity in general throughout the civilised world.

It will give me pleasure to keep in personal touch with you, and serve your cause in any way in my power.—Fraternally yours,

CHAS. W. WENDTE.

December 2, 1905.

The Christian Register of January 4 had the following note on "The Boston Congress of 1907":—

At the invitation of Charles W. Clifford, Esq., of New Bedford, a director of the American Unitarian Association and its delegate to the late Congress of Religious Liberals at Geneva, a party of gentlemen especially interested in the International Council and its next Congress met recently at the Union Club in Boston.

After luncheon a conference was held, presided over by Dr. Eliot, at which the subject of the forthcoming Congress in 1907 was carefully considered, and the preliminary steps taken for making this Boston meeting one of the most notable religious gatherings of the opening century. It was announced that through the generosity of Rev. Dr. Savage's congregation, the Church of the Messiah in New York, the American Unitarian Association found itself able to make a fully adequate appropriation towards the preliminary expenses of the Congress. Rev. C. W. Wendte, its secretary, would give a large portion of his time and attention to its organisation. The date of the Congress was approximately decided upon as the last week in September, 1907, subject to slight changes should the convenience of the Transatlantic delegates require it.

It was unanimously agreed to extend a fraternal invitation to all religious fellowships and individual believers in all lands, who feel themselves in sympathy with its general purpose, to participate in the Congress. A large delegation from the British Isles is promised, and the endeavour will be made to facilitate and assure a full representation of liberal religious thinkers and workers from the continent of Europe, Asia, and Australia. All the liberal fellowships of the United States are expected to participate in the organisation and work of the Congress, and the Unitarians and Universalists of Boston, as well as liberal orthodox believers, will be asked to extend hospitalities to those who come. The committees will be announced later.

TOWARDS SOCIAL REFORM.

MR. MILLIN's article on January 13 seems to me most valuable, and helps us to realise certain bed-rock principles. We recognise the imperative urgency of the problem of the unemployed, and see:—

(1) That it cannot be met by setting the unemployed to work in their own trades. The fact of their being unemployed proves that there is not sufficient demand for the product of their normal labour, whether high skilled or low skilled; and to procure them this kind of labour by means of subsidies from rates or taxes is to introduce unfair competition with those who are still thus employed, lowering the value of the product of their labour, and throwing out of work at least as many as are taken on. This seems clear and simple, but was not recognised in an article lately published in the XIXth Century.

(2) The case is different when the unemployed are set to raise food which they will largely consume themselves. In this case there is no subsidised competition with other producers. On the contrary:—

(3) If they are fed on, say, two-thirds of the product of their labour, there will remain one-third wherewith they will be able to buy clothing, and other necessities, as well as to pay rent, thus increasing the effective demand for commodities.

(4) This is the natural and normal development of society, just what is taking place in our own Colonies. This, and not something else, is what we must seek and secure if we would "colonise England," making it less "the pleasure-ground of the rich, and more the treasure-house of the poor."

(5) What hinders? Simply the question of access to the land. In some way the objects sought for in Land Nationalisation must be secured, though the process may be gradual, as, assuredly, it may be honest.

About twenty years ago I joined the Southampton Radical Association with the object of bringing before its members the subject of Land Nationalisation. I gave an address, which was followed by discussion, in which it appeared that I was the only unconverted man in the room. They were all convinced that the land belonged to the nation, and that it ought to be restored to the nation without any compensation to present owners. And this point of no compensation was the only one in which they took any living interest. I left the meeting utterly discouraged, feeling that if these were the views held by English working men generally, nothing would be done in the right direction for at least twenty years. It is now of infinite worth that what can be done, and what ought to be done, shall not again be lost sight of, or neglected as unimportant. It seems decided that land values shall be taxed, and this will give local authorities the opportunity of buying a considerable quantity of land at a fair value, and starting farm colonies, or allotments on a larger scale.

Something has been done to show the way. There is Sir Robert Edgecumbe's most successful experiment at Rew Farm, near Dorchester. This farm of 343 acres was bought and laid out at a cost of about £18 an acre. It was then sold to 27 people, in lots of about 11 acres. The purchase money was all paid up in the course of nine years; and, while the rateable value of the parish shared the general agricultural decline, the value of Rew Farm increased 60 per cent.

Some years ago the Rev. H. V. Mills published a book entitled "Poverty and the State." There was a drawing on the cover representing a pair of hands bound together with a cord, and held up entreating to be loosed, while a knife coming down from the clouds purposes to cut the bonds. It is a good illustration of the miserable situation we are in when men, able and willing to work, starve because they cannot find an employer needing their services. Mr. Mills had an opportunity of cutting the cord in certain cases, and we should like to hear how his plans succeeded; and, if they were not wholly successful, what warning is suggested by his experience.

It may be questioned whether the country has as yet fully grasped the seriousness of the problem of the unemployed. We understand it best if we know the facts of one single case, and then multiply these by the hundred-fold or the thousand-fold that accurate statistics require. Some time ago a young mother tried to drown herself, but was rescued. When brought before a magistrate she explained her conduct by saying that she could not bear to hear her children crying for food which she could not give them, and her case being inquired into, it was found that her story was true; and, moreover, that she had a husband who was sober and steady; he was not lazy and he did not gamble; but—he could not get work. Every year a considerable number of our young people leave Bridport in search of employment. I must have known at least 200 such cases. For the most part they do well, the industry of the country generally is healthy enough; it is the exceptions for which special provision has to be made. And one such exception is forcibly present to my mind—a young married man who cannot get on, so far as I can judge, through no fault of his own. Year after year the story is the same. He gets a temporary job, but the hope that it will prove permanent is disappointed. The last taken on is the first dismissed when work is slack, and he is always unfortunate. It is just the sort of case of which there are thousands, perhaps tens of thousands. What provision do we make for them?

One disastrous feature connected with the problem of the unemployed is that it so readily lends itself to the suggestion of quack remedies: These are generally connected with the fallacy of "Making Work." It is most unfortunate that we have got into a way of talking of a man wanting work, when we really mean that he wants wages. It would be easy enough to provide every man with work, the only difficulty is to find sufficient work that is remunerative. All "protection" makes more work, but by diminishing wealth tends to reduce the amount available for wages. The Old Testament records a conspicuous instance of "making work," viz., when Pharaoh refused to supply the Israelites with straw, and yet exacted the same toll of bricks. The Israelites were not grateful for having this extra work made for them. But if they had been a hungry crowd of unemployed labourers hanging about the brickyards eager to be taken on for a job, as might well be the case under the conditions of our modern civilisation, they would have rejoiced over Pharaoh's edict. How is it that we are involved in this strange and eminently unsatisfactory state of thing? Plainly because the people have not access to the land. There is one country where there is a great demand for low-skilled labour, and where the supply, though large, furnished by an abundant native population is not adequate. This is South Africa, where the Kaffirs have access to the land, and can raise their food thereon, and are free to work in the mines or not as they like, without being driven thereto by hunger. The "unemployed" in Johannesburg are the whites, who, for one reason or another, have not the resource available to the large native population.

So we come round again to this cry, "The land to the people, and the people to the land," and I believe all sound economic reasoning will ever bring us to this point. One danger ahead may be this—setting these farm colonies to produce the most profitable crops, and sending these into the market as subsidised competitors against similar crops that are now being produced by independent capital and labour. This danger is obvious enough, but I have not seen it guarded against in several proposals that have been made to ensure the financial success of these colonies. The difficulty can, however, be met, if the colonists work in the first instance, at any rate, to supply their own food. The fact is, this whole business of seeking a market is a topsy-turvy state of things, and indicates that modern industry is a pyramid poised on its apex, and requiring somewhat frantic efforts to keep it in position. Commodities should be made because they are wanted, supply should follow demand; and, of course, in the long run and on the large scale, this must be the order. But what is always to the front with insistent clamour is the claim of things that have been made to be sold. The supply is there and begs for a demand. Hence the seller of commodities solicits the patronage of the purchaser as a favour, whereas in all honest trade the favour should be mutual. This matters a good deal when a man has to sell his labour. For one thing his labour will not keep to be sold the next day if not wanted this: Time gone never comes back. Moreover, while he is waiting he wants to eat, and often to feed others: If two men are seeking one job they are in a false position, if the alternatives are that job or nothing: I like to think of the young Yorkshire blacksmith, Robert Collyer, who tells us of his resolve to go somewhere where the work would seek him, not he the work; and so emigrated to America; and if we would "colonise England" we must, in a true sense, restore the land to the people.

I have left myself little space to call attention to another point, which I hope some other writer will take up. It was the practical recommendation of Mr. Charles Booth, arrived at after his exhaustive analysis, to take away Class B and nurse it, to treat it with kindness, but to prevent it competing with and dragging down Classes C and D. Are any of our schemes giving due heed to that most valuable advice?

Another matter on which detailed information is most desirable is the system of classification applied to the unemployed on the Continent. Knowledge on this subject should be popularised, for it suggests a great change in our present Poor Law, which relieves destitution, and that only, and in theory only in one way, and an instructed public opinion is needed to control any desirable change.

Since writing the above I have had the advantage of reading Mr. Simon's article in your last issue. It does not make me want to alter anything I have said, but there are some things I should like to add: Mr. Simon is justified in being impatient with any persons whom he finds uttering that curious cry that he quotes, but among such he need not count Mr. Millin or Mr. Robinson, and I certainly hope he will not class me. We can hardly discuss in your columns the details which are suitable to be talked over in committee, but we can profitably deal with the great principles which form the basis for our working faith in social reform, and determine our decision in the large issues of political choice. Mr. Simon cannot think that he meets the position of his opponents by giving a parody of their arguments. With what he says about the satisfactory condition of our industry in general I cordially agree, but I think he is one of those who fail to realise the urgent need for doing something to meet the case of the present failures. Certainly we do not want "the abolition of private enterprise, and the destruction of private ownership and thrift." But we do want something that will supplement the good that may be done by private enterprise and thrift, and we are careful to try and provide this supplement in a way that will not injuriously compete with private enterprise. This, indeed, is a matter in which land colonies may have an advantage over municipal tram-lines. Mr. Simon, too, would provide a supplement to individual enterprise, but, with the exception of the abolition of entails (why not primogeniture also?), he would confine his reforms to those affecting moral character. Let me assure him how earnestly all land law reformers will support the positive part of his programme. Certainly, we are no less earnest than he is in wishing and working for the moral reform of character. But we have faith that this moral improvement may be helped forward by certain changes in the law, which now seem likely to be accomplished.

One of these needful changes may be amply illustrated from Mr. Simon's own words, viz., providing remedies for the rural depopulation, the emigration of the young men and young women either to the towns or beyond the seas. We seem all agreed that the remedy for this is the multiplication of small holdings, such as those on Rew Farm; and as private enterprise has not provided these except in the rarest cases, and as there are immense social hindrances, quite apart from the law of entail, we ask that legislation should do for England at least what it has done for Ireland. Still better may things be if, by retaining ownership of the land by a public body we can guard the interest of futurity as well as provide the requisite stimulus, with its feeling of security and hope, for the present generation. It is not that the work is too hard, and life too monotonous on the land. That is the view of a townsman. It is factory work that is monotonous, not farm work. But Mr. Simon is perfectly right in saying "its chances are too small." Give your young agricultural labourer a fair chance of becoming the tenant of a small farm, with due security against the confiscation of his own industry, and the strenuousness of his activity will be as great as the eagerness of his interest in improving that which is his own. This is the essence of land nationalisation, which is so imperatively required; and to call it a bog or a mare's nest (Mr. Simon should really choose which of the two he prefers) is hardly a convincing form of argument.

It will not be a slight achievement if by multiplying small holdings we can check the further process of rural depopulation, and keep on the land those who are still there. Whether much can be done in the way of fitting town wastrels for agricultural pursuits is doubtful, but judicious methods seem to succeed in a fair proportion of cases, and it would be difficult to point to any other method which has been more successful. The healthy influences of country life do count for a good deal. Most assuredly the experiment is worth trying on a considerable scale; and, so far as it succeeds, it is worth taking care that the success is not hindered for lack of opportunity.

It is difficult to say how far these objects should be promoted by Christian churches. No doubt, harm as well as good may easily be done. But if the churches realise how they have lost hold of the people, lost the power of leading and guiding their aspirations, owing to the way they have stood aloof from living questions of social reform, they will become more anxious than they are to do something. At any rate it should be possible to promote helpful discussions, and call representative conferences, and so influence public opinion. Let us hope that the columns of the INQUIRER will clear up some misunderstandings, and bring out points of agreement, and prove to men and women who are sorely tried in life, as it now is, that Christianity strives to establish the Kingdom of God on earth.

H. SHAEN SOLLY:

PRIDE is always connected with some amount of stupidity.—C. Hilly.

ON AN UNEMPLOYED RELIEF COMMITTEE.—III.

THE MORAL EFFECT OF UNEMPLOYMENT.

I HAVE already referred to the chastening effect of the suffering caused by privation and the sympathy it arouses in the generous and kindly among all sections of society. There remains, however, to be chronicled the gradual change for the worse that comes over the victims of unemployment during a long period of enforced idleness. It is sometimes only too obvious that a moral deterioration ensues.

Many of our unemployed stood in a peculiar relation to the industries of the country. They had been trained to do specific work in connection with the manufacture and building of implements of war, and were so far rendered unfit for carrying on the operations followed by the peaceful industries. It is this peculiar nature of their craft which constituted so strong a claim upon their employers, and made their situation especially hard when that claim was ignored. Some of them were discharged within a few weeks of the date when they would, in the ordinary course of events, have received a good sum of money as a bonus, which would have helped them to start on their own in business or enable them to emigrate to other countries; but their appeals to have these moral claims recognised were also ignored.

(1) The most obvious moral effect that was revealed was a rankling sense of injustice, a feeling that they had been abominably treated, and the resentment and hatred which brooding upon their wrongs engendered. I need not point out that the cherishing of such feelings is a menace to society as well as brutalising to their nourisher. There were some perilous mutterings, and if it were not for the practical sympathy shown by those in work (a single dockyard collection amounted to nearly a hundred pounds), the response of the churches (the collection for this purpose at our own church was the highest for the year), and the liberality of the charitable generally, we might have witnessed some painful scenes. As a chairman of one of the open-air indignation meetings, at which representatives of the various Trades Unions addressed the men, I can testify to the intensity of the feeling against the Balfour-government for refusing to consider any means of redress.

I simply marvel that at periods of unemployment and its consequent distress there is so little outburst of active indignation, so little rioting and looting, so little crime; and it speaks well for the patient character of the British workman that he bears his trials so bravely and meekly. Some credit is due to the members of the Relief Committee for contributing to preserving the peace. They not only were able to alleviate much of the suffering, but perhaps prevent something worse. In one instance a confession was made to one of our visitors—"I had, before you came, already resolved that to-night I would procure bread for my children by fair means or foul."

(2) What is the moral influence of Idleness? Often a workman will take his discharge with a light heart. Through economic changes he does not understand, he finds himself outside the pale of industry. But, on the philosophy that function answers to organ, he considers his willingness to work a signal that work is somewhere to be obtained. He is nevertheless glad of the novelty of seeking new work, and, of course, he intends at once to secure as good, if not better, employment, and cheerfully proceeds upon his quest. But, as he applies in place after place for a position where his skill may be utilised and is again and again turned away unwanted, his cheerfulness gradually leaks away.

Yet, with the dogged persistence natural to the British race, having scoured his own neighbourhood, he proceeds farther afield and tramps from town to town, often pursuing all manner of vague rumours, hearsay, and baseless promises, only to find himself no nearer to his goal than at first. I have seen the returning wanderers who went out in buoyancy and hope, erect and dignified, slinking back looking like vagabonds, cowed and dismayed.

Our worker, having desponded of obtaining the work for which he has been trained, begins to ask for jobs—"anything to do"—and so descends into the ranks of casual workers. The very existence of this class is necessarily bound up with loafing and its attendant ignominies. Loafing breeds the cadger and the toady, and the temptations to which it renders men liable are not conducive to self-respect. Enforced idleness, then, gradually brings forth after its kind. To be idle is contrary to the fundamental principle of human life, which requires putting forth energy, activity, use of faculty. I knew a sage peasant who advised his children if ever they found themselves without occupation to go and carry stones from the brook up the brae, and take them back again, rather than remain idle. He was wise. Idleness is the parent of all kinds of mischief, as is daily witnessed by the record of the upper classes of society, as well as the lowest. Eight months suffice to show into what depths a man compelled to be idle may sink, and demonstrate how a self-respecting artisan may be changed into a wretched toady and a cringing fool. Whosoever has witnessed this gradual deterioration, and observed the slow evaporation of self-respect and moral responsibility, will realise the truth of the change effected in one of the characters in Richard Whiteing's Yellow Van (George Herion), and be convinced that a nation which allows this social disease of unemployment to make ravages unchecked, is committing a detestable crime against its own well-being, and may not escape the infuriated forces of retribution when the day of reckoning comes. Idleness is a sin. To compel a man to be idle is to degrade him, and involve ourselves in guilt. As it is noble and invigorating to engage in healthy and interesting work, so it is ignoble and demoralising to be denied such work.

(3) There is again the ill effect following from loss of feeling of independence. It is a ruin of manliness to go about begging odd jobs as a favour, for charity's sake. It is not good for a skilled craftsman to lose the healthy pride he feels in the exercise of good craftsmanship, and engage in trivial tasks just picked up haphazard. I saw two men of my acquaintance, who were cabinet-makers in the dockyard, working on the Chatham relief works yesterday. One had a pick-axe in his hand, the other was lifting flints into a wheelbarrow to take away. All the delicate touch, the correct judgment, the measuring faculty of the fine tool user thrown away, discarded as of no use, and the rough labour of the navvy expected of them! Is there no pathos in this lowering of the dignity of the skilled mechanic into an unskilled labourer? Is it just to the manhood of the men? Is there no nobler way out of the difficulty? One of the saddest sights on the streets of Bermondsey and West Ham last winter, it has been related, was to see genuinely distressed mechanics working at drain-making, their hands bleeding from the strange task to which they were unaccustomed. The relief work in this case unfitted the men for their own proper work.

To the religious teacher the moral degradation is an immeasurably more serious feature of unemployment than the physical privation. It is sad enough to go through a house, and find very little besides sacking to lie upon, and a broken jug to hold the pledge-tickets. It is sad enough to find a swarm of children without clothes, save the dirty night robes they stood in, looking pinched with hunger, and shivering for cold. But the mental meanness, the moral delinquencies fostered by such a condition, are worse.

One must fully recognise that though social anomalies must be removed by social reforms, and economic evils redressed by economic changes, the personal elements that favour unemployment can only be eradicated by change in personal character. I am ready to make every excuse for our unfortunate brethren, but there is no blinking the fact of their thriftlessness, and the lightness of their sense of responsibility. This I attribute to their undeveloped nature. When you find that a hundredweight of coal that has been sent to fill a three weeks' empty grate, is immediately burnt in a blazing fire; and the week's relief consumed in a meal; and that after a long spell of unemployment a portion of the first week's earnings is spent in drink, the keenness of the distress in days of want is quickly understood. The large proportion of small wages that is weekly spent in alcoholic drinks by the working population is appalling. But then the cultured classes are equally extravagant in their favourite luxuries. The working people I am most closely acquainted with are, on the other hand, noted for their sobriety and industry; they spend their leisure time in the pursuit of scientific and literary knowledge, or in educating their fellows.

The chief obstacle to a change in the conditions of life of the labouring classes is their own indifference. They are the gulls of brewers' agents, and take their politics and philosophy of life from the pot house. But the cheapness at which their work is held, and their place in the social scale, contribute largely to this end. Their easy good-nature finds the discipline irksome that would fit them to become more responsible citizens. But their dullness only constitutes a new claim upon their more developed brethren for a more brotherly interest in their welfare and a more faithful service on their behalf.

J. TRISTEN DAVIS.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

EASTERN COUNTIES.

A FEW months ago the Committee of the Eastern Union had the pleasure of reporting that services were being conducted regularly in all the churches in their district. It was the first time during the last six years that such an announcement could be made. I fear this happy condition of things cannot continue long. The valiant efforts made by some of our congregations are soon frustrated by untoward circumstances. Distance still remains, and will probably always remain, our greatest and our unconquerable foe. If we had more than one railway running through our district there might be some chance of affording that help to our smaller congregations which Norwich and Ipswich would be able and willing to render. As it is, the courageous few have to be content with an occasional word of cheer.

Mr. Newell works with unflagging zeal in the villages of Bedfield, Framlingham, and Monk Soham. He infuses what new life he can into the cause by calling the neighbouring ministers to his aid. Mr. Tavener has occasionally given some of his interesting lantern lectures at Framlingham, and recently the Rev. Wm. Birks has rendered help by delivering illustrated lantern lectures on astronomy and by taking the evening service at Bedfield.

There is a growing interest shown in the services at Diss. Some of the young people are gathering around Mr. Birks, and helping in various ways. It is a good sign that those who attend the chapel are enrolling themselves as subscribing members. No doubt those who are regular worshippers will consider it a privilege to contribute to the support of their chapel, and not be guilty of trespassing unnecessarily upon the generosity of a few members of one family. The congregation has sustained a severe loss through the death of Miss Emma Taylor, the daughter of the late Thomas Lombe Taylor. Though living at Starston, some miles distant, she was accustomed to drive to Diss to worship in the Park Fields chapel. She belonged to that class of country ladies whose gracious influence upon rural life is often overlooked, but who contribute much to elevate the moral tone and to brighten the monotonous days of the men and women and the boys and girls in our villages. Her kind heart and her genuine friendliness will long be remembered by those who knew her. The Eastern Daily Press says:—"Belonging to a family held in high esteem in South Norfolk, she was herself of a philanthropic disposition, ever ready to help in any cause calculated to better the district in which she lived, and her death will be a distinct loss to the neighbourhood." For some years she was a member of our Eastern Union Committee. She had been for many months past in ill-health, but her end came with unexpected suddenness:

At Ipswich, Mr. Tavener has been delivering a series of sermons on the Religions of Russia and Japan, which have attracted good congregations. He has again been invited by the town to lecture in the Art Gallery, taking as his subjects "The Dawn of Art," "The Story of Italian Art," and "The Art Treasures of Florence." In Felixstowe also he has drawn large audiences to listen to his lectures.

The congregation at Yarmouth makes steady progress in numbers and influence; but has suffered irreparable loss through the death of Mr. Bruce Leach, a young and promising member of the church and one of its chief social and financial supporters. Mr. Leach often expressed his interest in the welfare of our churches, and was invited more than once to become the president of our Union—an office which he refused with regret owing to his frequent illness. The minister, Rev. J. Birks, has given a special course of lectures on the principles and prospects of Unitarians, and intends to deliver a second course early in the present year. Services are conducted at the village of Filby in the summer, and in the winter Mr. Birks keeps in touch with the members by visiting and by sending them sermons by post. The chapel keeper, Mr. Wright, must be one of the oldest in the country. I saw him last summer, a man of ninety-seven, with his wife, who seemed almost as aged, sitting by his side. "Yes," he said, "I was born in eight (1808), and it's nearly seventy years since I brought my bride to this house."

Thanks to the generous gifts of friends in various parts of the country, the ancient chapel at Long Sutton has been saved from dilapidation. The exterior and interior of the building have been restored, an American organ purchased, and new furniture added. The congregation has thus been able to worship during the past winter in greater comfort than it has enjoyed for many years past. It is nearly sixteen years since Mr. Pond re-opened the chapel, and it must be a matter of considerable gratification to him to see these improvements accomplished.

At Norwich our institutional work continues to be as vigorous as in past years. The new efforts only can be mentioned. The question that the Committee of the Young People's Guild always ask themselves at the beginning of the winter session is, "What new work can we do?" This year the members have tried to get into closer touch with the parents of the Sunday-school children. They have organised concerts and have prepared short plays. Only two of these entertainments have been held, but by taking tickets to the parents, who alone were admitted, the Guild members were successful in giving the minister and the school superintendents an opportunity of addressing the best meeting of parents we have had of recent years. On the second occasion a charge was made for admission, and our room was again full. We can confidently recommend this work to other Guilds, for it will give the members something to do, and develop their musical and histrionic ability as well as give the parents some interest in the Sunday-school and church.

With the help of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association I was able to advertise widely, in November and December, a course of sermons on Unitarianism, which brought together the largest congregations we have had during my ministry. On two occasions over three hundred adults, chiefly strangers, were present, the galleries being filled. No doubt all our ministers have discovered the necessity of preaching doctrinal sermons occasionally, much as they may wish to retain the Sabbath services for spiritual culture. Sometimes we hear laymen complain when we touch on controversial subjects, but laymen do not always realise the many needs that have to be satisfied in a congregation. There are some honest men, whom we must all respect, whose minds are so sensitive that the burden of a theological difficulty weighs as heavily upon them as the consciousness of moral delinquency troubles others. It is no small part of a minister's duty to dispel the darkness of doubt and error and to carry to others a deeper knowledge of truth. Many a man loses his grasp on morality when he finds no rational or intellectual basis for religion.

We still need £1,700 to complete the sum required to erect the Martineau Memorial Hall and Sunday-schools, and we almost dread to think of the labour that will be involved in raising this amount unless some generous friends make large contributions to our fund. The last batch of appeals, numbering nearly 3,000, sent out by Mrs. Mottram, who has not spared herself in this work, has barely covered the cost of printing and postage. If the appeal has indeed received the consideration of all who are prepared to do something to perpetuate the name of Dr. Martineau in his native city, then the dreams of a worthy memorial, which some of us have cherished, will never be realised. We have funds enough to erect four walls and a roof, but not a building that we dare call the Martineau Memorial. We must wait before we take any definite step forward (and we hope the waiting will not be long), for it would be unpardonable rashness to erect the building without the funds in hand, and thus saddle the congregation with a debt that would destroy its efficiency and render all initiative and progress impossible. We think that some who are willing to give must have overlooked our appeal. For the number of subscribers is small, and there may be those who cannot afford to give large sums, but who are willing to help according to their means. I hope to reach some of these in the months of February and March. I have made out plans for three journeys—to the West, to the North, and to the Midlands—and I hope my visits will be welcome. To most of the congregations visited—to all if they wish it—I shall give a lantern lecture on Dr. Martineau and the Martineau family, which will be amply illustrated by lantern slides. If I have overlooked any congregation that wishes to join in our effort, I shall be glad to respond to a call from them. Quite the most healthy and helpful feature about this work is the continuance of the weekly subscriptions to the fund by the young people of our Guild.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Accrington.—On Saturday last, January 27, the annual congregational tea-meeting was held in the school-room. After tea Mr. E. J. Bradshaw presided, and was supported by Mr. H. Crime, secretary, Mr. A. Webster, treasurer, Mr. Councillor Cameron, and the Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman, of Burnley. A good report of active work carried on was given; the attendance at the services have been maintained, although the congregation have been without any regular minister since the Rev. W. H. Burgess left in June. The Sunday-school and other kindred societies connected with the Church also reported steady progress. Mr. Whiteman gave an excellent address, and the proceedings closed with a short sketch by the members of the Dramatic Society. The attendance was better than of recent years.

Birmingham: Moseley.—The first annual party of this congregation was held on Wednesday evening, January 24, at the Moseley and Balsall Heath Institute, and was much enjoyed by some 130 persons. The Rev. A. Gorton, the newly-appointed minister, spoke a few words of welcome and encouragement to those present.

Brighton.—On Sunday evening the Rev. Priestley Prince conducted a memorial service in the Free Christian Church, and gave an address on the late George Jacob Holyoake, taking for text the verse: "Not everyone that saith unto Me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven." Mr. Holyoake, he said, ever stood fast to principle, and was prepared to suffer for his principle. He set himself manfully to combat the evils he saw about him in this life, and he knew how to work steadfastly and how to wait patiently. The cause of freedom, self-help, good government, the organisation of labour, and the promotion of the co-operative movement were things to which he devoted himself. Although having no definite theological belief, Mr. Holyoake devoted himself religiously to the moral and material uplifting of the people, and called on others to do the same. He was a good man, who lived a noble and essentially Christian life.

Carlisle.—A course of sermons on Modern Agnosticism, brought to a close last Sunday by the Rev. A. Thornhill, in the Viaduct Church, has created interest, and attracted many strangers. A Ladies' Congregational Society has been organised with Mrs. W. S. Marchington as president, and promises to be a valuable auxiliary. The school has within the past few months shown signs of renewed vigour and vitality. A new piano having become an absolute necessity, six members have lent the needful sum free of interest, a piano has been purchased, and a concert held on Thursday week, to raise a portion of the money, proved a gratifying success, nearly £3 10s. being realised. Other schemes are on foot for raising the remainder of the money, and contributions from friends interested in the church will be gratefully acknowledged by the minister.

Horwich.—On Saturday, January 14, the musical fairy play "Red Riding Hood," published by Messrs. Egerton & Co., London, was given by some of the scholars in the first and second classes. It is a delightful play and was very well done. There was a large attendance. The proceeds were for the Prize Fund. The performance was repeated last Saturday with equal success. On Monday evening last the annual prize distribution took place, when thirty-eight prizes and a number of hymn books were awarded for attendance during the past year.

Ilminster.—A successful children's entertainment was given in the school-room of the Old Meeting on January 9, the first part consisting of a miscellaneous concert by the children, the second of a fairy operetta "Santa Claus at Home," the music being some of the well-known airs from Gilbert and Sullivan's "H.M.S. Pinafore," by special permission of Mr. D'Oyley Carte, of the Savoy Theatre. The performance was a great success.

London: Bermondsey.—The Band of Hope and Mercy held a very successful anniversary meeting on Thursday, January 25, 107 members, parents, and friends being present. The superintendent, Mr. A. W. Harris, presided, and was able to report steady progress during the year, the average attendance showing a fifteen per cent. increase over that of 1904, while nearly fifty per cent. more members had won prizes. Thanks were tendered to speakers and helpers, also to many kind subscribers to the funds. The medals and prizes were distributed by Mrs. W. G. Tarrant, who before doing so specially addressed the parents present, forcibly urging upon them the desirability of setting their children the example of total abstinence. Brief addresses were also given by Mr. J. C. Pain (a former president), Mr. R. T. Berdinner (Southwark Band of Hope Union), Mr. Harold Tipford, and Rev. Frederick Allen. The choir and various members contributed music and recitations.

London: Islington.—The annual meeting of the members and friends of Unity Church was held on January 30. The report showed a considerable increase in the number of members, which was partly attributed to the success of the "envelope" system in use during the past year. All the institutions connected with the church are in a flourishing condition; the school is overflowing, and more teachers are urgently needed. The Young People's Society is growing, and forms a link between Sunday-school and church. The Benevolent Society, founded a year ago on C.O.S. lines, has done much good work in the district. The church unfortunately has lost several wealthy members by death, and as the expenses this year have been unusually heavy, it has been decided to hold a bazaar in the autumn to replenish the church funds and cancel the debt to the treasurer. To carry out the scheme committees have been formed. Miss Mildred Bartram has been elected secretary, and Mr. Creak treasurer of the bazaar. Full particulars will be announced later.

London: Kentish Town. (Appointment.)—The Rev. Frederick Hankinson (late assistant minister at Essex Church) has accepted the pulpit of the Free Christian Church, and will enter to-morrow (Sunday) upon his full ministry, conducting special services morning and evening. It is hoped that all friends interested in the welfare of the church will make an effort to attend these services. The 51st annual general meeting of the congregation was held on Tuesday last.

London: Limehouse.—The past year was the twenty-first of the mission at Durning Hall, and it is reported as a year of progress, in which the various institutions have been maintained in a flourishing condition. There are 350 children in the Sunday-schools and a good band of teachers. The best workers at the Mission have grown up in the school, and have found their a home, and the opportunity for manifold beneficent activities. Among these are provident and temperance work, gymnastics, drill, music and recreation, and a number of useful classes. Close upon a thousand pair of feet, it is estimated, cross the threshold of Durning Hall every week, and make it a veritable hive of activity and good fellowship.

London: Stratford.—On Monday last, in connection with the Temperance Guild and Band of Hope, the members of George's-row Mission gave a performance of "The Enchanted Glen" (an operetta for girls). The play was admirably done under the direction of Miss Amy Withall. The performers were accompanied by the Rev. F. Summers and others from the Mission. There were over 200 present.

Newport, Mon.—On Sunday last the Rev. James Harwood preached in the newly-opened Unitarian Free Christian Church in Charles-street, and on Monday evening lectured on "A Visit to India," there being a good attendance, over which Mr. G. H. Llewellyn presided.

Preston.—Professor B. Nath Sen preached last Sunday to two very large congregations. Professor Carpenter delivered his first lecture on "The Gospels and How to Read Them" in the Lower Crush Room, Public Hall on Tuesday evening. The room was packed, many people standing. About 275 persons were present. The annual report of this church shows an increase in membership during the last sixteen months of over 50 per cent.

Scarborough.—The annual meeting of the Westborough Unitarian Church was held on Tuesday evening, January 23. The accounts showed a falling off in receipts, due to the smaller number of visitors during the past summer. It was decided to place an enlarged photograph of the late H. J. Morton in the schoolroom, as a memorial of him. The congregation has also lost, through death, Mr. W. Amos, for twenty-eight years the chapel-keeper.

Stockport.—On Sunday evening last the Rev. B. C. Constable referred to the burial scandal at Penwortham, near Preston, of which notice appeared in last week's INQUIRER. The annual Parents' Party and Prize Distribution took place on January 25, when fifty-three scholars received prizes for good attendance. The children very successfully performed an operetta entitled "The Picnic Party," which was much enjoyed. The Rev. B. C. Constable presided. There was a record attendance of parents and friends, the room being crowded.

Stockton.—The church, choir, and Sunday-school have sustained a loss through the painfully sudden death, on Jan. 17, of James William Kirk, at the age of twenty years, which occurred in the discharge of his duty in the employment of the N.E.R. He bore a very high character, was respected and esteemed by all who knew him, and his loss is keenly felt by all. The funeral—a military one, as he was in a Volunteer corps—was largely attended, and was conducted by the Rev. R. H. Maister at the Durham-road Cemetery on Sunday, 21st ult. There was a memorial service in the church on the Sunday following.

Yorkshire Lay Preachers' Union.—The annual meeting was held on Saturday, January 27, at the Priestley Hall, Leeds. Sixteen members were present, and in addition Revs. C. Hargrove, J. S. Mathers, H. Cross, and J. Ellis. Mr. F. Blackwell (Sheffield) presided, and, after hymn and prayer, opened the proceedings with a suggestive and stimulating address. The reports gave evidence of much willing and devoted service in the interests of our churches. Mr. Jas. Thompson, of Pudsey, was elected President, and Mr. T. G. Turton (Sheffield) was re-elected secretary. Several suggestions for the better equipment for their work and concerning methods of procedure were made by the district minister (Rev. J. Ellis) and others, upon which resolutions were passed. Mr. F. Clayton (Leeds) preached a sermon on the text, John xiv. 6, which was commented upon in friendly criticism by several members. The Rev. Charles Hargrove delivered a most helpful and suggestive address on "Sermon Preparation." Votes of thanks to Rev. C. Hargrove, Mr. F. Clayton, and the retiring President terminated a very successful meeting.

How to Keep in Health.

ONE of the foremost rules to observe is to take an abundance of liquid nourishment and to drink chiefly between and after meals, and not so much during meal times.

As a health promoting beverage, "Cadbury's Cocoa" is universally admitted to be in the front rank, both the medical faculty and the public being unanimous in appreciation of the physical benefits to be derived from this absolutely pure cocoa.

Cadbury's Cocoa should be taken regularly, especially during the winter season, and on cold and wet days, when a hot cup wards off many a chill.

Everybody likes Cadbury's Cocoa because it is the nicest cocoa. It is the standard of highest purity in cocoa, and is the cheapest and best beverage for family use.

THE REVISED

Third Edition.

ESSEX HALL HYMNAL

SMALL PICA, 534 HYMNS, CLOTH, RED EDGES.

PRICE 1/6 NET.

In the Index of First Lines a suitable tune for each Hymn is suggested.

The Essex Hall Hymnal, in its Older or Revised form, is now in use by 180 Congregations. The Revised Edition is printed in clear, large type, and strongly bound in cloth. Suitable tunes are indicated for each hymn, but congregations are not confined to one set tune.

THE EDITORS of the Revised Hymnal, the Revs. V. D. DAVIS, B.A., JAMES HARWOOD, B.A., and W. G. TARRANT, B.A., in their Preface say:—The Editors have had cordial help from many correspondents, to whose knowledge and critical suggestions the present book owes more than can be told. This fraternal co-operation inspires a trust that the new Hymnal may have escaped some of the perils which beset more private compilations. It represents the average feeling of a number of persons, who have made a special study of hymns, rather than the particular preferences of any individual.

TERMS FOR CONGREGATIONS.

Congregations ordering 20 copies at one time will be supplied direct from the Publisher, not through the Trade, at 1/- each; carriage extra. THE HYMNAL WITH CHANT BOOK combined, price 2/- net, with reduction for quantities.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

ARRANGEMENTS have been made for holding a series of special Sunday evening services at Worple Hall, Wimbledon, commencing on Sunday, February 25, when the Rev. W. G. Tarrant will give an address on "God and Man." These services are under the auspices of the London District Unitarian Society. The help and co-operation of friends living in the neighbourhood are earnestly solicited. Those who can assist in the musical part of the service will be specially welcome. All communications can be sent to Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, 8, Madeira-road, Streatham, S.W.

DR. AND MRS. TUDOR JONES sailed from London on Thursday for New Zealand. An account of the farewell meetings at Swansea and at Essex Hall will be found in our present issue.

DR. TUDOR JONES has now published the Dissertation on "Die Idee der Persönlichkeit bei den Englischen Denkern der Gegenwart," which he presented to the philosophical Faculty of the University of Jena in taking his degree last summer. The Dissertation, which was highly commended by Professor Eucken, makes a book of 150 large octavo pages, and is printed at the Frommansche Hofbuchdruckerei, Jena. Copies may be had (2s. net), at Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

FROM New York we have received the first number of a new monthly, the New Unitarian (to be issued, for the yearly subscription of a dollar, from the New York Unitarian Headquarters, 104, East Twentieth-street). Mr. G. H. Badger is the editor, and among the contributing editors are Dr. M. J. Savage, President Southworth, of Meadville, the Revs. J. T. Sunderland, of Toronto, and H. W. Foote, of New Orleans. The New Unitarian, its opening note declares, "has a modest aim and a resolute purpose. It will not attempt to give what can be much better given, each week, by the Christian Register in its wide and noble range of religious outlook and insight. It is our aim to present once a month but a crisp and lightly touching review of what is happening amongst our churches, with something of comment on current issues, and something of gathered discussion of things at the moment interesting to those who share the liberal manner of thought."

IN the current number of the Hibbert Journal the Editor calls attention to a correction of a footnote to his article of October, 1905, "Is the Moral Supremacy of Christianity in Danger?" The note (p. 29) quotes Mr. Graham Wallas as saying in June, 1901, of the Boxer riots of the previous year in China, "The only sane, kind, and true thing done in all the welter of stupidity and cruelty of 1900 was done by the Buddhists of Japan when they refused to take any compensation for the destruction of their sacred buildings." On this the Editorial Secretary of the China Inland Mission, which lost the largest number of lives (79) of any of the Protestant missions, and much valuable property, remarks that the losses of the Japanese Buddhists was insignificant in comparison, and that his society also refused any compensation for the losses sustained, and asked that a proclamation should be issued stating that the Mission would rebuild the churches out of its own funds, because in so doing it aims "to fulfil the command of the Saviour of the World that all men should love their neighbour as themselves, and is unwilling to lay any heavy pecuniary burden on the traders or on the poor."

THE Editor of the Hibbert Journal, in calling attention to this statement, says that in the absence of such correction the original note would be unjust to at least two great Christian organisations—the China Inland Mission and the British and Foreign Bible Society, both of which suffered severely. And he adds: "From inquiries made it would appear that, while in the case of some societies compensation was taken from the Chinese Government for the damage done there were two notable exceptions (above named). The former, with a few exceptions, in which local officials made reparation without reference to Peking, refused compensation for its terrible losses; the latter refused to take anything for the whole of its losses, the money value of which was assessed at about £3,000. As might be expected, it seems that neither of these societies took any pains to give publicity at home to so splendid an act of abnegation; and this reticence, while it gives a higher significance to the facts, may perhaps explain why they were unknown to the Editor. In justice to Mr. Graham Wallas, from whose lecture the note was a quotation, it may be said that, at the time he wrote, the Proclamation given below had not been made." (The Proclamation stated the facts as to the C.I.M.)

FOR fourteen years before the Borough of Islington would adopt the Free Libraries Act the Highgate-hill Unitarian Church maintained a library for the public use, and now that Free Libraries are being established, this public-spirited church has presented the 14,000 books of their own library to the borough. Meanwhile, until the new branch library for North Islington is opened, the church has offered its reading-room to the authorities, and last Saturday it was opened as a public institution. The Mayor of Islington, in declaring the room open, warmly acknowledged the services rendered by the church to the community, and said that one of the rooms in the Manor-gardens Library was to be called the "Robert Spears Room," in memory of the founder of that church and its library. Mr. D. S. Waterlow, M.P., proposed a vote of thanks to the committee of the church for their gift, and to the Mayor.

MRS. JEMIMA LUKE, writer of that very popular children's hymn "I think when I read that sweet story of old," passed away on Friday, Feb. 2, at the great age of ninety-two. She was the oldest of the passive resisters, and her home latterly had been at Newport, Isle of Wight. She was a native of Islington, and in 1843 married the Rev. Samuel Luke, a Congregational minister. Thompson was her maiden name. She is said to have written the hymn two years before her marriage, during a coach journey in Somerset.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:—Letters, &c., received from R. B. B., W. B., J. C., S. F., H. M. L., A. M., C. E. M., H. N., W. R.

THE PENWORTHAM BURIAL SCANDAL.

THE Rev. Charles Travers has forwarded a full account of this case to the Home Secretary, and has asked the following questions framed upon various statements made by the curate:—

(a) Whether the burial of a Unitarian is a "Christian Burial" within the meaning of the Burial Act of 1880.

(b) Whether, seeing that the order of Service within the Church was to be the usual service laid down by the Church of England Prayer Book, the curate had any right on account of the religious convictions of the deceased to refuse to take part in it.

(c) Whether the interment of Unitarians in consecrated ground is contrary to Church Law.

(d) Whether the use of the church for a funeral service conducted according to the Prayer Book is a matter of grace.

(e) Whether an Anglican clergyman is ordered only to conduct Christian burials, and if so, what definition he is to give to the word "Christian."

A copy of the letter and questions was forwarded to the Bishop of Manchester.

In his reply he states:—"But I must add that in my judgment the Burial Act, 1880, does not contemplate or provide for burial services taken partly by the clergyman and partly by a minister or other person chosen by the relatives of the deceased, and that such a service is not regular or legal."

To ministers the chapters in Holyoake's "Public Speaking and Debate" on "Pulpit Oratory" and "Platform Reading" are specially to be commended. F. W. Newman, who is referred to as a man of wider information than his brother, the cardinal, told Mr. Holyoake that he deemed it beyond his power to preach a sermon every week, and on the demand of two original sermons a Sunday from ministers, the author says:—"Dr. Parker is the only divine who has advised—what I thought I was alone in advising years ago, namely, that preachers who have to preach twice on a Sunday should preach a sermon of the great orators of the Church once in the day, and reserve their unwearied minds for their own discourse. The sermons of the Fathers of the Church and orators of dissent, from early times to the present, afford a mighty field of selection. Wealth of illustration, felicity of expression, splendour of ideas, and passion, lie there mostly unknown to preachers and almost entirely so to modern, busy, narrow-minded, uninformed congregations—narrow-minded because ignorant of the brilliant sermons with which the pulpit orators of every denomination have enriched and delighted the minds of the generation in which they lived. A preacher who knows how to read, who has good discernment of relevant passages, judgment not to make them too long, and preface them by an account of who the preacher was, would command grateful hearers whom he would inform, gratify, and refine. A great play delights as often as it is well acted; why should not a great sermon when well spoken? Acquaintedness with great discourses would often improve the preacher as well as his flock."

BY A MINISTER.

XXXIV.

To say a good thing, perhaps in three words, and to be for ever famous—this was one of the achievements possible in bygone days. The reputation of a lifetime might rest on the merit of a single aphorism, the merit being, not so much the worth of the thing said, as its right to be considered the first of its kind. Know thyself; Nothing too much; Know thy opportunity; do not strike us now as very illuminating oracles, but they were once original, and were for that reason thought worthy of inscription in the Delphian temple. Felices opportunitate vitæ, we may say of the authors, feeling neither envy nor scorn at their success.

Certainly not envy. Celebrity of this kind is often dearly purchased. By the irony of chance the sayers of good things are remembered for the trifles which cost them nothing, whilst their serious labours are forgotten. Here is a writer who is known only as a good talker; a statesman whose name is coupled with a few epigrams; a judge whose jests will long outlive his judgments. A quick retort, a bold paradox, a happy definition, is quite enough to throw a whole career into wrong perspective. It is just possible that the immortal Seven, if they could have read the inscriptions, would have thought themselves hardly used by posterity.

And yet, for directness of influence and certainty of result, there is nothing better than the maxim, short and pithy and to the point. It cannot be appealed against, admits of no discussion, and, unlike prophecy and parable and apocalypse, allows only one interpretation. Christianity would be stronger perhaps to-day, if it had made more, from the first, of its Great Sayings, its precepts and warnings, woes and beatitudes, unmistakable in sense and application. The half would be more than the whole.

I have been looking through those "Chapters of the Fathers" in the Hebrew prayer-book, which make for the modern Jew a kind of appendix to the Old Testament. They preserve in unbroken line the favourite sayings of some sixty distinguished teachers both before and after the time of Christ. Though really a portion of that rabbinical literature which is at once the joy and the despair of the learned few, they have been made familiar to the ordinary worshipper through liturgical use. Apart from this use, they may be thought somewhat disappointing. "José, the son of Joezer, of Zeredah, said, Let thy house be a meeting house for the wise; sit amidst the dust of their feet, and drink their words with thirst; Joshua, the son of Perachya, said, Provide thyself a teacher, and get thee a companion, and judge all men in the scale of merit; Rabban Gamaliel said, Provide thyself a teacher, and be quit of doubt, and accustom not thyself to give tithes by a conjectural estimate; Elisha, the son of Abuyah, said, If one learns as a child, what is it like? Like ink written on clean paper. If one learns as an old man, what is it like? Like ink written on blotted paper." There is nothing here very profound. Other portions are more satisfying—such sentences as the following:—"He who says, What is mine is mine, and what is thine is thine, his is a neutral character; he who says, What is mine is thine and what is thine is mine, is a boor; he who says, What is mine is thine and what is thine is thine, is a saint; he who says, What is thine is mine, and what is mine is mine, is a wicked man." "Judge not thy neighbour until thou art come into his place." "The more charity, the more peace." "Do His will as if it were thy will, that He may do thy will as if it were His will." "A name made great is a name destroyed." "Be beforehand in the salutation of peace." There is wit, and wisdom as well, in the advice of Mattithyah the son of Cheresch: "Be rather a tail to lions than a head to foxes," and, for its sturdy individualism, the following utterance of Hillel has been deservedly praised: "If I am not for myself, who will be for me? And being for my own self, what am I? And if not now, when?" Jewish writers have also pointed out that self-reliance is here carefully distinguished from selfishness.

If I turn to the aphorisms of our own rabbi, St. Paul, it is not to force a comparison with those of other "Fathers." His occasional terseness may rather be compared with his own more frequent exuberance. Scattered through his letters there are short, sharp phrases which stand apart in their rounded fulness and distinctness of expression:—"Love is the fulfilment of the law; The whole law is fulfilled in one word; To the pure all things are pure; Let not your good be evil spoken of; In malice be ye babes; Godliness with contentment is great gain; Godliness is profitable for all things; The sting of death is sin; The wisdom of this world is foolishness with God; The foolishness of God is wiser than men; Be ye angry, and sin not; Through love be servants; Pray without ceasing; I had not known sin, except through the law; The letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life."

Nevertheless, sententiousness has its dangers. Positiveness of statement is easily taken for authority, conciseness for finality, sayings become sanctions, and admiration in course of time hardens into subjection. The non-progressiveness of certain Eastern faiths may be partly due to the love of ancient apothegm. The right rule would seem to be to accept as a maxim only that which is also an axiom, and to regard all other dicta as tentative and provisional. But then, how many truths are axiomatic?

THE February Cornhill, in the article "From a College Window," opens with a passage which young aspirants in literature should note. Mr. Stanley Weyman's story "Chippinge," telling of the election excitement of 1832, weaves what promises to be a charming romance in with the great political interest.

It will be seen from the advertisement in another column that on Saturday next a special service is to be held in Hale Chapel, when a memorial window to the late Mrs. James Worthington is to be unveiled by Mr. R. D. Darbishire, and an address given by the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers.

FAREWELL TO DR. AND MRS.
TUDOR JONES.

DR. W. TUDOR JONES and his wife have this week sailed by the R. M. s.s. Gothic for New Zealand, commissioned by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to undertake the ministry of the recently established Unitarian Church at Wellington.

For the past seven years Dr. Jones has been minister of the Unitarian Church at Swansea, while for the last three summer terms, through the kindness of his congregation and the help of the Hibbert Trustees, he was able to continue his studies in the philosophy of religion at the University of Jena, and there obtained his Doctor's degree.

AT SWANSEA.

The parting of Dr. and Mrs. Tudor Jones from their congregation at Swansea was marked by many expressions of warm appreciation and affection, and of high public regard.

On Thursday evening, February 1, a reception was held in the schoolroom, followed by a farewell meeting in the church, which was very largely attended. Councillor Moy Evans presided, and among those present were a number of leading citizens and friends of other denominations, including the Rev. T. Sinclair Evans, of the Castle-street Congregational Church, and Principal David Salmon. Professor Moore, from Carmarthen, was there, and the Rev. R. J. Jones, of Aberdare. Among those who sent letters of regret were Principal Evans, of Carmarthen, the Rev. Father Gwydir, O.S.B., Dr. Gomer Lewis, and Professor Estlin Carpenter, of Manchester College, Oxford. Professors Rudolf Eucken and H. H. Wendt, of Jena, sent letters of greeting and good wishes. In the course of his letter Professor Eucken, referring to Dr. Jones's appointment in New Zealand, said:—"Through many friends and pupils I know a great deal about the mental life in that great and beautiful island, where many of the shadows and over-refinements of European culture are unknown. I was very glad to hear of the recognition of the Hibbert trustees—a well-deserved recognition—of your splendid work in the philosophy of religion. We must certainly see that your book will be ready before you go. It remains that all the circumstances of this life must be turned by us to a good account. May it be so for you and your dear wife, although you have to leave home and friends. God's way is to us often in the dark; we must trust where we cannot trace. You have overcome much in the past, and that courageously, too. May health and strength be given you to work courageously for the noble ideals which you have made your own. May these ideals fill your soul."

The CHAIRMAN, in his address, said that in Dr. Tudor Jones they had had a man of no ordinary abilities for their minister, whose appointment seven years ago had been amply vindicated. During his stay Dr. Jones had succeeded in winning not only their admiration for his intellectual gifts, but also their warm esteem for the zeal with which he had conducted the services of the church, and for the manner in which he had interested himself in everything connected with the Unitarian faith. He had, it appeared to him, in every relation of life followed humbly the example of the great Master by ministering to the spiritual needs of the congregation and by visiting the poor and lowly and the sorrowful. He had also done admirable public work as a member of the Free Library Committee and the Charity Organisation and other societies, which had for their objects the uplifting of the people, and his public lectures had been highly appreciated. In addition, he had held classes in German and philosophy for the benefit of young people. Therefore, it might be said their pastor had been a living force in the intellectual life of the town, and that that force had been felt amongst the community. In all his work he had been faithfully and ably assisted by Mrs. Tudor Jones, and they gratefully acknowledged the singleness of purpose that had at all times distinguished her efforts. They would both carry with them the knowledge that they left behind them true and loyal friends in Swansea, who would at all times take a very earnest interest in their future welfare. They were going out to New Zealand under auspices which would secure for them a loyal welcome, and he, for one, would be surprised if Dr. Jones did not very soon take a leading part as a citizen of that progressive Colony. Mrs. Tudor Jones would be equally successful in winning the hearts of those with whom she came into contact. They said "Good-bye," but with the reservation that they hoped that they would have the pleasure of welcoming them back again to the old country. But, meanwhile, they would not forget the lessons and the wise counsels they had had from him, and, above all, they would not forget the examples of their strenuous Christian lives that had been spent for the good of others.

The Chairman concluded by handing to Dr. Tudor Jones a beautiful gold watch and chain, as a farewell gift from the congregation.

Mr. O. H. PERKINS then presented an illuminated address, which, after congratulating Dr. Tudor Jones on his new appointment, and expressing the congregation's deep regret at his departure, went on:—"Your unremitting devotion to your duties as pastor, and to the cause of true and pure religion, during your seven years' residence here, has endeared you to all the members of your congregation, while the prominent part you have taken in the intellectual life of the town is recognised and highly appreciated by all sections of the community. The good seed you have sown will, we feel assured, bear fruit that will be a lasting monument of your great and unselfish work in Swansea. We also desire to place on record our grateful recognition of the valuable and willing assistance rendered to our church and to the cause generally by your able wife and helpmate, Mrs. Jones. May you both find happiness in your new home, and may your labours under God's good providence be abundantly blessed."

Miss BROCK and Mrs. HUTTON then presented gifts to Mrs. Tudor Jones, and other presentations followed, including that of a gown and the Jena doctor's hood to Dr. Jones.

The Revs. R. J. JONES, T. SINCLAIR EVANS, and others having spoken, Mrs. TUDOR JONES, with a few touching words, acknowledged the great kindness of their friends.

Dr. TUDOR JONES, in his reply, spoke of his seven years at Swansea as the happiest of his life. In his religious life he had passed through periods of great stress, and he warmly acknowledged how much he owed to the affection of the friends he had found in that church, and to those of other denominations. Both among his old denomination of the Calvinistic Methodist and the Roman Catholics he had many friends, and he specially acknowledged the kindness shown to him by the Rev. Sinclair Evans. He concluded with words of affectionate farewell.

In addition to the presentations at the meeting Dr. and Mrs. Jones received privately upwards of a hundred gifts from friends in the town.

On Sunday Dr. TUDOR JONES preached his farewell sermons at Swansea, and at the evening service the church was crowded by a remarkable gathering, even the vestry and the porch being filled. The preacher was deeply moved as he spoke of the experiences through which he had passed, and of the strong ties of affection which united him and the people of Swansea.

On Monday morning Dr. and Mrs. Jones left for London, a large number of their friends being at the station for a last word of farewell.

IN LONDON.

On Tuesday evening a farewell meeting was held in the Council Room at Essex Hall, over which Mr. C. F. Pearson, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, presided.

A telegram of hearty greeting and good wishes was received by Dr. Tudor Jones from three professors of the University of Jena:—"Herzliche Grüsse und beste Wünsche senden Eucken, Weinl, Wendt."

Tea and coffee were served at five o'clock, and a pleasant half hour was spent in friendly talk before the chair was taken.

The PRESIDENT said they were met together to show their appreciation of the good work carried on by Dr. and Mrs. Tudor Jones at Swansea, and to wish them God-speed in the mission to New Zealand which Dr. Jones had undertaken.

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, on whose urgent advice, on his return from his mission to Australia and New Zealand, the Association had arranged to send out a minister to Wellington, said that when one evening in October, 1904, he arrived at Wellington, it was not to sow the first seed, for he found Unitarians already there, and Mr. Jellie had already been over from Auckland, and had spent a fortnight among them. He found in Wellington a number of individual Unitarians, and had the satisfaction of gathering them together, and inducing them to form themselves into a church or society, which since then had met regularly once a fortnight for worship. Dr. Tudor Jones would find a fruitful soil, and a society ready to receive him; and he was assured of a hearty welcome: He would find a congregation of very cultured people, and among them the Chief Justice, who had gone out as a young man of 19 or 20 from the Shetlands, and had made his way to that high position, and also members of the Richmond family, children of Mr. Richmond who had gone out fifty years ago, and had been Prime Minister. The congregation wanted not only a good pastor, but a man of culture to minister to them, and he was glad they had induced Dr. Tudor Jones to undertake the task. He was not an untried man going straight from college. The testimony they had of his work at Swansea led them to hope for the best results in the great work to which he was going in the capital of New Zealand. He moved "that this meeting, in taking farewell of Dr. and Mrs. Tudor Jones on their departure, heartily wishes them God-speed, and sends to the congregation at Wellington, with the best man they could find for the work in England, their heartiest wishes for future success."

Mr. C. A. SEYLER, the Public Analyst of Swansea, as one who had known Dr. Jones during the whole of the seven years of his ministry there, seconded the resolution, and bore testimony to the influence he had exerted, especially over young men and working people, as a personal friend and an inspiring teacher. The name of the country to which Dr. Jones was going should be of good omen for his mission. New Zealand, the old Dutchman had called it, the new land; but for them it should be the land of the new Zeal. That was what Dr. Jones would inspire, and he would himself be inspired by it. He wished him every success.

Dr. BLAKE ODGERS supported the resolution, which was very cordially passed.

Mrs. TUDOR JONES first responded in a few grateful words for the kindness shown to them by that gathering.

Dr. TUDOR JONES said they had been passing through a very trying ordeal in their farewells at Swansea and in South Wales, and it was extremely difficult for him to say anything in response to the good words which had been spoken concerning him that night. He was grateful to them for their God-speed, and glad of that opportunity to express his gratitude for all he had received from Unitarians. Among them he had found something he had failed to find in the denomination in which he was brought up, or in any other. When he looked back on the past seven years, he felt it had been a new kind of life entirely. He had been brought up among the Calvinistic Methodists, and had known no Unitarians except one young student, until he came across some of the Association's publications, which set him thinking in new directions. It was impossible for him to convey the gratitude of his heart for what he had received. He often thought, when he saw discussions in the papers about the Unitarian name, &c., he did not care what the name was, for he had the thing. He had found the name a great help in his work at Swansea, and so had his wife in connection with the Postal Mission. It helped to show people exactly what they were, and to break down prejudice. Yet the name was immaterial. There was the only denomination in which he had been able to get freedom to preach the truth, the truth of Christianity, and he had never in his life come across such people as he had found among the Unitarian families in Swansea, people who were the incarnation of goodness, kindness, charity, and the true spirit of Christianity. Yet one thing he would like to say of them. He wished they would appreciate the gospel of Unitarian Christianity more, especially for their children. It was grievous to see such people at Swansea and elsewhere feeling that their liberty made it impossible for them to bring up their children in the liberal religion in which they themselves had been brought up. Yet they must not despair, for, even if they lost a whole generation of Unitarian children, they would build up congregations, if they had faith in themselves.

Going out to New Zealand, he was in a way making no sacrifice; but he was trying to repay a little of the great debt he owed to the Unitarians of this country. He should do his best, and he should not appeal simply to those who belonged to no church, for in the churches there were large numbers who got nothing there, and went simply from old habit, while religion and theology had become dead things to them. He must appeal also to the thousands of barren people in the churches, for they had a living religion to preach that would take hold of the mind and spirit. He thanked them for their great kindness. His wife and he would do their best, and hoped to render a good account of themselves.

A vote of thanks to the President, moved by Mr. David Martineau, and seconded by Mr. H. Chatfield Clarke, brought the meeting to a close.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the Unitarian Home Missionary College was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on the 31st ult. The chair was taken by the President, the Rev. Charles C. Coe, and among those present were Colonel J. Pilcher, Principal Gordon, Mr. and Mrs. John Harwood (Bolton), Messrs. G. Hadfield, J. Lawson, J. Hall Brooks, D. A. Little, F. W. Monks, Councillor Marsden, G. T. Cook, Edward Talbot, and the Revs. Dendy Agate, H. D. Roberts, C. J. Street, T. P. Spedding, E. L. H. Thomas, C. Peach, A. W. Fox, J. Ruddle, H. B. Smith, W. Harrison, and G. A. Payne.

The annual report was read by the clerical secretary, Rev. E. L. H. THOMAS.

Mr. G. HADFIELD, the deputy treasurer, presented the balance-sheet, which showed that the income had been sufficient to meet the ordinary expenditure of the year, although there was a small deficit on the house account.

Colonel PILCHER, in moving the adoption of the report and statement of accounts, said the report was exhaustive, and would, he thought, be received as satisfactory. He rejoiced in particular at the success which had attended the Jubilee Fund Appeal. The fund was still something over £3,000 short, but he was confident it would be made up as the members of the churches became better acquainted with the work the College was doing. He was himself a frequent visitor at Summerville, and he came away more deeply convinced every time of the wisdom and value of the step which the Committee had taken. Under the new conditions the College enjoyed an intimate association with a great modern university as one of its recognised colleges, and this, added to the excellent provision now made for their comfort would, he believed, attract many young men to study there, and so remove the present dearth of ministers.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. D. A. LITTLE and carried.

The Rev. DENDY AGATE moved a vote of thanks to the visitors, examiners, and medical officers of the College. While thanking all for generous services, Mr. Agate said their minds turned mostly to Dr. Odgers with great regard mingled with deep regret that, as visitor, they should see him no more. It was a second period as visitor that Dr. Odgers had just concluded, and between the two periods he had rendered invaluable service as tutor and principal. He had left the mark of his work on the College as he had indelibly impressed his large and generous personality on the hearts of its students. Mr. Agate then read some extracts from a postscript which Dr. Odgers had added to his last official report as visitor. In this postscript Dr. Odgers remarked on the great advance in the standard of aspiration and attainment which now characterised the work of the College. Its connection with the Victoria University and its Theological Faculty was also full of promise. Still, he hoped the College would always keep a place for the "grace-taught" man—one rare now amongst us, but always welcome when he appeared.

Mr. F. W. MONKS seconded the resolution, and it was carried.

The Rev. C. J. STREET proposed, and the Rev. G. A. PAYNE seconded the nomination of the new officers and committee, and they were elected. Mr. Street explained the few changes. The President, to their great satisfaction, was accepting office for a second year. The Rev. C. Roper was added to the Vice-Presidents, and Councillor Marsden, Richard Robinson, and the Rev. H. D. Roberts were being added to the Committee. It was also announced that Dr. Mellone had accepted the office of visitor.

The Rev. C. C. COE, in acknowledging his re-election, said it had been a great joy to him to have been associated with the College during a year marked by such developments and crowned with such success. He looked forward with confidence to the future of the College. The generosity of our churches would, he hoped, complete the work they had begun, and he would commend to the Committee the desirability of uniting two principles much spoken of now, viz.—Protection and Fiscal expansion. Let them carefully protect what they had, and go on and secure the balance still required.

The Rev. H. D. ROBERTS proposed and the Rev. G. EVANS seconded the re-appointment of the Jubilee Committee. This was carried, and the Rev. J. RUDDE proposed and the Rev. T. P. SPEDDING seconded a resolution of thanks to the trustees of the Memorial Hall. Both speakers recalled many old memories in the long association of the College with the Hall, and the resolution was carried with special heartiness.

Principal GORDON and the Revs. A. W. Fox and C. PEACH spoke to the final resolution, which conveyed the thanks of the meeting to Mr. Coe for presiding. Mr. Gordon said his association with Mr. Coe went back more than fifty years. It was in 1853 he first remembered Mr. Coe appearing in his father's pulpit. Through all the subsequent half century they had remained friends, and he was sure no one would better represent the true principles upon which the College rested than Mr. Coe—a conviction in which the subscribers shared by conferring on Mr. Coe the almost unique honour of re-election to the presidency. Mr. Coe, replying, said how glad he would be to see or correspond with anyone who might wish for information on the Jubilee Fund. The proceedings then closed.

Some passages from the Annual Report of the Committee we must reserve till next week.

AN ENLARGED LECTIONARY.

SIR,—This subject is so very important that it is time that amongst Unitarians there was some general agreement arrived at, that would be truly representative of Unitarian principle. There is not one of our ministers who would admit that he is a Bibliolater—a worshipper of the Book; and yet it comes very near it, when, by custom, the use of the Bible as the sole lesson book in our services, is considered by some as too sacred to be disturbed. I have heard ministers object to any departure from the custom, on the ground that the selection of readings from any other literature requires the greater exercise of judgment of fitness than from the Bible. My own feeling is that it is quite as possible to make mistakes in the selection of Bible readings, and the judgment of a minister that can be trusted in the one case is equally trustworthy in the other.

Then, we ought to be faithful to principle. We do not think that the Bible is more sacred than other literature of the same kind. Who would say that the story of the angel of the Lord appearing to Elijah is more divine than Leigh Hunt's "Abou ben Adhem"? Or that any of the Psalms are more worthy of use in public worship than Whittier's "Eternal Goodness"? We profess that God's word is not more truly in the Bible than it is in the grandest writings of our own English literature, and in the finest moral and spiritual scriptures, ancient or modern, of other nations: that God inspires writers to-day as much as He did the authors of the books of the Bible. To be faithful to our professions, then, we must show our faith by our actions, and enrich our church lectionary by the use of modern poems, parables, psalms, narratives, and incidents of a fitting nature.

We are judged by our deeds how far we believe the doctrines we teach. Our doctrine of universal inspiration loses much if we fail to exemplify it by using the inspired utterances and writings of modern times as pulpit readings. We are really unjust to the Bible if we place it on a pedestal by itself, as though it must not be judged by the same standards as all other human literature, and we are equally disloyal to our own theological position amongst the churches by so doing.

We read two lessons in our services; would it not be a good thing if it were a general custom known throughout our Unitarian churches that the first lesson should be always selected from the Bible, and the second lesson from some other source? The effect upon the minds of our people would be plain and definite, as it would be also on the public mind. It would then be more clear to everybody that we do not limit divinity to Biblical authors only, and that we do not consider the "Song of Solomon" more sublime than Tennyson's "In Memoriam."

Throughout my ministry I have always at each church of which I have been pastor made it a regular practice to read one lesson from the Bible and one from elsewhere. And I know that the practice has been highly appreciated. The choice of fit selections is large and varied. There are rich stores open for our use in modern literature from which comfort, inspiration, encouragement and cheer can be derived equal in force and pathos to the sublimest passages the Bible contains. It is really surprising that so much apparent superstition appears to exist amongst us yet on this matter, and that this kind of "orthodoxy" of peculiar adherence to the Bible only, should survive in our Churches. We stand still too long. We are yet far behind some of our forefathers, instead of being ahead of them. Development, movement, growth, and readaptation in methods and manners are painfully slow amongst us; so slow, indeed, that we are losing, if we have not already lost, the position of pioneers.

H. BODELL SMITH.

Mottram, Feb. 5.

The Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, of Reading, at the end of a letter on this subject, says:—"For the past year and a half I have read 'lessons' from the following writers:—Thomas à Kempis, Epictetus, Plato, Jeremy Taylor, Isaac Barrow, St. Augustine, Newman, Renan, Taine, Wordsworth, Milton, Goethe, Lecky, Gibbon, George Eliot, Tennyson, Turgot, J. S. Mill, Victor Hugo, Coleridge, and others. I cannot say whether my people have been edified, but I can say that if they have not, it is not the fault of the authors."

SIR,—I notice that the writers upon this subject in your columns appear to assume that a place for other literature in worship can only be gained at the expense of one or both lessons from the Bible.

This assumption causes a kind of rivalry. Thus a sonnet by an English poet, who was himself steeped in Scripture, is set up as a rival to the Hebrew Psalms, and another writer states that his practice is to give one lesson from the Bible, and another from some other source.

This appears to me rather a strange way of enlarging the Lectionary, and would answer better to the description of mutilating it. If it comes to a question of rivalry between the grandest religious literature of all time, expressed in the noblest English prose, and literature which is to a very large extent only an echo of this, I think Unitarian ministers, despite the criticism of Mr. Hopps and Mr. Rawlings, are wise in retaining the first and ignoring the second.

But why should this be the issue? Is there no room for both? We do not require less of the Bible; we require more of it. Our people do not know it as they should. It is a dull book to many of them just because they are only acquainted with its "tit-bits" and pet chapters. We ought not to have less of the Bible in our services, but that is no reason why we should not have something else as well. There is no valid reason why, at a religious service, the readings should be limited to two. In the Church of England at an ordinary service we have not only the two lessons, but the Epistle, and Gospel, and Psalms for the day as well.

Why should not one of those admirable extracts from the "Imitatio," which you have given, or something else equally appropriate, find a place not in rivalry with one of the lessons from Scripture, but as a supplement to these lessons, in a place similar to that taken by the Epistle for the day in Church of England worship? This would be really to enlarge the Lectionary, and could give no shock to that sensitive reverence for the Bible, which is a quality too precious to be needlessly offended.

CLEMENT E. PIKE.

100, King Henry's-road, N.W.

SIR,—The beautiful tribute to the value of the Bible, from the pen of the Rev. W. H. Drummond, which appeared in your issue of January 20, has elicited a very interesting discussion on the subject of the lectionary for public worship. I am in perfect agreement with him that extra Biblical readings in that connection meet "no real need of the Christian society." At the same time I fully admit the cogency of your own remark that such readings are "a testimony to the true doctrine of religious inspiration." But the fact remains that the Bible arrests the attention and kindles the imagination of human beings of every age, condition, and culture, as no other literature in the world does.

It is equally precious to the noblest minds of our race, and to the poor and unlearned. The common people cherish it as the dearest spiritual treasure upon earth; and God be thanked that the Christian Church ensures the impartation of its contents even to the most illiterate. He who cannot read may come and hear, when he will, its glad tidings of the love which God and

His Christ bear towards the children of men. This adaptability of the grand old volume to satisfy the mind and heart of the very humblest sections of human society, is a point which you, sir, and your correspondents have left unnoticed. In my view it is one of paramount importance. Mr. Rawlings adduces evidence that the need of an extended lectionary in public worship "has long been felt by some of the most devout and cultured minds." But what of that? Christian congregations are not composed exclusively of the saintly and the scholarly. They are an assembly of men, women, and children of the most diverse types of intelligence, worldly lot, training, and discipline. The congregations must be very rare indeed in which even so many as one-twentieth of their number has ever felt the need of any non-Biblical readings. It is one of the weak points of many "cultured" people that they lack of that sympathy with the multitude of the uncultured which shone so conspicuously in the character of the blessed Saviour. The Church of Christ cares for all ranks and all classes of the community—high and low, rich and poor, learned and unlearned. Therefore does it permanently retain the lectionary which, by experience, has been found to be most edifying and comforting to all. The superior people can enjoy their anthologies at home.

The secret of the attractiveness and power of the Bible—the remark applying most emphatically, of course, to the New Testament—lies in the fact that it has Christ for its main theme. He is the Light of the World, whose shining rivets the gaze of civilised humanity. His spiritual stature and proportions are known by the shadow he has cast upon the ages. Because the Bible testifies of him, the book has become sacred to the heart of every true Christian, though he may absolutely refuse, as he should refuse, to regard any book whatsoever as sacred in the sense of possessing any title of authority over his soul.

Some of your readers may, or may not, be acquainted with the volume "Prayers for Christian Worship," published by the late Dr. Sadler. (London: Williams & Norgate: 1886.) At the end of the volume is a most admirable selection of Scriptural Lessons. There are something like 180 readings from the Old Testament and Apocrypha, and about 150 from the New Testament. As the Doctor very truly says in his preface, if a minister does not adopt some system in the selection of readings, he is apt to read over and over again a few favourite chapters, and to overlook other chapters equally suitable, and which would give the readings a wider range. His own selections have been made with great care. He is no Bibliolater: He mentions verses in the Psalms which should be omitted. In reading a certain chapter of Isaiah, he tells you to leave an unsavoury passage therein severely alone. Whoso uses Dr. Sadler's lectionary for public services will never feel the need of any other.

SAMUEL CHARLESWORTH.

SIR,—With your permission I should like to present a different view of this question from that taken in your leading article and in the correspondence which has followed.

Of course, I admit without qualification, that inspiration is not restricted to the Bible. Also that many passages in the Bible are out of accord with our present religious convictions, so that if we read them from the pulpit we read what for us is not true. But I do not agree with the conclusion that we ought therefore to give up the exclusive use of the Bible for pulpit lessons.

Our congregations have heard over and over again that the Bible is a literature, containing the works of many writers over a period of several centuries. It is a religious literature, partly Jewish, partly Christian, a record of very varied religious experience, and the results of such experience. To read passages of the Bible from the pulpit is, accordingly, to give the opportunity of enriching our own religious thought by comparison with that of others. If the reader choose only such passages as are in accordance with his own views—necessarily, therefore, only a small part of the Bible—he deprives his hearers, and himself, too, of the advantage of having other aspects of religion presented to them. And it is not good for a congregation to have religion presented to them exclusively through the medium of one mind, coloured by its preferences and its dislikes. I have always explained to my congregation that I read the lessons not as my own words (or opinions) but expressly as those of someone else, and that I do so for the purpose of studying some often widely different aspect of religion. On these lines I have read from the Bible all, or nearly all, that is suitable for public reading, without in the least considering whether it was or was not true for me. And having thus nearly the whole Bible to range over, I have never felt any necessity to go outside it in search of pulpit-lessons.

But why keep to the Bible only when (as I admit most heartily) there are noble passages in other writers worthy to rank with the best—or all but the best—in the Bible? I reply that the problem is to be solved on grounds not of theory but of practice, of what best meets the purpose with which lessons are read at all in a religious service. When something is read from the pulpit it is read, presumably, that it may be intelligently followed and understood by those who hear it. Else, there is no good in reading it. The Bible has this great recommendation over every other book that the hearers know in a general way something about it, and can, if they will, follow the reading in Bibles of their own. Besides which, they have heard many of the passages over and over again. But, if a passage be read from some other book, they have nothing to guide them as to what it is all about, and they could very seldom be in a position to follow the reading in a copy of their own. My own experience, when I have heard some extra Biblical passage read from the pulpit, has been that it is extremely difficult to take in and follow such a passage so as to be able to say afterwards what it was about. So far as I was concerned, the lesson on those occasions has been practically useless. I preached, some years ago, in a chapel where Mr. Hopps' book of selected passages had been in use. I read the lessons from the Bible, as I always do. After the service the remark was made to me: "What a relief it was to hear the Bible again."

Then, is no use to be made of the great writers outside the Bible? That would be a great and needless loss. But I should say that the best place for such selections, considering the object in view, is the sermon not the lesson. If you want to read from Marcus Aurelius or Emerson, &c., you can, in the sermon, lead up to him, explain what the passage is about, and what you want it to enforce or illustrate. You can also bring it in just where you want it, just where it will do most to deepen the impression you are trying to make. In this way you can get a much better hearing and understanding for the selected passage than by springing it suddenly, as a lesson, upon an unprepared and perhaps unwilling congregation. I have gone on these lines for more than twenty years, and see no present reason to alter them. I offer them for the consideration of your readers.

R. TRAVERS HERFORD.

ANGLO-GERMAN RELATIONS:

SIR,—As a lover of peace and concord among nations, I am deeply grateful to you for your remarks on the above subject in THE INQUIRER of January 20: The German people, as a whole, I am convinced, are in favour of peaceful and even cordial relations with England, and it is only a section of the Press here as well as there, together, perhaps, with some of the military class who are afraid of the growing power of Socialism in this country, and think a successful war would put an end to it, who try to foment discord between the two countries. Having lived now for over two years in Germany as a student at the University of Marburg, I can bear testimony to the great kindness shown by the German people to English and all foreign students and residents here, and also to the good feeling prevailing towards England. I have myself met with such kindness at their hands that I feel it my duty to express my gratitude for it publicly in this way, and to do what little I can to dispel the ignorance which seems to prevail in some circles in England as to the real character of the German nation. I feel sure that if the people of England and Germany only knew each other thoroughly, they would never dream of such a thing as war between the two countries: One of the best correctives for jingoistic hatred of any country is travel, or, better still, residence in that country itself; and I would advise anyone who thinks Germany is longing for an opportunity to crush England to come over here for a few months and live among the people, so that he (or she) might know their feelings and aspirations. Ignorance is the mother of jealousy and hatred. Let, then, all friends of peace do their utmost to remove that ignorance.

OBITUARY.

JOHN JONES, OF HINDLEY.

THE Hindley Presbyterian Chapel and Sunday-school have lost their old friend and devoted worker, Mr. John Jones, who passed away on January 26, aged 79:

In early life, while living at Warrington, he came in contact with the Rev. Philip Carpenter, whom he ever held in affectionate remembrance. To the influence of that worthy minister, John Jones, in common with many other young men, owed largely his practical outlook upon life, and his earnest desire to act well his part. His life-long interest in the temperance question, the co-operative movement, and Sunday-school work dates from the days spent at Warrington. After a period of wandering among various towns and villages in search of suitable employment, he settled down as clerk in the office of the Douglas Bank Colliery Company, near Wigan. Here, by steady application, he rose to be cashier, and after more than fifty years of diligent and faithful service, he retired a few years ago on an annuity which was granted to him. Not only did he win the confidence of his employers, but the esteem and affection of his fellow-workers. One of the chief joys of his declining years was to receive the testimony of younger men, who had worked by his side, that the success which they have achieved, and the honourable positions which they held, they owe very largely to his counsel and example. Though of a stern and forbidding aspect, he was in nature most genial and kindly.

During the ministry of the Rev. George Hoade, Mr. Jones became connected with the Hindley congregation. His practical sympathies led him to the Sunday-school. For almost 40 years he acted as its superintendent, and for 20 years never missed an attendance. Successive generations of scholars passed under his care, and it is needless to say that all who now survive him, cherish his memory.

As the acting trustee of the chapel funds for almost forty years, his business ability and moral integrity have been most marked. When the financial affairs fell into his hands they were in a very confused state. He worked at them most assiduously, and brought order out of chaos. As a friend has said of him, "he took the chapel finances in hand in the very prime of his life, toiled at them for years with very little help, and by wise and faithful stewardship, not only put affairs on a sure and solid basis, but slowly and carefully built them up from the basis into the healthy condition of things which the congregation inherits to-day."

The knowledge which he had gained in connection with mining operations, and the business ability he had shown in connection with trust funds were well known, and his counsel and advice were often sought by trustees of neighbouring congregations:

The funeral took place on January 30 in the Hindley Cemetery, and was conducted, in the enforced absence of the minister, Rev. John Moore, who is seeking to recruit health in South Devon, by the Rev. J. J. Wright, of Atherton, a friend and neighbour for many years.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

More than Father and Mother.

IN the teaching of Jesus, as we find it recorded in the Gospels, there is a sentence which, I am sure, has seemed to many a child a very hard saying. You will find it in Matthew x. 37, where Jesus is giving instructions to his disciples. We cannot be certain that all the teaching in that chapter is exactly as he spoke it, but that is how it was reported among the people after his death. It shows how they felt that to be true to his spirit they must follow him in perfect unselfishness, trusting in the loving care of the heavenly Father, and ready to suffer, even as he did, on the Cross, rather than be false to what he had shown them to be true. This is the sentence, in verse 37:—"He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me."

That seems a hard saying. But really it does not mean that father and mother are to be loved any less than perfectly. What it does is to show how they are to be loved, and how, when it is understood and truly felt, that love becomes more beautiful and perfect than ever.

Remember that other saying, in which Jesus is speaking of what we ought to care most about in our life. For outward things, such as food and clothing, we are not to care so much as for the inward things of character. Our bread, if we are to have it, must be honestly got: Our heavenly Father knows that we have need of those outward things. And then Jesus adds: "But seek ye first his kingdom, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you" (Matt. vi. 33).

Sometimes a man has to starve, and do without those outward things which are needful for our life here on earth: He has to do it, as the martyrs did, of whom we spoke last week, for the sake of righteousness. We have to care most of all that what we do shall be honourably done, that our life may be built on the foundation of righteousness; and then, all the outward things, which our heavenly Father gives to us, through honest work and careful planning, and good use of all the beautiful gifts of the earth, come to us with His blessing. We feel that He has indeed given them to us in that true way. But it is better to do without them, and even to die, than be false to what we know is right and true and good.

So Jesus puts the inward law of righteousness in the first place, and we know that in our own life it ought to be so.

And now look again at that hard saying: "He that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me." We may put it in this way. Jesus is speaking of himself as the teacher of that inward law of righteousness. To be worthy of him is to be true to his teaching, which is that righteousness must come first, even in the love of father and mother. It must come first if we are to love them with the best and most perfect love. Any other kind of love, which might be described as loving them more than the great Teacher and his inward law of righteousness, would be not only unworthy of him, but unworthy of them: Thus, if anyone does a dishonourable thing for the sake of love, putting the love before honour and righteousness, it is poisoned at the root: That is not the kind of love that father and mother want from their children. In their own lives and their children's lives they want to have righteousness put first, that so their love may be perfected.

Do you remember the story of Sir Thomas More in Henry the Eighth's reign? He had a very beautiful and happy home life, and had been high in the King's favour. He was at one time Speaker of the House of Commons, and afterwards Lord Chancellor. But when the King was declared Head of the Church he thought it wrong, and rather than be false to his own conviction, and give a dishonourable assent, he suffered the loss of all that he had, and was beheaded as a traitor. But his daughter, Margaret Roper, and his friends knew that he was a brave and honourable man. They loved him all the more, because he so nobly held to what he believed to be the truth. His home life was so beautiful, because he had put righteousness first. The love which bound him and his daughter together was more deep and tender on that account; and when he died she remembered him with a deeper love than ever. If he had chosen to betray his own honour and live on, their love could never have been so perfect again.

That kind of choice has often to be made. In the year 1662 the Act of Uniformity was passed, and those who had been ministers of religion in the Commonwealth time had to choose between accepting the Prayer Book and the order of Church government under the Bishops as the law directed, or going out from their homes and giving up their livings in the Church. Many were ready to conform, but two thousand of them chose rather to be true to their own conscience, and keep their honour unstained by what to them would have been a pretended conformity, for the sake of keeping their worldly position. They resigned their livings and went out often to poverty, and to find some new way of earning daily bread. Many of them suffered grievous things, and one can well imagine that worst of all was having to bring their children to such distress.

But think how you would have felt if you had been one of those, and your father had been called to make that choice. Would you have begged him to be false to his own conviction of truth, to pretend, and to go on for years acting a lie in the solemn service of religion, for the sake of keeping your happy home? Could it have been happy afterwards, with that stain of dishonour upon it? Would it have been a perfect love that asked him to do that false thing, or that led him to do it? No; you would have stood by him, and have felt with him that he must be true at all cost. You would have gone out with him to poverty, but with love unspoiled, ready to suffer bravely, knowing that to be the only true way.

So it must be in our common, peaceful life: We must put righteousness first. Then only can we have perfect and unclouded love:

MR. BIRRELL'S PROBLEM.

PARLIAMENT is to meet on the 13th inst., and as soon as it can get to actual work it will be matter of the keenest interest to see what the Government will do with their splendid majority. It is much to have defeated the proposed policy of Protection; but neither men nor Governments can subsist on negations:

In certain directions there is an immediate call for action. Administrative reforms are needed in the army and navy; the land question, alike as regards tenure, easier access, and taxation of values, should certainly receive early attention; drastic alterations are required in the national finances so as to secure greater economy on the one hand, and on the other a more equitable apportionment of burdens. The licensing question urgently demands attention, and, unless the prophetic heart of the brewing interest was not greatly deceived, this was one of the matters most certain to be dealt with should that happen which has happened. In the interests not of a trade, but of the community at large, whose health, morals, and pocket are at stake, it must be hoped that the laws will be altered which now so ominously secure a baleful business from serious diminution.

But the schools question, it has been already announced, will be given a foremost place in the Government programme. The decision is a wise one, despite the difficulties involved. There was no action on the part of the late Government that caused such earnest protest as their measures dealing with education. The method was bad, the legislation violated the fundamental principle of self-government. Contrary to all expectation, and in spite of strenuous dissuasion, Mr. BALFOUR used the great majority awarded him upon a war policy to undo the peaceful work of a generation. He abolished the great School Boards; he cancelled the "compromise" which, however much some of us felt bound to criticise it, had operated with a minimum of friction until a small party of Anglican extremists arose to upset it under the leadership of Mr. ATHELSTAN RILEY. Mr. BALFOUR did more. He went beyond the wildest dreams of ardent Churchmen, as high authorities confessed, and while practically reserving to private management the control of sectarian schools he placed them, equally with the publicly provided schools, upon the rates. The rise of "Passive Resistance" only marks overtly an indignation which was felt far beyond the circles favourable to that special form of protest.

And now Mr. AUGUSTINE BIRRELL has his chance, and his risk. Those who are familiar with his writings and personality cannot but feel drawn in sympathy to one whose genial skill has illuminated many an hour for them, and whose temper has ever been wise and healthful. His friends and admirers hailed his appointment with unfeigned congratulations; but the justification of their cheers is not fully come as yet. He puts on his armour, but the taking off is another matter. Is he about to succeed where the rugged Mr. FORSTER and the dexterous Mr. BALFOUR found trouble enough and to spare? Is he strong enough to keep a clear straight course? Is he enough of a politician to compute correctly the forces of present-day currents of feeling, and enough of a statesman to forecast far issues and draw men's minds after him into wiser ways? Such are the questions men are asking, not without hopes mingled with reserve.

In regard to education, most of us agree that it is a matter of national concern; that it needs more and not less of provision and attention; and that the principles of unification through the whole course, from the elementary school up to the University, which were more or less heartily endorsed in Mr. BALFOUR's Acts, are wise. More difference of opinion exists as to the propriety of "ad hoc authorities," i.e., public bodies elected solely for educational management. Our forebodings as to the enormous burdens entailed by adding the work of the School Board to that of the County Council have been but too surely verified. The tendency to official control, and a less eager public interest, is only too evident. Yet, we think, few practical people would commend a sudden reversion to the old system. After all, it is sound policy to make the spenders of the rates responsible directly to the ratepayers, and, so far as our observation goes, we have not yet noticed any disposition seriously to cripple the schools for lack of supplies. Mr. BIRRELL is not likely to interfere here.

But it is obvious that alterations must be made in regard to the management and staffing of the "non-provided" (i.e., sectarian) schools. If any body of persons, earnestly desiring to diffuse special religious doctrines, is willing to supply the cost of maintaining a school for the purpose, such body is as free to act as the committee of a chapel. But if these persons will not supply the cost, or (as now amply proved in regard to many sectarian schools) if with all their efforts they cannot, with the result of a grossly defective and impoverished system, they have no right to ask the general body of ratepayers to give them the means for their private, however laudable, enterprises. The principle is so clear that ten years ago its enunciation would have been a mere truism. Indeed, in Mr. BALFOUR's legislation itself the principle was so far in view as to lead to a curious half-and-half policy. The sectarian schools were put on the rates, but a minority of public managers was put on the boards of management. A minority is better than none, but it is still a minority; and the practical result of such a law is still that private hands administer public funds. Then there was the question of the teachers. "Half-and-half" again prevailed. The subordinates might be unpledged in matters theological; the heads must be tested. These unsatisfactory tinkering must give way to a more lasting because a more logical policy. If the sects have property of their own in the schools (doubtless they have, but not nearly so much as is pretended) let them be reimbursed if they wish. But they cannot be allowed to buy with their bricks and mortar the liberties of the community.

"What, then, of religious teaching?" Mr. Birrell is known to be a moderate man, but then he is a Nonconformist; and his sympathies may only too easily sway unconsciously towards a solution specially favourable to his co-religionists. If he yields to bias in this direction he will be as much at fault, in our opinion, as if he favoured Anglican or Catholic. Our Nonconformist friends must excuse us if we say that there are people who are as little in love with ordinary "simple Bible teaching" as they can be with what is called "priest-doctrine." Mr. BIRRELL will find his task especially difficult now that sectarian schools have for a while been drawing upon the public purse for all sorts of theological equipment. But if he will take the bull by the horns, and not yield to noisy clamour, he may set his mark upon the long and tedious pages of educational legislation as a true reformer. Let him once for all establish a non-theological system, such as befits a State composed of people of the most diverse opinions, each being as fully entitled to State respect as the others. If the majority of parents wish (as probably they vaguely do) that the children should have Biblical instruction, let it be given as thoroughly and honestly as may be by special teachers who are certificated as experts not in doctrine, but in Scriptural knowledge. That is a matter which could very well be left to local option, under full public scrutiny and control. Let the other teachers, who, in the main, know better what is good for the children than outsiders, be encouraged to equip themselves fully as all-round educators—skilful in moral as in mental discipline. But let those who wish to teach theological doctrine do it in their own time and at their own expense.

TOWARDS SOCIAL REFORM.

THE LAND AND THE UNEMPLOYED.

FOR nearly nine years I lived in close contact with men and women of the unemployed class and their children. I slept in the same house, shared their meals, their daily labours, and joined with them in the evening pastimes. And I am glad to write for THE INQUIRER something based upon that experience by way of contribution to the discussion now in progress in your columns; especially glad because a religious community such as ours may be expected to look at this problem in a broad-minded and humane manner, not thinking exclusively of such work as a cold scientific experiment in political economy nor exclusively as a ratepayer's financial experiment designed to reduce rates and taxes, not even as a partial solution of the land question, but, in addition to all these things, and perhaps chiefly, as a means of reforming characters and enriching lives whose poverty of purse is often the least part of their poverty. It is not a simple problem calling for a simple remedy; on the contrary, it is a complicated problem and it demands a complicated remedy. The experienced employer of labour who affirms idleness on the part of the labourer to be the chief factor, the ardent teetotaler who affirms drunkenness as the chief factor, the land nationaliser who believes that the denial of free access to the land is the main cause of the unemployed problem, are all of them, in spite of shrewdness and patriotism, too narrow or limited in outlook. Each one of these causes is important, but the rectification of any one of these things would still leave us with our unemployed problem. It is only in a colony that a complicated remedy can be attempted, and I still believe therefore that labour colonies are efforts in the right direction, where men and women of weak character can be protected from some of the temptations of the city such as drink and gambling, and where free access to the land has been secured within the limited area of the settlement. The temptations to drink are peculiarly seductive to the unemployed man. The occasional work which is given to him is generally of an arduous kind, involving severe physical strain, and it is offered frequently when his muscles are soft and when the man is hungry. He finishes his task, receives his pittance, looks back at many days of grey misery, and feels that the respite of a glorious hour of intoxication is no more than he deserves, and at every street corner there is the light and warmth of the drink-shop; so, having no wise friend or counsellor to help him at the moment when the craving is keenest, and the means of gratification are in his purse, he falls again, and again, and again, and at last he is a decrepit old man, and he knows himself useless, unhonoured, and unpitied. I believe that this life could probably have been saved from the lower depths of misery and degradation by removing him from the casual labour and the extreme temptations of the city, and placing him in a well-managed labour colony, where the drink temptation would be obliterated altogether or greatly reduced, where the man would be properly fed, and where the work would be adjusted to his strength and power of endurance.

For the benefit of those readers who may not be acquainted with the facts of the experiment I carried out, let me briefly recapitulate the outline of the story. Before my settlement in Liverpool as minister of the Hamilton-road Free Church, I had become convinced of the advisability of a scheme of land nationalisation, whereby the land should be gradually acquired by proper purchase and not by confiscation. Working amongst the poor of that city as a voluntary visitor of the Charity Organisation Society, I was made to realise the seriousness of the problem of the unemployed. Their numbers were greater than I had imagined; their sufferings more acute, and the personal characters of several men I came to know intimately were marked by temperance, fortitude, and some I knew were men of skill in various trades. Such men and women were unable to obtain work, and they would have died from hunger had it not been for the help they received from the workhouse, or the gifts doled out to them by charitably disposed persons. I realised that in either event they were maintained in idleness at considerable expense to the community; also that enforced idleness and the receipt of doles instead of wages, must inevitably end in the demoralisation of a very large number of excellent persons. It was obvious that under ordinary conditions (which are competitive) the labour market could not offer work to these people. But, on the other hand, their own daily necessities—their need for homes, food, fuel, clothing, education, and amusement—indicated definite useful work which could be provided for them if they could have free access to the land, and if they could have a capable organiser of their labours. So it came to pass that I wrote a book called "Poverty and the State," and, subsequently, a society was formed called the "Home Colonisation Society," whose object was to purchase an estate by voluntary gifts, and to place upon it a number of unemployed persons, in order that they might produce their own food, clothing, and shelter. A large experiment was really needed in order to test the principle—an estate of 400 acres and a population of 300 persons, under a director of agricultural and manufacturing experience and of that peculiar ability which is manifested in the easy management of working men: I lectured on behalf of this enterprise in all the large towns of England and Scotland, but failed to meet with a sufficient financial response. Eventually, however, a sum was raised sufficient to buy 128 acres of land and to equip a small colony, of which I (under pressure and with many misgivings as to my fitness) undertook to become voluntary director for a period of seven years. As a matter of fact, the work remained under my control for nearly nine years, when my society, at my recommendation, handed over its work and its estates and capital to a similar society of more recent origin, but of orthodox evangelical principles, known as the Christian Union for Social Service. Since the Westmoreland settlement has been in their hands its policy has been considerably changed. Whereas I was satisfied to receive colonists who came "on tramp" and without any "character" or recommendation, the present council will only receive two classes—(1) those who are sent by the Poor Law Guardians, for whom a weekly payment of money is contributed; and (2) epileptic boys, on whose account, again, a weekly payment is demanded in every case. The Browhead estate is used to find work for the nominees of the Guardians; the Starnthwaite estate is used as a colony for epileptic boys.

When I handed over the estate the property was absolutely free from debt, and after all obligations had been cleared there was about £800 of working capital, which was also handed to my successors. During the last three and a half years of my directorate I carried on the work without outside financial help. The estate had been considerably improved, for, in addition to the daily duties involved in the production of fruit, jam, vegetables, milk, butter, bread, &c., and the work of the cornmill, the sawmill, and village carpentry, we had built a new house of considerable size, new barns, outhouses, and greenhouses (one of which produced a ton of tomatoes every year), and hundreds of young fruit trees had been planted. It was a piece of good fortune that we were able to begin operations in a place where we could produce our own peat fuel, where fruit could be grown, and where the river was stocked with trout and salmon in its season.

The success of such a colony must depend very largely upon the director; he should be a man of many parts, able by his shrewdness in the market to buy and sell at the best time and price, so as to command financial "success," and also able to command the loyalty, obedience, and, if possible, the love of an erratic community, so as to command the "success" which pertains to a much nobler kind of venture. I was always keenly conscious of my shortcomings in this office. I had entered the ministry as a young man partly because I did not admire the relationship which usually exists between the foreman of a workshop and the "hands" for whose productive capacity he is made responsible. To the minister of religion a brotherly relationship with men everywhere is practicable; but in a colony for unemployed labourers a large number of workmen are found who have been dismissed by foremen as unremunerative persons under competitive conditions. I am therefore warranted, I think, in the supposition that much better results would be obtained in a colony directed by a trained and qualified director, and in a larger colony. The chief difficulty in the management of a small colony is that just the same number of occupations must be carried on (and at the same season) as in a larger community, and when the men have their tasks apportioned, some to planting potatoes, another group to cutting peat-fuel, another group to the feeding of stock, for example, the groups are numerically so small and their distances so far apart, that it does not pay to have the right kind of men as overseers of each task. This difficulty would not exist if each group was larger.

Altogether about 160 colonists worked under me during these years: some remained four or five years, some only a few days: many had been habitual drunkards before coming to me, and partly because the estate was more than a mile distant from any public-house and partly because we always had abundant amusements of an evening amongst ourselves, it was a very rare thing to have to deal with a drunken colonist. Some who had been habitual drunkards were quite sober for a period of two years: but I found in three or four such cases that when the colonists—both men and women—went back to the towns they fell back into intemperate habits. A large number of colonists came to me in a bad state of health; some were apparently threatened with consumption, but after a few months of life and work in the country air they became robust, and I often receive letters from these old-time colonists expressing gratitude for a kind of medicine which the hospitals are unable to provide. I was also able to receive some young lads who had been imprisoned for short terms as “first offenders,” who lived happily with us for two or three years and found work and gave satisfaction to new employers elsewhere. Two months ago I received a letter from an old-time colonist, who wrote to say that although he now had constant work and a wife and children in whom he took great delight, the brightest days of his life were the three years he spent at the colony.

It is beyond all question that work itself is more attractive in the open air than in the factory: the unchecked daylight, and the exposure to varying weather stand for health, and health is happiness. Moreover that which is most hateful in work to the “loafer,” is its dreary monotony. If you would woo him back to a new attitude of mind, it is good policy to give tasks which vary from day to day, such as the colony work provides. Spring, summer, autumn, winter, in the factory it is always the same; the worker is confined to a few square feet of space on the factory floor, and over his head is a white-washed ceiling. On the colony the work is a frequent set of changes from draining, to ploughing, to planting, to building, to harvesting, to carting, and each one of these tasks involves a wide space for movement, and wherever you work, you are never shut out from the influences of the sky.

The salvation of men and women is always profitable work, even if it appears on the surface that money has been lost in the enterprise. If two or three hundred persons are unemployed, they are assuredly kept at the expense of the community. It may not be easy to trace this expenditure, but it certainly is going on, and human degradation is also going on along with the expenditure. If these persons be induced to work so as to earn half the cost of their maintenance it is not only money which has been saved, but something in a man's character has been saved which is beyond all price.

My experience at Starnthwaite and Browhead Colony has given me a new idea of salvation which will require very little argument to commend it to Unitarians. It is a popular idea to expect of a man or woman whom we wish to “save” from some vice—such as drink, sex-immorality, or theft—that they shall give us an exhibition of “sudden conversion.” Theologically we do not believe in “instantaneous conversions,” but in practical life we expect it of every poor sinner we try to help. I have learnt that this is all contrary to nature and life, and that the expectation tends rather to beget hypocrisy on the part of the sinner than salvation from his particular vice. Many a critic has assured me that because some of my old-time colonists fell back into the drink-habit after they had left the colony, it was a proof that they had not been “saved,” and they would deprive me of the joy I know when I think of those two “saved” years. We are each one of us the result of millions of years of evolution; and if we even think of ourselves as the sons of God we must also think of the Divine patience, and see to it that human patience shall somehow be a reflex of the Father's. Here and there we see a life which appears to have been wholly thrown away; it seems to us as if the man had died with a character wholly undeveloped after seventy years of life. And yet we know that it is not so. The progress which is the outcome of “persistent favourable variation” tells us of the countless Divine expedients by which God is drawing the race of man up to Himself. And those two years of sobriety must count as factors in the salvation of that habitual drunkard when the record is complete and the work is finished.

If colonies for the unemployed were established in every county of Britain I believe that they would teach us how best to use the uncultivated land; and also enable us to give the best kind of help to those who receive the least help at present, but who require the most—namely, the labourer who does not like work, chiefly because the force of life is feebleness in him than in the average man.

“LOOKING FOR WORK.”

SIR,—I am glad to see such interesting letters as those in your last issue in your social columns. However good religious or political questions may be, it is their relation to society that is most important.

With a new Government, widely supported efforts for the amelioration of the country must arise.

No doubt a Government's first duty is the repression of crime; but the Englishman loves his liberty, and very properly asks for opportunity for the individual to exercise his faculties for his own benefit and that of his country. Our time as individuals is, after all, very short, and our quota to the common good can only be small. But we want of the Government that it shall do its best to promote love and not hate, and permeate the Empire with the spirit of brotherly trust and affection that shall make a mark in the history of the nations.

It is quite right to protect property from unjust treatment, and it is yet more important to neutralise and modify the tyrannous power which wealth has of overriding the rest of the community and enslaving labour for the purpose of accumulating riches and possessions. One of its great duties should be to organise all efforts for the prevention of pain and suffering and disease for the industrial community, to stimulate the opening of all new opportunities and facilities for the comfort and happiness and prosperity of the people. The poor unemployed suffer and cry to the Government for help. The real duty of the Government is to control circumstances on such lines as shall give every man facilities and opportunities for securing to each a fair share of the abundance which God has given to the earth, only awaiting development by human effort.

The compassion of this last century has filled society with a multiplicity of arrangements for alleviating suffering and distress; but the worst feature of them is that they all tend to sap the manliness and independence of the recipients.

One would rejoice to see this new twentieth century at work devising schemes for protecting the individual from disaster. If the nation only willed it, much might be done to secure our brethren from falling into these unhappy positions. I venture to believe that much of the suffering is preventable. Of course, we cannot prevent accident altogether, but a spirit of beneficent providence would mightily reduce suffering. Steps should be taken to redeem life from all unfavourable conditions, and to open out fields for enterprise.

Your correspondent of last week, Mr. Simon, points to one important factor—viz., the ready facility for emigration. It should be the first duty of a paternal Government to see that not only city people can get some country air, but that its subjects shall have, like penny postage, cheap and ready access to all parts of the Empire in search for most suitable conditions of healthy climate, cheap food, and fresh opportunity. The Government might easily arrange that parliamentary tickets be supplied for reaching every part of the Empire—say 20s. and 40s. for travelling, with a cheap commissariat.

We want a great move in education to develop all the latent talents of the rising generation; sound conditions for growing in health and life and building up thriving communities. If the Colonies are to become one with us as an Empire, we must make out like conditions everywhere, and discard our insular fears and prejudices which claim for England that all the best skill, ability, and enterprise should be retained for this island. Most new efforts require capital. The private lender looks for large interest, but the Nation can advance at little more than two per cent.

If the Empire is to be strong and healthy, we must legislate to strengthen not only the centre, but all weak parts, and we shall not accomplish this until we arrange for quick and easy transit to every part. All companies supplying carrying power should be compelled to supply at least 2 per cent. of their accommodation on land or water, say at a farthing a mile, or some small rate.

Plenty of land in our Southern Colonies, at present bare under a warm sun, lies waiting for that stimulus of water for irrigation to make it smiling and productive; dams for storm water, canals and reservoirs, need capital and labour. A good supply of motors, for people and goods, in many places would obviate the outlay on railways.

I see Mr. Solly refers to South Africa, yet Namaqualand, south of the Orange River, has five beds of copper, that only want converting into phosphor bronze to produce wealth and service.

Cheap and easy transit all over the Empire is the foundation of progress and the root of well-being for our people.

NOTICE OF REMOVALS.

SIR,—The North Lancashire and Westmoreland Unitarian Association, at a recent meeting, considered the question of the removal of Unitarians into the district covered by the Association, which includes the seaside resorts of Blackpool, St. Anne's and Lytham, and Morecombe, also Kendal, Lancaster, Preston, and Chorley. It is a wide district into which there are a great many removals every year; and experience has proved that in too many cases our secretaries and ministers have not been made acquainted with the fact that members of our Church from other districts have come to reside in their midst. So many of them have been accidentally discovered, who were too shy to make themselves known, or for other reasons did not do so, that it was resolved to invite the cordial co-operation of ministers and secretaries in other districts in trying to prevent what is felt to be a great leakage through these removals.

May we, therefore, on behalf of the above Association, avail ourselves of your space in calling attention to the above resolution? The secretary of the Association, or the secretaries or ministers of the above churches, would be glad to receive the names and addresses of any members of our household of faith who should remove into the district.

Would it not be advisable to have printed forms common to all our churches and schools, whereby these removals from one district to another could be systematically followed up on a somewhat uniform plan?

THEISTIC CONFERENCE AT BENARES.

THE Theistic Conference first met in 1889 in Bombay, and with one or two exceptions has since met annually at the same time as the Indian National Congress. Last year under the energetic secretaryship of Mr. V. R. Shinde, B.A., the Conference showed more life than ever, and the annual meeting held at Benares on the last days of the year was a great success. There is, as yet, no branch of the Brahmo Samaj at Benares, but representatives came together from all parts of India, and were able to spend the week all together, in common quarters. This was of great service in the opportunity it afforded for intimate fellowship between workers from widely separated provinces.

Pundit Sivanath Sastri, of Calcutta, was elected President, and on December 30 delivered a remarkable address, the first part of which we shall publish next week. On the morning of that same day Mr. Promotholal Sen conducted a devotional service, and preached an English sermon, in which he made an earnest plea for a truer spirit of devotion.

At the opening of the Conference proper, after prayer, the President moved the following resolution, which was adopted solemnly, the whole assembly standing in silence:—

“That this Conference of Theists from all parts of India records its deep sense of sorrow at the departure from this world of the Venerable Maharshi Devendranath Tagore who infused new life into the Brahmo Samaj at a most critical period of its existence, and who by the deep spirituality of his nature and his devoted labour in its cause has laid all Brahmos under a deep debt of lasting gratitude; and of the Rev. Bhai Pratapchandra Mozoomdar who by his life-long devotion to the cause of Theism, whose banner he carried all round the world, by the purity and independence of his character, by the charming poetry of his devotions, and by his interpretation of the East to the West and of the West to the East has rendered inestimable service to the Brahmo Samaj.”

It was agreed that the next meeting of the Conference should be held at Calcutta, and the Committee was appointed with our friends Promotholal Sen and Hemchandra Sarkar as secretaries. Mr. Shinde remains a member of the Committee. He was requested to undertake the Editorship of a Theistic Directory.

THE two lectures on “The Church in France,” delivered by Mr. J. E. C. Bodley at the Royal Institution, are appearing in full in the Guardian. The first lecture is in the issues of Jan. 31 and Feb. 7, and the second is to follow.

Two more names we may add to the list in our note of last week of Unitarians in the new House of Commons:—C. P. Allen (Gloucester, Stroud), and R. Pearce (Staffs., Leek).

THE FAMILY CARE OF THE INSANE POOR IN ENGLAND AND WALES.

In two previous articles the family care system of the insane, as practised on the Continent and in Scotland, was briefly described, and what may be regarded as severe strictures were passed upon this country for slowness to adopt methods which have proved so beneficial. But, it might be urged, the family care of the insane poor has been established in England and Wales for some fifteen years, and there are now more than 5,000 (five thousand) lunatics under this system, recognised by the authorities. This is quite true. The Lunacy Act of 1890 was a step in the direction of family care for the insane poor. Unfortunately, instead of a whole-hearted, intelligent adoption of the system after a careful study of Continental and Scottish methods, it is but a make-shift provision in which all the possible evils of family care are exaggerated, and its merits minimised. The provisions of the Act prove this, and its shocking results, results which were only to be expected, have been exposed in an exceedingly able report drawn up by the Special Commissioner of the British Medical Journal, a report which, supplemented by some more information with which the Commissioner has been good enough to furnish me, is the foundation of this article.

It will be obvious even to the most superficial observer that the two things capable of wrecking the family care system are insufficient inspection and unsuitability of homes.

The inspection which the framers of the Lunacy Act of 1890 deemed sufficient for a pauper lunatic consigned to the custody of a relative or friend is a quarterly visit from the Medical Officer of the Union or district. And this inspection, it should be added, is only in force while the relative or friend is in receipt of an allowance for the maintenance of the lunatic. This allowance may consist of medical relief alone, or a monetary grant of from 1s. 6d. to 7s. 3d. a week. In either case it is insufficient for the purpose, but this pittance, whether medical relief or cash payment, is the only hold which the authorities have upon a lunatic within their jurisdiction. As long as that pittance is applied for, the Medical Officer visits the patient once a quarter, and within three days of his visit is bound to furnish a report to the Visiting Committee as to whether the patient is properly taken care of, and may properly remain out of the asylum.

Medical officers are usually busy men, and one can imagine what a hurried performance this quarterly visit usually is; and yet it is the only check upon the abuses which are likely to result in the care of the insane poor when their guardians are utterly inefficient and the accommodation as untidy, dirty, and wretched as it too often is.

The Commissioner, after a careful examination, found 50 per cent. of the homes clean and comfortable, 13 per cent. dirty, and 37 per cent. either very dirty, untidy, and wretched, or appallingly filthy and abjectly poverty stricken. Overcrowding, meaning by that three or more sleeping in one room, occurred in 50 per cent. of the cases examined. Adult or adolescent patients, generally imbecile young men or women, frequently slept in the same rooms, and occasionally in the same beds as adult members of the family, of opposite sex, brother and sister, mother and son, father and daughters having sometimes the same bed. It is not necessary, it would indeed be too horrible, to instance some of the ascertained results of this promiscuity. And what of the guardians to whom is entrusted the care of these helpless beings?

In 51 per cent. of the cases examined they could be called good, in 14 per cent. doubtful, in 35 per cent. manifestly bad. Considering the want of care in their selection, and the utterly insufficient remuneration, it is a tribute to the goodness of human nature that 51 per cent. of the guardians can be called good. The fate of the imbecile patients in the hands of the 35 per cent. "manifestly bad" guardians is not pleasant to imagine. Sometimes this manifest badness is due to the fact that the guardian, usually a relative, is tainted by the disease from which the patient is suffering, and we have the insane taking care of the insane.

It requires no special knowledge to affirm that a system through which such results are possible is a disgrace to a nation which claims to be civilised. A reform is urgently needed, and the lines upon which it should proceed are clearly indicated in the able report from which I have quoted. These pauper lunatics should be included in the jurisdiction of the Commissioners of Lunacy, with periodic visitation. There should also be more frequent visitation by medical and lay officials, and last, but by no means least, a much more careful selection of both cases and guardians, and adequate remuneration of the latter.

Such reforms would at least cleanse our faulty family care system of its grossest abuses, but reform ought not to stay at that. The whole treatment of our insane population, not limited to the poor, urgently requires to be brought up to the standard attained by other civilised nations. What Dr. Bucknill, writing a quarter of a century ago, called "that stereotyped prejudice that a lunatic is a lunatic, and an asylum the best place for him,"* requires to be broken up. The vast experience gained by such men as the late Sir John Sibbald, whose splendid work in Scotland was alluded to in my last article, ought to be utilised.

With Dr. Bucknill we must still ask, "How much longer can the authorities uphold the wooden system of treating all lunatics alike? How long will the manufacture of 'asylum-made lunatics' be permitted to continue for the support of a remunerative business? How long will morbidly sensitive minds be subjected without dire necessity to trials which even the strongest cannot endure without danger and disaster?" How long? Until a chaos of blunder and brutality is forced to yield to an order scientific and humane.

VEXATIONS.

VEXATIONS are the little foxes of irritation that spoil the vine of life, that strip it of some of its fruit, of much of its comeliness. Vexations do not quite reach to the dignity of worries, which are often of considerable bulk and long duration; they have rather the qualities of pettiness and brevity. There are preventable vexations and unpreventable vexations. So far as they arise from without and are not provoked by ourselves, they are unpreventable. Live as blamelessly as we will, we cannot entirely keep people from doing vexatious things. We may start the day with the sincerest intentions of maintaining our affability and equanimity, but we shall rarely go far without meeting something to vex us. In the merchant's office it may be a letter expressing the annoyance of a customer at the manner in which an order has been executed or delayed—thanks to the negligence of some subordinate; in the home it may be some accident of domestic management; in the student's sanctum it may be some discordant street sound or other unwelcome interruption; in the public man's life it may be some foolish challenge or contradiction; but, whatever it is, it is small, yet, like a gnat, stinging, and leaving irritation behind. Vexations such as these we cannot prevent, but we can to a great extent prevent their marring our happiness or our work. Days there are, we know full well, when, because of some unusual buoyancy of spirits, or some much stronger counter-irritant, or—what is better—some new kindled enthusiasm or sense of purpose, these causes of vexation operate upon us in vain; we are vexation-proof. If we cannot prevent the coming of vexations, we can prevent their taking us by surprise; to expect them is half the conquest of them.

Preventable vexations spring chiefly from within. We say something inane when we should say something sensible, or flippant when we should say something serious, or serious when we should pass the incident off in banter; we do something haltingly when we ought to be firm, or harshly when we ought to be clement; and there is no end to the little causes of these little vexations. So far as they are the censure of our shallower by our deeper selves, they are valuable correctives. As our self-knowledge increases all such vexations should diminish; for we must either remove the causes of self-reproach or lose self-respect. It is no less our duty to fortify ourselves with a philosophy of life than it is to fortify ourselves with a Christian spirit. Our weak words and works are the consequence of want of vigilance, of self-possession, of steady intellectual discipline and moral purpose. Many of our annoyances and irritations are a result of the chaotic and unavailable condition of our intellectual and moral resources. The storekeeper whose stock is in confusion cannot bring forth for his clients things new and old, and in an emergency is as ill-off as though his store were empty. We possess what we can command at will. To become aware in moments of exigency that we have, lurking in remote recesses of the mind, vast stores of information, unlabelled and unavailable—fruits of debilitated will and irregular self-discipline—this is vanity and vexation of spirit. Then it is that we appreciate how much better than an acquaintance with many things is an intimate knowledge of a few things.

Then, again, vexations are real and imaginary. John Oliver Hobbes tells of a recluse who had carved over his library hearth, "I am an old man now. I have had lots of trouble, most of which never happened." Most of our vexations never happen, or at least their supposed causes do not. The people who "cut" us in the street, their heads disdainfully thrown aloft, so far from "cutting," never saw us; so far from thinking of their own superiority were thinking of nothing at all—their heads were as full of emptiness as ours of nonsense. The invitation withheld because we were not good enough for their society was really withheld out of consideration for our crowded engagements. Oh, we are mighty alchemists in the manufacture of slights. We take them from the base metal of our vanity, throw them into the crucible of our pride, heat them on the fire of our passions, and treasure them in the cabinet of our self-importance. "Most of our troubles never happen." Ah, Heaven, against which we rail, is kinder to us than we are to ourselves.

"Cowards die many times before their deaths;

The valiant never taste of death but once."

Life is a sweet stream, but we do so despise its sweet monotony, we must fain drop into it some bitter leaves for variety. The sun is full overhead, but we insist it casts shadows. "Man is born to trouble as the sparks fly upwards." Nay, but they will not fly upwards if you do not blow the fire. The flying sparks exhaust the fire. To keep it candescent without exhausting it, this is your task. Be warmed; be cheered; hold your hands to the glowing embers; look into the fire pictures; draw your friends around the same glad glow, and—leave the bellows to the hirelings.

But vexations will come? True. Yet need they find nothing in us? Our lives, with a little higher pitch, may be exalted above petty irritations. We must keep the fences of our hearts against the little vexations, or the greater evils of anxiety, worry, and despair will find a way in. We need the Divine spirit of the Master that we may see life steadily and see it whole. Given that spirit in sufficient measure, against vexations we shall be invulnerable. They will glance aside from us as darts from the person of Balder. "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee."

ALFRED THOMPSON.

THE four congregations of Mottram, Stalybridge, Mossley, and Ashton are holding a united "Three Days' Unitarian Missions" at each place in turn on the four successive Saturday to Mondays of the month. A devotional service, tea-meeting, and public meeting on the Saturday is to be followed by three special services on the Sunday and a lantern lecture on Monday evening. In connection with the mission at Mossley the annual meeting of the East Cheshire Christian Union will be held on Saturday, February 17.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LIVERPOOL.

SINCE the last report of our church work in this district, history on a larger scale and involving larger issues, has been making itself with such vigour as to obscure for the time the modest, plodding efforts of small religious organisations. A new era has begun—an era, we hope and believe, of progress, reform, and enlightenment. A great wave of intellectual activity and inquiry as to social and political problems has swept over the land, and it seems impossible that it should confine itself to those departments of life. The profound revolt of the religious conscience against partisan legislation, the loud demand for religious equality and justice, the discounting of priestly assumptions, all tend to open the way for clearer thinking on those matters for which the churches stand; and it is quite possible that in the hurly-burly old prejudices may be trampled under foot, and a fair chance be given for the logic of modern thought to win consideration. What has happened in the political world may happen in the theological realm, and principles may overcome policies. If such were to come true, have we, we of the freest churches, the faith and the enthusiasm to claim our rightful inheritance?

"We," "Our." What wicked words are these, if we are to believe our respected Manchester Mentor! (Blessed is he who does not understand the allusion!)

Yet I use them unabashed, unashamed! For what else do churches stand if not for the union, the fraternity of fellow-believers, bound together not by creeds but by a common need, a common purpose?

"We" is the true Christian symbol: "our" churches are the outward symbol of our brotherhood. Let us then honour them, love them, work for them, pray for them, sacrifice for them as the expression of our faith in God and man, in "Our Father," and "our brethren."

No great events have occurred in this group of churches of late, but they have not been asleep. There is a healthy continuance in well doing, which is better than spasms of energy followed too often by reaction. What we may call the "mother" churches claim the first word, for on their vitality much of the general health depends.

As far as can be seen by an outsider, the Ullet-road "Cathedral" was never in better plight. I understand that all but a few odd sittings are let, new families are attaching themselves (three in January!), attendances are very satisfactory, the many societies and institutions are in full life and vigour, while an indescribably inspiring and helpful spirit of sociability and warmth makes every corner of the noble building feel homelike. The minister and his true helpmate pervade the entire organism with such genial friendliness that the old and too often true accusation of the chilliness of Unitarianism seems a ludicrous libel.

While Hope street Church must for a long while yet feel and lament the loss of its late honoured leader, it has in his successor an energetic and talented preacher and worker. On all hands one hears of the ability and interest of his evening lectures; and he has attracted large and intelligent congregations by his clear and frank dealings with difficult problems. The Social Problem Circle has been of educational value to many, and things generally are doing well. A large and popular Band of Hope retains its hold on a wide range of young people, and many other useful works are done in a quiet and unostentatious manner.

One event of wider than merely local interest in this church must, however, be briefly recorded, viz., the erection and inauguration of a beautiful memorial of the ministry and work of the late Dr. Martineau. To the many who gathered at the opening ceremony, the reunion of old friends, the noble address of Professor Carpenter, and the memories which it recalled, combined to make an impression which will not soon fade away.

The smaller congregations, such as the Ancient Chapel and Gateacre, lead useful but uneventful lives, a note which also applies to Southport.

At Birkenhead, the last of the debt on the beautiful new church having been wiped off, plans are being laid for some definite work amongst the poor, on the lines of our Domestic Missions, with the notable difference that the work will be done by the members of the congregation, and not by a paid missionary; thus finding a field for the young life of the church to expand in. This can, however, hardly commence till summer is over.

Coming now to our missionary side, the first and most important item is the bold and successful effort of the Liscard church to attain its independence. A generously supported three-days' bazaar resulted in such a profit that the church has relinquished the grant-in-aid hitherto given by the Liverpool District Missionary Association, and stands on its own feet entirely. We all rejoice with its minister and members, and feel sure that the result will be a new spirit of zeal and progress.

The Bootle Free Church, situated in an entirely different centre, and with a different population around it, can hardly hope to achieve independence as yet, though the nucleus of an Independence Fund was set aside after the last sale of work. Apart from this a good work is going on. A membership of nearly 150, a fair morning and good evening congregations, high-class preaching, and many useful organisations, well justify its existence and such aid as is given to maintain it.

The more recent efforts at extension have not been as satisfactory as we could wish. At Garston, with a comfortable galvanised iron chapel to shelter them, a small number of earnest and zealous believers do all they can to deserve success; but, in the absence of a settled minister, depending on constantly changing supplies, and with the usual intolerance or apathy of the surrounding population against them, no steady growth seems probable. But it is the clear duty of the prosperous churches to give help wherever a few really earnest souls are gathered for worship; and there is no talk of giving in. At Widnes, however, a similar small group had to be disbanded owing to changes in the train service rendering it almost impossible to give preaching help. The chapel has been sold, and we must frankly own to a failure.

At St. Helens a quietly growing work is being done, which promises well. The congregation is solidifying, and a good spirit prevails. Rev. R. P. Farley is identifying himself with the interests of the townspeople, and played an active part in the late election, coming well out on the winning side. While done for its own sake, this work may also tell well on his religious propaganda.

Our Domestic Missions, which, after all, are only free churches maintained partly or wholly from the outside, continue their good work with unabated zeal and success. At Mill-street the grand buildings swarm with young and old, and throb with life. The great feature is the large band of cultured workers from the parent churches, who find here an ample field for their philanthropic energies. At present one topic is on every tongue. The beloved and valued missionary, the cheery son of Wales, the friend of everybody, is deserting the noble company of bachelors, and will shortly be married, whereat all who know and love him rejoice greatly, and wish for him and his bride every possible happiness.

At Hamilton-road an equally good work goes on, with this difference, that every worker is a member of the Mission, drawn from the ranks, inspired and led by Mr. Haigh, and repaying the light and leading received by passing it on to others. This Mission is a true spiritual democracy, and the energy evolved and expended is astounding. Another noteworthy feature is that although the members are of the same class, and no better off on the average than those of the other missions, they have a zeal for self-help, and raise in one way and another a good share of the current expenses of the work. A large mother's meeting, gathered by Mrs. Haigh, and an exhibition of needlework of a very high class, done by working girls, are also noteworthy items.

The Bond-street Mission, after a leaderless interval of some months, is now again in full swing. The Rev. W. Reynolds, the new missionary, has already more than doubled its congregation, has brought in new scholars to the Sunday-school, and is in many ways exercising a strong influence for good. A mothers' meeting of over 120 members is a marked feature here, a small number of ladies from the mother churches taking turns in conducting it.

Great interest is being aroused just now by the course of lectures by Professor Carpenter, the second of which was given last week to a large assembly of thoughtful hearers. These scholarly, impartial, and unsectarian addresses, throbbing as they do with an intense moral and religious earnestness, cannot but exercise a deep influence on all who listen to them.

The only definitely new item to record is a modest effort just begun in West Kirby, on the estuary of the Dee, where a number of former members of our various churches have settled. It has long been felt that an attempt should be made to draw these together for worship under conditions which would not offend their convictions, and at last the way seems open. Four morning services have been held in a hired room, and although the numbers so far have been small, the movement is heartily welcomed and several warm adherents can be counted on. The great difficulty is to get at those who ought naturally to be attracted. Handbills, placards, and advertisement all seem to fail. Nobody reads such things. Each week somebody turns up who has only accidentally heard of us. In time, however, it is hoped that a fair number can be reached, and, meanwhile, even the day of small things has its reward.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Ashton-under-Lyne.—The initial step in the actual building of the new church was taken on Saturday, January 27th, when, in the presence of a large gathering of members and friends, Mr. S. Moss (the newly-elected Warden) "turned the first sod." The little ceremony was accompanied by a brief devotional service, conducted by the minister (Rev. H. Kelsey White), in the course of which Mr. S. Smethurst gave a short account of the history of the movement from its inauguration (under Rev. W. C. Hall) eight years ago. He then, in the name of the congregation, invited the Warden to turn the sod. A hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Moss, on the motion of Mr. W. Belfield (Treasurer), seconded by Mr. Mr. J. Whitehead (who spoke on behalf of the Sunday School). After tea, the evening was devoted to music, games, and social intercourse, and the utmost heartiness characterised the proceedings throughout. About 150 were present. The stone-laying ceremony is expected to take place early in March. The church is to cost £3,000 of which £2,000 are already in hand.

Belfast: Mountpottinger.—The New Year tea and prize distribution to the Sunday-school scholars took place on Thursday, February 1st, the Rev. J. Worthington presiding over a large assemblage. The building of the new schoolroom is to be almost immediately begun.

Brighton.—The lecture hall was filled last Monday evening for a lecture by Mr. Aylmer Maude on "The Crisis in Russia." A very lucid and interesting account of the present position of affairs in Russia was followed by answers to a number of questions from members of the audience, which further showed Mr. Aylmer Maude's intimate knowledge of his subject. Rev. Priestley Prime presided.

Bury.—Mr. Cuthbert C. Grundy has given 500 medals to the members of the Bank-street Unitarian Sunday-school in commemoration of the centenary of the school.

Cullompton.—What this congregation is hoping to accomplish may be seen from their advertisement in another column.

Dover (Welcome Meeting).—On Wednesday, January 31, a meeting was held in the Adrian-street Church to welcome the Rev. C. A. Ginever as minister. The proceedings commenced with a tea, to which some seventy persons sat down, including Ensign Wright, of the Salvation Army, and the Rev. F. P. Basden, Congregational minister. After tea the company assembled in the church, which was quickly filled with a larger congregation than has gathered in it since the Provincial Assembly met at Dover. Mr. G. W. Chitty presided, and after the Rev. J. H. Smith, of Deal, had offered prayer, he expressed his pleasure at seeing the ministerial friends from other towns present. He hoped that the young people might grow up under Mr. Ginever's leadership, so that in after years they might be able to say, with George Jacob Holyoake, how much they owed to Unitarianism. They would welcome Mrs. Ginever very warmly as coming from a land bound to England for many years by ties of close sympathy. After the choir had sung "Shepherd of Souls," the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards said he probably knew more of Mr. Ginever than any other person present, and he must congratulate the church on its choice. He would venture to prophesy that Mr. Ginever's ministry would be productive of much good. Mr. Edward Chitty, on behalf of the congregation, offered Mr. Ginever a very hearty welcome. The Rev. S. Burrows, Mr. Ginever's predecessor, and the Rev. Gardner Preston, of Hastings, having joined in the welcome, the Rev. C. A. Ginever thanked his friends for all they had said. The invitation to Dover had come as a surprise to him. He felt sure of the hearty co-operation of the members of the church; there were so many who were only waiting to get to work. Already they were going to build a new Sunday-school. He hoped shortly to have a home in Dover; it would be open to all, and they would find him always ready to help in any way he could. He had come to Dover primarily as a fellow-worker. The Church should be a body of workers. He prayed that God's blessing might rest on all their work. It is hoped that the proposed new Sunday-school will be built and equipped by the autumn.

London: Stepney Green.—The year began with an encouraging accession of scholars to the Sunday-school. The annual prize distribution took place on a recent Sunday afternoon, Mr. and Mrs. Stuart, of Unity Church, Islington, kindly presiding. At the morning service the younger children sang an anthem very creditably. At the social meeting on 1st inst., which was well attended, Miss Miranda Hill, assisted by Miss Florence Hill, gave a most interesting lantern lecture describing their recent tour in Italy.

Preston.—Professor Carpenter delivered his second lecture on "The Gospels and how to read them" in the Lower Crush Room last Tuesday evening. The room was again crowded with a much larger proportion of men. The lectures have created a great excitement in the town.

Seven Kings, Ilford.—The special services inaugurated by the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties, at the Central Hall, have met with a fair amount of success. Some Unitarians living in the neighbourhood have welcomed the movement, while several strangers have been attracted by the message of our Liberal Religious Faith. The present series will be concluded on Sunday next, when the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie will deliver the address. Arrangements have been made to continue the services for three months, the local friends undertaking to bear the expense of hiring the hall. A good deal of enthusiasm has been created, and it is hoped that a living and vigorous church will be established in the district. A social meeting is to be held on Friday, the 9th inst., presided over by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, who has organised the services and exercised general supervision.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—The new liturgy, prepared with great pains and at no little expense, was brought into use last month, and is giving much satisfaction. The book is called "Services for Divine Worship," and contains ten orders of worship suitable for any Sunday, four services for special occasions, and some additional prayers and thanksgivings. It is based on the revision of the "Seven Services for Public Worship," kindly permitted by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and includes many prayers from "Common Prayer for Christian Worship" (the book previously in use), and also the latest revision of Dr. Martineau's Ninth and Tenth Services. Professor Carpenter is giving his series of lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience," at Sheffield, in the Channing Hall, connected with Upper Chapel. The first was delivered on Thursday, 25th ult., when there was an audience of over 150 persons, all of whom seemed appreciative and deeply interested. At the second lecture on 1st inst. a still larger audience assembled; and it is evident that the interest is likely to be sustained throughout the course. Rather more than half the audience consists of ministers and members of our own congregations in the district; the rest are strangers. A few ministers of other denominations have attended. Much interest has been aroused in theological matters in Sheffield in consequence of the Torrey-Alexander Mission, and our churches are benefiting in attendance and membership from the reaction against the extreme doctrines therein advocated.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE National Conference of the members and friends of Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, and other Non-subscribing and Kindred Congregations, is to hold its ninth triennial meeting at Oxford in Easter week, from Tuesday, April 17, till Friday, April 20. It will be seen from the letter of the secretary, the Rev. James Harwood, that invitations, together with the programme and the committee's report, have now been sent out, and that advantageous terms have been granted by the railway companies. All applications for tickets, and for the securing of rooms through the kind help of the local committee, are to be addressed to Mr. Harwood, and for the latter must reach him not later than Thursday, March 15.

THE Conference met for the first time in 1882, at Liverpool, and there again, on the attainment of its majority in 1903. The intervening meetings were at Birmingham, Leeds, London, Manchester, Sheffield, and Leicester. The Oxford programme promises meetings of exceptional interest. On Wednesday morning two papers on social subjects will be read by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed and Mr. Graham Wallas, while in the afternoon a discussion on "The Relation of our Ministers and Congregations to Social and Political Questions of the Day" will be opened with a paper by the Rev. C. Hargrove, Miss Catherine Gittins being the first speaker. Thursday morning is to be devoted to the "Outlook of Liberal Religion," with papers by the Rev. L. P. Jacks on "The Decaying Influence of the Professional Theologian"; the Rev. Dr. Rashdall, on "The Present Relations between Theology and Philosophy"; and the Rev. T. Rhondda Williams, on "The Liberal Movement in the Free Churches."

ON Thursday afternoon the Conference Business Meeting will be held, and on Friday morning the Rev. Dendy Agate is to read a paper on "Advisory Committees and Ministerial Settlements," when the Rev. Joseph Wood will open the discussion and move a resolution declaring the desirability of having one Central Advisory and Settlements Board. At noon the Rev. Henry Gow is to give an address on "The Ideal of a Church."

THE Address of the President, Mr. W. B. Bowring, will be given on Tuesday afternoon, followed by a welcome to foreign delegates by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter; and in the evening a service will be conducted by the Rev. Charles Roper, and the sermon preached by the Rev. Joseph Wood. On Thursday evening also there will be a service, when the Rev. Dr. John Hunter is to be the preacher. The meetings of the Conference will be in the City Buildings. On Wednesday evening there is a conversazione in Manchester College.

THE Dean of Ripon, in a letter in Thursday's Times, urges that the way out of the religious difficulty in Elementary schools (except for Jews and Roman Catholics) is for the clergy, and those who work with them, frankly to accept the simple "reading of the Bible with explanations suitable to children." "The really distinctive doctrine of the Church of England," says Dr. Fremantle, "is that the Church is not a sect, but 'the blessed company of all faithful people,' and that its object is not dogmatic teaching nor ecclesiastical refinements, but a complete life of Christian righteousness, which can only be lived out through the nation and the organs of the national life. The effort to bring in dogmatic teaching would frustrate this, its main purpose. I am convinced that the simple teaching of Scripture though derided as unsubstantial, and even as a 'new religion,' is precisely that which is best suited for the formation of character, especially for children, but also for the mass of men."

ON the other hand, the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, of Nottingham, in an article on "The Education Problem" in Wednesday's Nottingham Daily Express, strongly argues against "Undenominationalism" in the schools, and appeals to Nonconformists to be true to their fundamental principles. "The simple truth is," he says, "that Bible teaching when reduced into a kind of theological G.C.M. of all the sects must, unless it has been watered down into a nullity, constitute a theological test for many teachers. Among the most earnest and able of these are Agnostics, who cannot as an expression of their own devotional life repeat the Lord's Prayer, the Beatitudes, or even the hymn selected by the district communis sensus. Are we going by this test to ruin their career or deprive national education of their service, or offer to them State bribes to dishonesty? I for my part would prefer an honest morality in the schools to a perfunctory or dishonest repetition of prayers and verses. I regard undenominationalism as the least satisfactory of all the suggested solutions. The concurrent endowment of all the sects is a far preferable system, though I disapprove of this also. I think there is no satisfactory solution except a purely secular one. To this it seems to me Nonconformists are by their professions and principles committed."

THE members of the London County Council can rarely have spent a busier or a more useful week than that which was signalised by their recent visit to Paris. We have indeed seen some expressions of regret, as at a lost opportunity. The Parisian hosts and their London guests certainly did not go about their business in that searching fashion which is proper to an itinerant sub-committee. If members of our municipalities desire to gain at first hand, and by personal inspection, such knowledge of Municipal Paris as, e.g., Mr. Albert Shaw summarises in his "Municipal Government in Europe," they will have to work in a different fashion and with ampler time for the study. We can imagine our own councillors returning with rather blurred reminiscences of what they had been seeing. But on one point at least they are left in no obscurity. They have been welcomed and entertained with a right royal, or shall we not say, a right democratic hospitality. We at home have followed the record of their visit, and share with them in almost equal degree the proud pleasure of gratitude to our fellow townsmen of Paris. Knowledge of the methods of French administration is valuable, the assurance of French kindness and goodwill is of even greater worth.

THE importance of the visit does not end with the visit. It is not even confined to the enhanced feeling of neighbourliness to which it gives rise. Sir Edwin Cornwall has already, as we understand, practically secured that at no distant date a conference of the leading cities of Europe shall be held in London. We specially welcome the fact that the earliest announcement of the project appears in the Tageblatt. It was fitting that it should be so named in a German paper, that land of magnificent municipal enterprise. The conference is an event of first-class international importance. Nations are discovering more and more clearly how much the welfare of a people depends on the administration of its towns. A gathering of men who are not concerned with the old considerations of diplomacy and intrigue, who are in closest touch with social needs and ideals, who may be moved by a generous rivalry but cannot be affected by any devastating jealousy, is well calculated surely to strengthen the ties of friendship among the peoples and serve the cause of international peace.

THE current number of the British Journal of Inebriety contains the first of what it is hoped to continue as a regular series of Norman Kerr memorial lectures. As is only appropriate, the lecturer, Dr. T. D. Crothers, dealt, and dealt in a very interesting fashion, with the work of Dr. Kerr himself as a pioneer in the movement for the distinct recognition of alcoholism as a disease which must be diagnosed and treated by the methods of physical science. Of course, Dr. Kerr and other workers in the same field had to contend with much opposition, inasmuch as many people instinctively shrink from any facts or teaching which seems to limit the range of moral freedom or to bring matters of right and wrong into the domain of law or necessity. The brief but instructive sketch which Dr. Crothers gives serves to remind us of the stages through which every discovery has to move. But at the present day few will be found to dissent from the lecturer's conclusions, and this is the case largely because of the persistent and tactful work of Kerr, who so greatly increased the scientific knowledge of inebriety and fashioned it into the current of practical science. "In summing up Dr. Kerr's career, we may say that he was undoubtedly a great man, not in the common meaning of that word, but in the larger sense of one whose life, thought, and work was to analyse and widen the knowledge of the conditions which underlie the drink problem, and point out the means of cure and prevention."

THERE is a further feature in the lecture which will also be of interest to workers in the temperance cause, and, indeed, to all those who are concerned with the social and moral questions involved in the temperance problem. Dr. Crothers not only marks for us the place and importance of Dr. Kerr in the historic development of efforts for the lessening of the drink evil. In addition to this we owe to him a valuable summary of the experiments and mistakes, of the efforts and success achieved by the early homes for inebriates. As we all know, there has been not a little quackery in the matter of "drink cures." What we do not always remember is that many of these early workers even when they blundered, were yet doing valuable work in pointing the way to more adequate methods of treatment. These are some of the points of interest in Dr. Crothers' lecture, which, as a whole admirably illustrate the complexity of the questions with which we have to deal and the many different methods which must be adopted for their solution.

A NEW roomful of Turner's paintings at the Tate Gallery substantially increases the wealth of beauty which rewards our too infrequent visits to that exhibition. It serves also to enlarge our knowledge and deepen our appreciation of the master's work. We do not find here a representative collection. Indeed, it would not be possible to do that in so small a compass. The pictures are rather distinctive of some few moods and types of vision. Those to which we return again and again for a last and still a last lingering look before we plunge into the reality of our Thames-side misty streets are almost all pictures of thesea. The vision is wonderful, the colouring superb. At a first glance the form may appear slightly nebulous. It is difficult, e.g., to say which is unsubstantial cloud, which tossed foam, which moveless rock, in the "Storm off a Rocky Coast," as difficult, perhaps, as in the unrest of the elements themselves were we in yonder hard blown boat. A closer view convinces us of the craftsman who, by the firmness of his strokes, has so often symbolised immensity in a few inches of canvas.

Two pictures there are which stand in a class by themselves, "Shipping off a Headland" (1909), and "The Evening Star" (1911). They are full of beauty, but that is not a quality by which to single them out from many others. They are instinct with the solemn silence of the evening, and particularly in "The Evening Star" there is a wonderful realisation of space. The power of making us feel distance is one of Turner's most ordinary achievements. This picture does something specific and strange. Usually we feel space as something outside of us; it is called properly distance, it is there, away from us. In this vision of darkening sea and shore, in this overarching evening sky, we feel no movement from ourselves outwards. The philosopher talks about tuneless tune and spaceless space. The poet sometimes does more, and suggests the meaning of these contradictions. Viewing again in the mind's eye this painting of "The Evening Star," we know that the spaceless world is in the soul of man. But when we look on the picture itself we simply feel that we are everywhere at home, so profound is its calm, and so unchequered its restful quiet.

THE Jowett Lectures at the Passmore Edwards Settlement, Tavistock-place, are being given this year by Mr. F. C. Burkitt, M.A., Norrissian Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge. At the first lecture on Wednesday week the Dean of Westminster presided. After alluding to the unique importance of the Gospel

History for the study of Christianity, from whatever point of view we may regard it, Professor Burkitt went on to show why critical and literary questions about the Gospels need investigation before the real problems of the Gospel History can be satisfactorily attacked. We need to get for ourselves a true portrait of Christ, but to do this the first thing is to try to understand how and why the portraits of Christ which we find in the Gospels were drawn. The study of all four Canonical Gospels, even the fourth Gospel, is necessary, although the several Gospels differ in historical and philosophical value. The first requisite for this study is a thorough knowledge of the contents of the Gospel. A knowledge of Greek or textual criticism is useful, but not indispensable; "all the main results and many of the processes of learned critical study can be at once made plain to those who will read the English Bible carefully for themselves."

THE Expositor, entering upon its thirty-second year, began with the January number a new and enlarged series, while the editor, Dr. W. Robertson Nicoll, was able to look back upon twenty-one years of completed service in connection with this magazine. Looking back over that period, since, in 1885, he succeeded Dr. Samuel Cox in the editorial chair, Dr. Nicoll sees signs of encouragement in the field of theological scholarship, and notable among them the establishment of the Theological Faculty in connection with the Victoria University of Manchester. "The clergyman," he says, "who does not keep up his studies will find that he loses influence over the best minds—that influence which remains only with those who are always humble, diligent, reverent, and fearless seekers after truth." The February Expositor has some "Notes from the Lecture-Room of Epictetus," by Dr. E. A. Abbott.

It will interest many of our readers to learn that the Rev. Dr. S. M. Crothers, of Cambridge, U.S.A., whose presence at the meetings of the International Council in London in 1901 is remembered with delight by many people in England, will this year deliver the Essex Hall Lecture during the Whit-week meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Dr. Crothers will spend some time in this country, and will be heard in at least two of our churches—the Old Meeting, Birmingham, and Essex Church, London. His congregation at Cambridge have recently sent, as their annual collection to the funds of the American Unitarian Association, the sum of 1,300 dollars (£270).

A FURTHER contribution to the discussion on "The Land and the Unemployed" we hope to publish next week.

THE annual meeting of the Sustentation Fund was held at Dr. Williams's Library, Gordon-square, on Wednesday afternoon. The report we must keep for next week.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS AT THE BENARES THEISTIC CONFERENCE.

By PUNDIT S. N. SASTRI.

BRETHREN,—Let us commence to-day's proceedings by thanking our Heavenly Father for this our gathering. We have assembled here from the remotest parts of the country, from the Punjab, from Central India, from the Southern Presidency, from Bombay, from Bengal and from every part of the United Provinces. You are sufferers by coming here, yet you have come. Reflect what is it that has drawn you together. We say it is a common cause. By common cause we mean community of ideas and opinions. But it is no mere community of ideas and opinions that has drawn us together. It is something deeper and sweeter than that. It is spiritual kinship; it is real brotherhood. By one spirit we have been formed into one family. It is the gathering of the children of the same Father. It is soul meeting with soul, heart meeting with heart, in secret spiritual communion. And He who has brought us together is with us. Let us turn to Him this day for light and strength and guidance. Let us seek His glory in what we shall say and do in this fraternal gathering.

The fact that we are holding a theistic conference at Kashi, a city of ancient renown, and seat and centre of orthodox Hinduism, indicates the great change that has already taken place in modern Hindu thought. This sacred city is still redolent with the precious memory of a Bhaskarananda, a Tailanga Swami, and of many other saints of ancient Hinduism; and bears in its bosom numerous shrines, chhatras and maths, endowed by the piety of generations, and still resorted to by hundreds of devotees. Its splendid buildings, bordering upon the river, still bear mark of ancient Hindu architecture, and fill our minds with wonder at the thought, how this eternal city, after so many ravages of conquest and of ruthless vandalism, still bears witness to the tenacious vitality of Hinduism. The very atmosphere of Benares, to this day, is full of ancient Hindu ideas. Living here we are daily and hourly reminded of the past—a past once great and glorious, but now vanishing like the declining sun-light lingering on a hill-top. I am not sure whether, in Bhaskarananda and Tailanga Swami, we have not seen the last representatives of the true type of ancient Hinduism. Certainly even now we have enough Hindu asceticism, specially of the spurious sort, but that internal force, which did put forth these great personalities, seems to have exhausted itself and to be unable to continue much longer its ancient work. This leads us to the consideration of the disintegrating effects of modern education, and of the present contact with Western civilisation. The effects are visible in many directions, in material and industrial concerns, in political ideas, and in social life. But their influence is nowhere more serious or more far-reaching in its consequences than in the department of moral and spiritual ideals. The ancient spirituality of our race, for which we had justly acquired pre-eminence amongst the nations of the earth, is in danger of suffering irrevocable decline. The old religious ideas are fast losing their hold on the minds of men; and as a consequence the old spirituality that they once fostered is also declining. Thus the channels through which flowed the old piety of the Hindu race are in danger of drying up. Now, brethren, I know there are men who look upon this rapid secularisation of a religious people with indifference; who declare that a race may be thoroughly secularised, yet can be politically great or socially happy; and they point to the cases of Japan and of modern France as a proof of their assertion. I, for one, am persuaded that the greatness of these two countries, like the greatness of any country in the world, is truly and surely laid on the moral character of their masses; on their faith in the inherent strength of a righteous cause—in other words in the moral government of the world. Articulate or inarticulate, that must be the backbone of every national resistance as well as of every national achievement. No nation of unbelievers can achieve anything worthy or great. Every man or woman that strives for the victory of a righteous cause or offers himself or herself for its service, steps into the ground of faith. And wheresoever there is lack of this faith—the faith in the ultimate triumph of righteousness—there is true atheism and there is no moral backbone. There may be a kind of light-hearted, frivolous, and flimsy citizenship, but no manhood. That being my conviction I am appalled at the prospect of this rapid secularisation of our people; and I feel that I, a poor individual with my humble powers, must strive my best to avert such a calamity. Though I believe that man is as instinctively religious as he is social, and that religion checked in one form is sure to take effect in another, yet our responsibility is the greater to strive for what we feel to be the best of those forms. Believe me, brethren, we are in safe hands. An all-wise Providence is taking care of us, and always befriending our humble endeavours.

Let us also remember that there are many others who, along with us, are equally appalled by this rapid disintegration of the old spirituality of the race. They also are striving their best, though in different ways, for the preservation of that spirituality. I may classify them under two heads.

First, there are those who are for keeping up the existing forms of religion as they are—"Throw new spirit in the current forms," say they, "and they will live." Influenced by this hope they try to give new rational interpretations for the current forms of idolatry, which, they think, will rehabilitate those forms in their ancient power and potency. I admire the motive that actuates this class. I admire their devotion to the welfare of the people. But I do not believe in the wisdom of the course they have adopted. They seem to forget that the current forms, whatever they may be, are the fruits of a process of evolution. They have been evolved from certain root ideas of individual and social life, that were once ruling factors of a bygone civilisation. They were once effective because those ideas were behind them; because they were tremendously real to the hearts and consciences of our forefathers. How can you give these forms their old power and potency, their old inspiration, without restoring the integrity and potency of those old ideas and without also restoring the old social order in which they were evolved? In India religion is intimately connected with social life, and you cannot maintain the integrity of the present religious system without securing at the same time the permanence of the present social order, which, however, it is impossible to do. The rational interpretation school, as far as I can see, are inevitably doomed to ultimate failure. Their advocacy of the current forms may temporarily secure for them easy popularity, or beguile them with the fancy that they are wiser than their generation; but their makeshift philosophy, by its very nature, cannot last long. With the disintegration of the root ideas of life and also of the present social order, the current forms will surely, necessarily, and inevitably pass away.

Almost the same thing can be said with regard to the line of action pursued by a second class of thinkers, who are for reviving old forms. "Push back the people," say they, "to the old Vedic times, and try to restore the old spirituality of the race." All honour to these earnest thinkers also for their sincere desire for raising their people. But they too seem to forget that the old forms cannot be rehabilitated in their vigour and efficiency without the root-ideas that brought them forth, and also without the forms of social life under which they were generated and developed. The earnestness of men may temporarily revive some old forms; but without the old living ideas behind them and the old social life to support them, they are sure to become meaningless and unreal in course of time, to be cast away by a future generation of reformers.

What men should aspire to in religion is reality and not a makeshift. And there can be no reality without a correspondence between its outer forms and its inner contents. It is a great truth which should never be forgotten. Religion to be morally and spiritually effective should also be progressive:—not hanging behind civilisation like the heavy tail of a dumba sheep checking and restraining its onward march, but serving like martial music to inspire and strengthen that march. Religion, to the regret of all impartial students of history, has served up to this time as a retarding weight in the tail of civilisation, rather than as a bugle-note leading its van. It is time that religion should be restored to its legitimate function; to be made, under the altered circumstances of modern life, once more tremendously real. I repeat what I have said before, that in order to be made real there should be a correspondence between its external forms and its inward contents. In other words, the process should be not to set up the forms first and then invite the spirit and the ideas to dwell therein, but to hold fast the new spirit and the new ideas first and then let them assume their proper forms. In the region of biology we daily witness that it is not organism that creates life, but it is life that builds up the organism. Under the altered circumstances of modern civilisation, religion to be real and spiritually effective must needs imbibe and assimilate the principles that characterise modern civilisation. Briefly speaking, in order to be able to influence the onward march of the human mind, at the present time, it should be characterised by four leading traits.

First, it should be characterised by liberty; by the unhindered freedom of the human soul in quest of truth, and in the pursuit of righteousness. There should be no voice or authority declaring "thus far and no further" to the human mind in its quest after truth. The only authority with which true religion should be conversant is the habitual preference that love and reverence give to experience. Otherwise the wings of the soul should be left free to soar up to the skies and to dive deep in the eternal abyss, having none but the Eternal for its company.

Secondly, it should be characterised by rationality. It should have no conflict with human reason. To hold that man has been endowed with reason to the detriment of the higher interests of his soul is to cast a slur on Divine Providence. All man's natural gifts and endowments, both physical and moral, are suited to his condition in this world and in the next. They may have their respective spheres and functions, but there can be no incompatibility amongst them. The conflict between Faith and Reason is a creation of priest-governed faith—a fiction of Church dogma. Human reason if left free would revolt as much against maternal affection or against conjugal love as against man's sense of the Infinite and the Eternal. Man's spirituality is no more a mark of his rational imbecility than his sociableness is a mark of his lack of individual independence. It is irrational to question the rationality of faith.

Thirdly, it should be characterised by universality, for if religion be ultimately based on a revelation of the Parama Purusha (the Supreme Being) to the human soul, that revelation cannot be partial and sectional, made only to a single race or country. Like maternal affection or conjugal love it may vary in external expression in different countries, but the original impulse is the same in all countries. Wheresoever man has groped to find the light, and has lifted himself above the seen unto the unseen, there this divine revelation has taken place. The study of the scriptures of the nations has established this great truth. The conviction is daily strengthening in the minds of all sincere religious inquirers that "of a truth God has been no respecter of persons" and that His revelation has been universal. Certainly this universality should be a distinguishing feature of the coming faith of the world.

Fourthly, it should be characterised by spirituality. Whatever that coming faith may be, it should be pre-eminently a religion of conscience and not of mere external formalism or ceremonialism. Of ceremonial religion we have had enough and more than enough in this country. Both Hinduism and Buddhism have furnished examples of it. We need not go to other lands to see how the religion of authority and of priest-craft can degenerate into blind observance of a number of prescribed forms; which might have had some meaning, some spiritually elevating influence, at some by-gone time, but which have long ceased to exert that influence. It is time that religion should be disengaged from all non-spiritual and purely external elements, and installed in its main function, namely, to awaken and strengthen in the human soul a sense of the eternal, and thereby enlighten, inspire, and guide the human conscience. The sphere and province of religion is in the spirit of man. The main function of religious teaching and of the Church is the moral and spiritual uplifting of man. Hence we are persuaded to think that the future religion of the human race, above all other things, should be a religion of conscience. Spirituality should be its leading characteristic.

Now, brethren, the religion of the Theistic Church which has drawn us together at this conference, possesses those four characteristics. In the first place it is based not upon authority, but upon independence. It is consistent with the utmost freedom of the human soul. It does not bind itself to any particular scripture or any particular guru, but freely accepts whatever is true in any scripture or any guru. It is essentially progressive, never fettering itself with infallible or immovable creeds and dogmas. It is not a stagnant pool dammed up by authority ages ago, but a living and running stream bearing life and health for unborn generations.

Secondly, this religion of the Theistic Church is also a religion of rationality. It has no conflict with human reason. The discoveries of modern science, the speculations of modern philosophy, the widespread influences of modern culture, everything tends to increase its volume, and supplies it with accessories for effectively doing its work.

Thirdly, our religion is also universal. We believe in the universality of divine revelation. The Divine Guide of man has not left Himself without witness amongst any race. Of course his revelation is gradual, but evolutionary, ascending in a rising scale from crude forms to more enlightened and spiritually elevating ones, but it is a fact of History that no race has been left without his guidance; without the breathing of his spirit as it were. These divine revelations have been treasured up through the utterances of sages and saints in the scriptures of the nations. Hence the religion of the Theistic Church handles all of them in a reverential spirit, and tries to draw spiritual sustenance from all. It marks the operation of the same spiritual laws, for instance, in Jesus of Nazareth, in Sakya Muni of Kapilavastu, in Mahomed of Arabia, and in other great teachers of humanity. With regard to the kinship with the Divine it does not make distinction between Aryan and non-Aryan, between Jew and Gentile, between Christian and Heathen, and between Moslem and Kaffir. It is universal brotherhood by divine adoption.

Fourthly, the religion of the Theistic Church is pre-eminently spiritual. The Parama Purusha whom it worships is a Spirit, the soul that worships him is also a spirit; the worship that it pays is also a spiritual offering. Its heaven is spiritual, its hell is spiritual, its sin and atonement are also spiritual. In short, the religion of the Theistic Church is essentially a religion of conscience. Its God is not enthroned in yonder skies or in a place called heaven, but is living in the soul, as a silent witness of its conscience, ruling and guiding its inward life. Says Manu:—

"Thinkest thou, O man, that thou art alone in this life, but know and reflect that there is one always present in the soul, as a silent spectator of all thy good and evil." Here Manu gives utterance to the same truth. According to the religion of the Theistic Church the main sphere of religious culture is in the region of conscience—its chief aim is the attainment of purity and peace, of righteousness and moral integrity, of high purpose and unselfish endeavour, and of the enlightenment of the mind and ennobling of the heart.

THE CROWN OF SCIENCE.*

WITH advancing knowledge the sense of mystery grows greater. The more we drive wild ignorance away from us and hew down the giant superstitions of the past, the more openly do we view the widening circle of strange and mysterious things that, like a primeval forest, surround man's little clearing of tamed forces and cultivated arts. No longer this tree or that stone, but every tree and every stone, have now become a mystery to us, and a sense of the infinite mystery of all things is interwoven with the very texture of our daily life and thought. The whole universe is a mystery. The infinitely little and the infinitely great whirl round together in a perfect maze of symmetry and order. Amid heavenly bodies whose vast movements and infinite distances baffle all comprehension of their number and magnitude, not a sparrow falls to the ground unknown to God, the very hairs of our head are all numbered, and each tiny atom is moving with its true motion and perfect order in a minute system of its own. We stand bewildered. Not chaos but order surrounds us on every side; not blind force, but a regulative government embraces all under one rule.

As the accuracy of all God's work in the material world seems utterly independent of size, so in His hands we may see the moral world also poised like a delicate balance that trembles responsive to every thought of every soul, which in the one scale or the other now weights the world with good, now subverts it unto ill, and by its own motion rises or falls in moral worth and value.

As our earth is not physically independent, but owes its position in space, its light, and heat, and habitability to the influence of other worlds upon it; so it is natural to suppose that man's moral and spiritual being, his intellectual capacity, his moral aspirations, and his religious affections are not and never can have been independent of the moral and spiritual order in which he lives. We are not isolated villagers, dwelling apart from all the universe in the solitude of utterly separated souls, but we are bound in the bonds of purposes vaster than our own, wrapped round by the affections of God, judged by His judgments, swept along by His strength, and carried forward by His will to the fulfilment of one universal purpose, whose secret is with Him.

* The Crown of Science, or the Incarnation of God in Mankind. By A. Morris Stewart. (Published by Andrew Melrose, 16, Pilgrim-street, London, 1904. 6s.)

Life is organic, and with this new conception of universal being and faced with so great mysteries, we turn once again to the study of man, whose mind thus images all things as one ordered whole, and whose spirit has ever been a seeker after God if haply he might find Him.

We study man, and especially man's religious life, with a new interest derived from science. For religion is now seen to come in the direct line of human progress, ordering man's spirit as well as his body into unison with the great whole.

With freshened insight we now see in the spiritual inspiration of men no less than in the mechanical movements of atoms, the immediate power of God working in the inner recesses of man's being.

And when from the complexity of man within himself we advance to the complexity of his relations with other men, we rise into that realm of the moral life where the slightest fault of balance, dislocation, or defect in the performance of function may produce such vast evil in the social organism as a whole. Here religion comes in and seizes on the mind, as it were, from without and from above. The duty of rendering worship and service to God puts every member of the social organism into his due place in relation to every other, and orders all into accord with one supreme will. The worship of God thus establishes, as it were, nerve connection between the individuals and the centre, and the spirit of man now consciously returns to God who gave it, for its authority and inspiration in every act of life.

The laws of worship are the very motion of God in the heart of mankind, raising humanity above that self-centredness which must perish and die, and inciting to an evolution which, through ceaseless self-sacrifice, enters into the deathless spirit of eternal love. To neglect these laws of worship and forget God means disintegration of the social organism, degeneration, and spiritual death. Sins against this unity of all spiritual life are visited not upon the individual sinner alone, but upon the whole social organism whose lax sense of unity has suffered him to go his own way, and failed to win his whole-hearted adhesion to the common cause. The laws of heredity and of environment as stated by science, and the visitation of the sins of the fathers upon the children as foreshadowed in the Hebrew Scriptures, agree together. Our modern study of the material world reasserts the laws of God already told us by the spiritual seers. Matter and spirit are not disconnected, and that there is a link between spiritual perversion and moral depravity is clearly to be seen in physical degeneracy. Life is organic. Religion and science are one. We cannot feed the one side of our nature without, by the same process, feeding the other also, nor starve one without starving the other.

If we feed our scientific thought with the great and enriching conception of one universal physical order, we must feed our religious life with the same enriching thought of one universal moral and spiritual order. As man's material body demands that the whole universe be in some way materialised to match it, so man's spirit requires that not a part only but the whole of being be interpreted as a spiritual relationship. The same logic which gives us a universe of matter as the cause of our bodily relations, gives us God no less as the omnipresent correlative of the soul. And as body and soul act in unison in man, so must we view the material universe as being material to the purposes of God. In His mind all things must matter, and the finest spiritual judgment and the minutest movement of an atom are correlative parts of one organic whole.

After five chapters dealing with the reconciliation of modern scientific thought and ancient religious belief, along lines of most suggestive and fruitful thought, whose main outcome we have thus briefly sketched, our author turns to the more specific defence of the orthodox Trinitarian faith. Into this region we do not propose to follow him. The supreme importance that he attaches to certain sayings and events supposed to have taken place in Palestine a few hundred years ago, and which seem to him to make Jesus of Nazareth become the pivot round which the moral order of the universe revolves, appears to us to be strangely incongruous with the larger thought of these introductory chapters. Where the anchor of faith is held by a chain of many links, why fix on one link only as the all-important one? Without Isaiah should we ever have had Jesus? Could we strike out Moses and the prophets and yet retain this Christ? Why should any man, whether Abraham, Moses, Isaiah, or Jesus, be selected as the central figure of that all-enfolding spiritual life whose great Author and Shepherd and Guide should rather be God Himself? Is not God sufficiently real to us even yet? After the vision of His presence with each of us and of His fatherly care for all, do we need now to assign to the supposed sinlessness of some Isaiah or to the historic baptism of a repentant Jesus, or to any other human being or event, the one place of supremacy in the eternal spiritual life? Were there no God we might be excused for filling the vacant throne with some man or another from the list of them that have been born of a woman. But if Heaven had its ruler before the race of Adam was born, ere the sun was formed, and before the morning stars yet sang together, there is a great chance that even the mightiest of the sons of earth, and whether sinless or not in the eyes of groping men, may be quite wrongly regarded as the Only Begotten of the Father from all eternity. The gulf between Jesus and Isaiah or Moses may be great, but until we have seen all the saviours whom God has sent to all the worlds, and all the sinless ones that bow their heads in heaven, we may well hesitate to build all our hopes of redemption upon the solitary chance of finding Jesus seated upon the throne of God!

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE interesting autobiographical record of "An Agnostic's Progress" is completed by Mr. W. Scott Palmer in this month's Contemporary. The idea of "Evolution" proved the master-key by which he was led back to a living faith: Psychical Research, Catholic ritual and "Lux Mundi" helped him on his way. Here is a glimpse of one step:—

"I find in my old note book these words taken from Pfeiderer, expressive of my state of mind at what I may call the beginning of my end: 'From the moment . . . when the first presentiment of the God-consciousness, the solution of the riddle of the world, shimmered like the earliest ray of morning light across the dawn of an earthly soul, from that moment man was there—i.e., the thinker, anthropos was there—i.e., he who looks upwards.' My sun had risen and I became 'he' who looks upwards.' First outwards, then inwards, and at last upwards is the way of man, and it was mine."

And finally he came to the full possession in heart and mind of the "One Mediator between God and Man, the God-Man by whom God was fully expressed under human conditions, and perfect Man was displayed before men. Here was the core, the expanding sphere, of concrete truth, whereby the Christian Church might find the manner of including all truth and destroying, slowly it might be, but surely, every lie." And he adds: "This wonderful concreteness in Christianity is the fulfilment of Paganism, of Polytheism. There is no abstract love, there is only God, the concrete Lover in every heart; there is no transacted redemption, there is only a Redeemer, God and Man, growing in His redeemed, as Christ in them—the concrete hope of glory. There is no good, there are only Beings growing to be one in God and with God, who is the concrete Holy One; there is no evil, there are only Beings lonely and corrupt apart from Him." Here one finds that the Agnostic has gained a large and profound measure of spiritual truth, but truth which, we are convinced, will be still more perfectly interpreted, and adapted for universal application, when he realises that the "God-Man" is not the truth as it was and is in Jesus.

Of the other articles in this number, apart from those of immediate political interest, we would call special attention to that by Dr. Rankin on "Nervous Breakdown."

In the Nineteenth Century and After we note the article on "Church and State in Russia," by Mr. J. Ellis Barker, and Admiral Sir Cyprian Bridge's on "A Great Moral Upheaval in America," which incidentally notes the protest by President Eliot, of Harvard, against the brutal form of football played in that country.

Mr. G. Lowes Dickinson we are always glad to meet, and in the Independent Review there is an article of his, "Quo Vadis?" which ought to be read by all thoughtful people of practical sense in this country. From the vantage ground of Shelley and the high mountains he takes a survey of our national life, and says some very searching things. What is wrong and how we should set about righting it, according to his judgment, our readers may see in the pages of the review. Here we quote only one passage as an impulse towards further reading :—

"It is certain that any reform that will really effect anything will be attacked as unjust, because it interferes with 'legitimate expectations'; certain, too, that those who attack it will ignore the incomparably greater injustice in which they and all of us are plunged under existing conditions. That is one profound reason why we do not alter institutions; and it involves both an intellectual and a moral error. The intellectual error may be cured by study. But it will not be cured, unless and until the moral error is cured; and that can be cured only by religion and poetry. That is why Shelley really matters; that is why the Gospels matter. And poetry and religion, so far from being an amusement only fit for boys, should be the most serious pursuit of grown men."

Mr. W. T. Stead's article on "The Revolution of the Twentieth Century," of which the upheaval in Russia is, in his view, only the beginning, prophesies a great deal, but not without making allowance for other possible eventualities. What chiefly impresses him is the immense power discovered in the method of passive resistance and suffering to gain the ends of the weak in face of ruthless force. Mr. R. C. K. Ensor's article on "Workmen's Homes in London and Manchester" should also be noted.

In the Fortnightly Tolstoy's elaborate essay on "The End of the Age" is concluded. "The Russian people," he says, "when abolishing government, need not invent any new forms of combined life with which to replace the former. Such forms of combined life exist amongst the Russian people, have always been natural to them, and have satisfied their social demand. These forms are a communal organisation with the equality of all the members of the Mir, a co-operative system in industrial undertakings and a common possession of the land. The revolution which is impending over Christendom and is now beginning amongst the Russian people is distinguished from former revolutions precisely by this, that the latter destroyed without substituting anything for that which was destroyed by them, or else replaced one form of violence by another; whereas in the impending revolution nothing need be destroyed; it is only necessary to cease participating in violence—not to extirpate the plant, putting in its place something artificial and lifeless, but merely to remove all which has hindered its growth." They who are to participate in this great revolution are "those who, without overthrowing anything, without breaking anything, will organise their life independently of the Government, will peacefully endure any violence inflicted upon them, but will not participate in the Government, and will not obey it."

That such a dream of relapse into a condition of primitive peace should be dreamed for the hundred million of the peasantry in Russia, one can understand, but not how it could compass the reorganisation of the nations of the earth, with their vast operations of industry and commerce. Nor does Tolstoy convince us that the kingdom would really come through his method of passive disobedience to all authority of government—which surely should be simply the expression of the inward law of righteousness in all the intercourse of men.

This essay of Tolstoy's is now also published in book form, together with his letter to the Times of March 11, 1905, on "The Crisis in Russia." (W. Heinemann, 2s.)

The World's Work has some amusing pictures of the General Election, the second part of an illustrated article on "London to Liverpool by Canal," and an article on "Art in an English Village" (art iron-work in a Norfolk village), with some charming pictures.

THE UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

WE reported last week the proceedings of the Annual Meeting, and give here the opening passages of the Report of the Committee :—

It is with sincere gratitude that the Committee begin their Report to the Subscribers by recording the outstanding event of the year, the establishment of the College in its Residential Hall, at Summer-ville, in Victoria Park, on Thursday, October 12, 1905. The new residence was formally opened by Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, M.P. The Committee are enabled to report, from a careful record of the events at the time, that the occasion aroused widespread interest in the Churches, as was indicated by the crowded attendance at the opening ceremony. The catholicity of religious fellowship in Manchester, and the intimate relations of the College with the academic life of the city, were also shown in the presence of ministers of various religious denominations, and the presence and speech of distinguished representatives of the University and local Colleges and Halls. The enthusiasm of the audience was equal to its numbers, and the speeches reached a high level of thought and eloquence. Your President, the Rev. C. C. Coe, in an address of much dignity and charm, deepened the debt of gratitude which the College owes to him. The occasion was marked by strikingly sympathetic speeches given by the Vice-Chancellor of the University of Manchester and by the Dean of the Faculty of Theology. No less sympathetic and encouraging were the eloquent words of Professor J. Estlin Carpenter, of Oxford; and the Principal of the College, in impressive words, lifted the audience to a sense of personal consecration to the cause for which the College stands. The proceedings, in fact, throughout were eminently worthy of the occasion, and of the high hopes and ideal of the College, which is now equipped as its best friends would desire, and enters on its second half-century with every prospect of a useful and honourable career.

The domestic arrangements for the over-seeing of the hall and the comfort of the students have been carried out on the lines indicated in the Jubilee Fund appeal. The Committee are deeply indebted to Principal Gordon for his kind acquiescence in their desire that he should take up his residence in the Hall, and they are glad to say that while Principal Gordon is the resident head of the Hall, they have been fortunate in securing the valuable services as Matron of Miss Panton Ham, daughter of a former distinguished minister, the Rev. J. Panton Ham. The other members of the staff consist of gardener, cook, and three maids. In addition to the rooms reserved for the Principal, Matron, and staff, there are rooms for fifteen residents, as well as rooms reserved for collegiate, domestic, and recreative purposes. The students entered into residence on October 4, 1905, and practically the whole of the accommodation was at once taken up. In addition to the eleven students of the College, two of its past students and a member of the Brahmo Somaj of Bombay, studying at the Victoria University of Manchester, were entered as residents, so that the Hall fulfils from the outset its contemplated double function of a home for the College and a Hall of residence for University students. The Committee are glad to record the emphatic words of the Principal that all the arrangements of the Hall have worked smoothly since the opening, that all the residents have shown a real regard for each other's comfort, and that already the common life of the Hall has had a beneficial effect on the men in residence.

The Committee have pleasure in reporting the steady growth of the Jubilee Memorial Fund during the past year. The Fund has been kept well before the Churches both by means of deputations and correspondence, the Principal of the College, in particular, having been unwearied in his efforts to visit all the Congregations applying for his services. The amount of the Fund, as stated in the body of the last Annual Report, was £12,600, contributed by some 800 donors. During the year the Fund has been increased by £3,500, and over one thousand names have been added to the list of donors. The Fund has now reached the sum of £16,250, while the donation list contains over eighteen hundred names. In addition to the above gifts in money, the Committee have gratefully to acknowledge several valuable contributions towards the furnishing of Summerville, amongst which they would specially name a generous gift of books and pictures by Mr. J. Livesley, of Moss Side, Manchester; framed portraits from Mr. A. W. Worthington, of Stourbridge; some valuable pictures by "A Friend," per the Principal; and the gift of an excellent piano for the drawing-room by "Friends," per the Matron. While assuring all who have contributed so generously in these various ways of their deep sense of their kindness and sympathy, and while heartily thanking the ministers and officials of the Congregations which have invited deputations to state the purpose of the Fund, and the very many local treasurers who have, with so much sacrifice of time and comfort, co-operated with its officials, the Committee would venture to emphasise the urgent need for its speedy completion. The sum of £20,000 originally asked for was designed to provide an endowment to meet the extra charges involved in the upkeep of a Residential College as well as to pay for the purchase and equipment of the collegiate buildings. Experience has shown that the whole of this amount will be required, and the students are now in residence and the expenses of maintenance running on. The Committee therefore appeal to all friends of the College to contribute as they are able and as speedily as possible towards the completion of the Fund. Where so much has been done, and the sympathy and generosity of the Congregations so warmly displayed, the Committee believe and trust that their appeal for the remainder of the Fund will meet with an effective response, and that a movement started and sustained with so much enthusiasm may be consummated in a success that will make the College the still more efficient servant of the Churches.

THE volume of "Poems of the Inner Life," edited by Robert Crompton Jones, has long been treasured among the best of such collections, gathered from the higher realms of English poetry. At the time of its publication, forty years ago (we have a copy of the third edition, dated 1877), marked by the fine taste and devout spirit of the editor, it brought many little known and very beautiful poems within reach of a wide circle of readers, and we are glad that the opportunity of a change of publishers has been taken to issue the book at half its former price. It is a pity, however, that in addition to the new title-page, if the old sheets were still to be used, the index of authors was not also brought up to date. It looks strange in a thirteenth edition, dated 1905, in an index where dates of birth and death of authors are given, to find no dates of the death of the Tennysons and Browning, Emerson and Newman, Matthew Arnold, Christina Rossetti, and a good many others. We must hope that there will soon be a call for a veritable new edition. Then the verses "Thy way is in the deep, O Lord," need no longer be marked "Anonymous," and the name of James Martineau may be added in the index, and the name of the author of the lines from "Songs of Two Worlds" may be also given. The book, as the editor said in his original preface, "is a collection, not of sacred poetry, in the usual, technical sense of the term, but of poems which, without being ecclesiastical or theological, may be called religious, in so far as they have power to strengthen religious faith, or to deepen religious impressions, and to express or suggest the spiritual significance of Nature and of Human Life. They have been selected according to a sense of what most nearly touches the heart and mind of our best and most earnest hours; and they reflect many moods of the soul, from that of questioning, and longing, and vague pathetic sadness, to the clear assurance of faith, and the peace and joy of communion with God." We shall hope that the book will now find many fresh readers. (Methuen & Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

BETTER to have the poet's heart than brain, Feeling than song; but better far than both, To be a song, a music of God's making.

OBITUARY.

MR. WALTER GREG.

A SERVICE, conducted by the Revs. E. L. H. Thomas and P. M. Higginson, was held at Noreliffe Chapel, Styal, on February 9, in memory of Mr. Walter Greg, who died recently at Assouan, Egypt.

Walter Greg was the younger of the two sons of Samuel Greg, of Bollington, the subject of the "Layman's Legacy." Although he took but little part in public affairs he was well known and highly respected as a solicitor in the firm of Messrs. Cunliffe, Greg & Co., in Manchester, and all who knew him felt the influence of his high standard and nobility of character. He had been ordered to Egypt for the benefit of his health, and most of his family were there with him when the sad end came. He married a niece of Mary Carpenter, and cousin of the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter. Much could be said about the beauty of his family relations, but these things are not to be described in words.

IN MEMORIAM.

December 14, 1861. January 22, 1901.

We hold her in our hearts to-day
As in our hearts in days now past,
She reigneth there, while love shall last—
Victoria—Queen, for aye.

And by her side, as long ago,
Is he, who poured his soul's best gift
For her, if haply he might lift
And ease her burden so,—

That sweet, brave spirit, steadfast, sure,
Who blessed her life with love serene,
Who gave to country, wife, and queen
A service high and pure,—

Her conscience and her guide to be;
Yet count himself as naught, for her—
Her lord—and yet her serviteur,
In truest chivalry.

For this he toiled, for this he strove,
And stricken sore, still laboured on,
To win for her earth's noblest crown—
Peace—and her people's love.

"Her people's love!"—that this might be
Her comfort—thus the poet prayed,
"Till God shall set thee at his side Again"—and sorrow flee.

And through long years of sorrow's night,
Alone, she wrestled, prayed, and wept;
For ever in her heart she kept
His passion for the right.

She shunned no toil, she spared no pains,
Her life was to her duty given,
For this high memory, sealed in Heaven,
In grateful hearts she reigns.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

To obey the inward law of right, and so do our duty, whatever it may cost in difficulty or suffering, gives us a hold upon a strength which is not our own. We are strong and glad in doing our duty, because God is with us. It is His will we are doing, and we feel that great strength of His eternal righteousness, flowing through our lives and making us strong. By being true to that inward law of right we most surely know that God is with us in our daily life, and we are happy because we can trust in Him. His law is in outward things, in the wonderful order and beauty of the world, and it is in the inward things of our personal life and character. Through obedience we take our rightful place in His world, and grow up in strength and wisdom as children of our Father in heaven.

But most of us know that our life is not one of steady growth. We know it ought to be, and we know that our true happiness is found in obedience and trust in our Father's unchanging love. But we forget, we make mistakes, we do wilful wrong. Our temper is not under proper control; some blind passion, or strong desire for what we have no right to, gets possession of us, or little by little we let ourselves fall into a determined selfishness, or give way to foolish vanity or evil jealousy, or in some other way are driven out of the straight path of duty, or choose for ourselves what is wrong and unworthy.

Then, when we see what we have done and what we are making of ourselves, how mean, or cruel, or dishonourable we have been, it makes us miserable and ashamed. Our whole life is in confusion. Nothing can go right until we have got back into the true way, and have set ourselves again to a humble and steadfast obedience.

God is still with us, even in our disobedience, but we can no longer feel the gladness and strength of His presence. "His face is turned away," people have sometimes said, "from those who do evil." His will is always against the evil. But remembering that He is our Father, we may say, with a somewhat different thought, "He is looking at us, but now it is with a very searching and sorrowful look of reproof." We are being false to Him, we are wounding His love, who gives us all we have. The misery and shame come to us, because we are not doing His will; we are out of harmony with His inward law of right.

Just as we suffer pain through disobedience to His outward law in our bodily life, so with that deeper law of the inward life and character. Unless all sense of right feeling is deadened in us, we are miserable and ashamed. We cannot be at peace, or have the joyous strength and quiet trustfulness of a true life until we come back to our obedience. With sorrow and penitence we must ask our Father to forgive us, and then His love receives us back into our own place—not indeed as we were before, but in a humbler place, with the lesson of our fall and His forgiveness in our hearts; and with a new earnestness we begin once more to do His will.

Now read Luke xv. 11-24, and think how the teaching of the parable bears on the subject. I hope to say more about it next week.

A UNITARIAN CONVERT.

THE other day, at Preston, as the audience was assembling for Professor ESTLIN CARPENTER'S second lecture on "The Gospels and How to Read Them," a leaflet was distributed to them as they went in, headed "Experience of a Unitarian," and containing an extract from the Preston Guardian of February 3, under which was printed in large type, "Are you right with God?" The extract was a reprint from the Christian World of February 1, telling how a son of Dr. EDWARD EVERETT HALE, the eminent Unitarian, of Boston, had become "an Evangelical," through attending some of the evangelistic mission services of Dr. W. J. DAWSON. This piece of news we had read, naturally, with great interest, and hoped for fuller information on the subject. So far, however, all that has reached us is the original narrative from which the English report is taken, and a letter in comment thereon by the Rev. CHARLES W. WENDTE, of Boston, secretary of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers. Professor HALE, it will be seen, made his public confession at a watch-night service in a Methodist church, and this was published in the Boston Transcript of January 11. Mr. WENDTE'S letter appeared in the Transcript of January 13. Both of these, we feel sure, many of our readers will be glad to see, and they are therefore here reprinted in full.

The surprise expressed in Mr. WENDTE'S letter will be shared by many friends in this country also, who know something of the life and spirit of Dr. EDWARD EVERETT HALE, for it would be difficult to find in America a man more devoted to the unselfish service of his fellow-men in the spirit and love of CHRIST. And to us, we confess, it is matter for astonishment that the son of such a man should still regard Unitarians as "a sect which lays more stress on reason and intellect than on the heart."

Professor HALE, however, appears now, for the first time, to have come upon that vital religious experience "when we feel that there is something lacking in our life," and the void has been filled for him by a larger measure of love for others and the giving up of himself to CHRIST. One must rejoice that he has been led to that deeper life of surrender and discipleship, and, without further comment on this "conversion," which we prefer to leave to make its own impression, we will only add that out of the same sense of need and honest penitence others find their deliverance and their peace, and a new dedication to the service of unselfish love, through the prayer which CHRIST has taught them and they have prayed in his spirit, "Father, Thy will be done."

FROM THE "BOSTON TRANSCRIPT" OF JANUARY 11.

No small stir in the religious world has been made by the recent conversion of EDWARD EVERETT HALE, jun., third son of Boston's eminent Unitarian patriarch, from Unitarianism to evangelical Christianity. EDWARD EVERETT HALE, jun., is Professor of English Literature in Union College, Schenectady, N.Y., and he will soon join the First Presbyterian Church of that city, of which his wife is a member.

Professor HALE'S conversion was accomplished during a series of revival meetings held at the State-street Methodist Episcopal Church, Schenectady, by Dr. DAWSON, the travelling evangelist, who is in this country from England; and naturally it made a deep impression on the college in which he teaches and in the community in which he lives. Though he will join a Presbyterian church, his own story of his conversion was told in an address made by him at the "watch-night" meeting held in the State-street Methodist Episcopal Church to usher in the present new year, and reported in the current issue of Zion's Herald. Said Professor HALE:

"All denominations lay more or less stress on one phase or another of religious experience, some lay more stress on faith, some on creed, some on good works, while others, I believe, like this church, lay more stress on definite religious experience, because experience is a work on which faith is founded. The call of CHRIST I conceive to be that time in a man's life when an impulse comes to surrender everything for CHRIST. We all come to a place in our lives when we feel that there is something lacking in our life, and CHRIST speaks to us in that still, small voice, and if we accept him he brings us into the new life. That is what is meant by hearing the call and giving ourselves to CHRIST."

"Personally, I had no expectation that the call of CHRIST would come to me. I think most of you here who know me personally will agree with me that I was not the man you would have expected to confess CHRIST here in this meeting-house. If you will pardon these personal references, I will give a few reasons why. I am of New England birth, and a New Englander is not apt to be carried away by anything emotional. I am a man of books, of an intellectual life, associated constantly with students, and such men do not take such steps under enthusiasm. Most of you are aware of the fact that I was a Unitarian, and that they are known as a sect which lays more stress on reason and intellect than on the heart. Who would have thought that I would have been led to accept CHRIST in a revival meeting in a Methodist church? No disrespect to this church.

"By my personal experience I can say that the way to the Cross is through prayer. The first sermon preached here by Dr. DAWSON was one on prayer, and it was almost by accident that I happened to go. I only thought of hearing an excellent preacher. I did not find much I had not thought of before; but I said, what he says is sensible, and I will try it; and as I walked down from the church that day I prayed that God would give me the best He had for me. Monday came, and I gave myself to the ordinary duties of the week. I did not go to hear Dr. DAWSON at once again. It was not until Thursday night that I came to this meeting-house; but during that time I continued this express prayer, and I must admit with a little more interest than usual I went to hear Dr. DAWSON again on Friday, Sunday and Monday, and during this time I became conscious of a curious change which was going on in myself, which I did not, and cannot now, explain. Many things which had been much to me—indeed, all—had ceased to interest me. Interest in life began to have a curious dulness in regard to some things. I do not mean in the carrying on of my regular college duties, but in art, literature, nature, &c. I began to have a greater love for others, for humanity, for people in general.

"On Thursday night he preached on 'The Delusions of this Life,' on Friday night he preached on 'The Visit of NICODEMUS to JESUS by Night,' on Sunday night he preached on the text of the burning bush and how it was not consumed by the fire, on Monday night he preached on the Greeks, who came, saying: 'We would see JESUS,' and he said that they found not a poet, not a philosopher, not a leader of the people, but one whose life had been a constant sacrifice for the salvation of the world. Then it was on invitation of my friend, Dr. ADAMS—whom I shall never forget in that respect—I made the decision to follow CHRIST. I said: 'I am a sinner. I am resolved to surrender and take up the spiritual ministry of CHRIST.' The call of the Cross is not merely a call to forgiveness, but a call to love and work for CHRIST. He has said: 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.'

"I think there is still something for those who come at the eleventh hour. If we have the spirit and love of CHRIST we will serve him in every word and act of our lives. Up to the very last of his ministry CHRIST laboured with his disciples. At the last supper he asked Peter three times in succession: 'Simon Peter, lovest thou me more than all these?' and CHRIST'S answer each time was simply, 'Feed my sheep.'"

MR. WENDTE'S LETTER.

To the Editor of the "Transcript."

In common with many of your readers, I have been deeply interested in the recent religious experience of Mr. EDWARD EVERETT HALE, jun., so graphically related in your columns. Of the sincerity and genuineness of his "conversion" to CHRIST, and his determination to devote himself henceforth to the cause of his Master on earth, no one can read, it seems to me, without sympathy and approval.

What does surprise those of us who have had the privilege of listening to Dr. HALE's preaching and enjoying his companionship is that the arguments and appeals of a revivalist should have been needed to awaken in his son the consciousness of the duty and beauty of following Christ's teaching and example. For this has been for half a century and more the burden of the discourse and personal testimony of the venerable author of "In His Name." How many of us has he not inspired with ardent desire to know and love the great leader and sanctifier of men, and who in this community has given a more impressive example of Christian character and service to humanity?

If, nevertheless, one so near and dear to him has required the interposition of another in order to come to a full realisation of the truth as it is in Jesus, this can only be due to what is a common experience in family life—that a parent, however devout and earnest in the religious concerns of his children, will often have less influence than a third party, a comparative stranger, perhaps, to their characters and lives. The personal magnetism of Mr. DAWSON, his direct, heart-searching appeal, meeting a critical need in the spiritual experience of his young listener, wrought a work of grace. Almost instantaneously he accomplished results which in other natures differently constituted, would be the gradual, normal outcome of intellectual and moral processes.

If this shall be confirmed in Mr. HALE's case by an earnest, Christlike life, no one, we may be sure, will be more glad and thankful than his venerated father, who may behold in his son's self-dedication to the ministry of the Prince of Peace the consummation of his appeals, his teachings, and his personal example.

CHARLES W. WENDTE.

A CONGREGATIONAL HERETIC.

THE Rev. William Rosling, who, after studying at Glasgow University, had his first settlement as a Congregational minister in 1886 at Coatbridge in Lanarkshire, and was subsequently at Belfast and Oban, has just resigned the charge of the Ryan-street Congregational Church, West Bowling, Bradford, after a ministry of three and half years. On Sunday evening, Jan. 28, he preached his farewell sermon, in which he gave a statement of his position, which is that of a fearless heretic, who has suffered much for his frank avowal of the truth as it has possessed his soul.

"I was resolved," he said, "here as elsewhere, to speak out my convictions on all great questions of faith and life, whether I was supported or not by the approval of my hearers. You all knew my views were not orthodox before I came, but I have never laid emphasis on these differences. I have pained some of you by the things I have preached; but I think it has often pained me more to state them than it has you to hear them; and had I consulted my own love of the goodwill of my hearers, rather than my conviction that God demanded of me to speak the truth He had put into my heart, I should have held back much that I have spoken. Whatever imperfections have mingled with my ministry—and no one is so conscious of imperfections as myself—it has always been honest."

He then went on to state his convictions as to the Bible, God, Religion, the Church and the Future. Of the Old Testament he spoke as "a unique historic record of the religious evolution of a race possessing a special religious genius." Having noted how Abraham broke away from the cruel practice of human sacrifice, the preacher continued:—

"For weary ages his descendants conceived of access to God being possible only through their bloody offerings. Prophets—men far in advance of their time—proclaimed against this hard conception of God. In the fulness of time Jesus came with His great doctrine of the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man. He taught that all men were objects of God's love, and the only bar to fellowship with Him is a selfish heart. Let this be surrendered, and God will become real to every man, and they will know His will and find grace to do it. Paul mingles much of the old superstitions—the demands of Deity for sacrifice—with the new truth, and interprets Christ's revelation of the Father through the sacrificial system of his nation, and sees a sacrificial meaning, that fulfils God's will, in the tragedy of Calvary. This is natural from Paul's whole training.

"But what place am I to give this great and unique Book? It is no fetish. There is no virtue in the reading and study of the Bible; although in such study there is much profit. The Book is not meant to take the place of God; it is a steady star in the sky to guide us to God, and into the Christ spirit and life. It tells me how the light of heaven came to men of old in order that I too may become illuminated; it tells me how Jesus walked in the unclouded light of the Father's face, that I may become a son of light and walk in the spirit, and not fulfil the lusts of the flesh. It is my schoolmaster to bring me to God, and unless it does that is of no good to me. It can do me no good to read Isaiah's vision of God unless it guides me to where I may receive the vision and hear the voice."

Of God he spoke as the "Over-soul," and the "All-soul," and as infinite Love, adding a scathing indictment of the doctrine of substitutionary atonement. In religion, he said, character is the great thing, perfected through union with God. Religion, which is the very crown of manhood, is simply "the inflow of infinite love and grace and power to the soul."

As to the Church and the Future, his statement was as follows:—

"The Church is the most powerful institution on earth, and the most essential. It is the society of a people who are living in daily consecration to the Divine Will, a people charged with divine power and love, who meet to worship God, and to arm themselves for the great task of winning the world to righteousness and love. It is the resurrection body of Christ on earth—His only resurrection body; the organ and medium of God's Spirit in the world. I have laid great emphasis on the Church, and have striven after this great ideal.

"I have taught that this life is only the prelude to the deathless future to which we are all advancing; that it is God's great purpose to develop in us all the spirit of essential goodness, to lead all to a state of perfect love; that heaven and hell are states of being. Heaven is the natural state of a pure, unselfish heart, as hell is of the impure and selfish. This reward is the natural outcome of truth and purity, and no punishment of God is ever vindictive, or ever can be. I have taught that the things we suffer are educational agencies in goodness; that what we call hell fire is a method of God for the purification of the Universe, and is a necessary factor of human redemption. It may take long ages to work out the redemption of many of us—to expunge the stains of self-love from our natures; but eventually, at some far-off time, persistent love will win the day, and the last lost soul will come home to the Father of us all. These are the truths I have taught, and on which I have staked my all. In whatever light they may appear to you, they represent for me the glorious Gospel of the blessed God."

From the local paper to which we are indebted for the above report we learn that the secretary and treasurer of the church, the organist and four deacons, several members of the choir and of the Sunday-school have all resigned as a protest against the way in which Mr. Rosling has been treated by an orthodox section of the congregation.

The Greenfield Congregational Church, Manningham, Bradford, of which the Rev. T. Rhondda Williams is the minister, has adopted the following resolution:—

"That we, the members of Greenfield Congregational Church, in meeting assembled, desire to express our deepest sympathy with the Rev. W. Rosling, the pastor of Ryan-street Congregational Church, and his family in the trying circumstances in which they are placed through the determined opposition of two or three members of the church, whose methods of opposition have wrought great injury to Mr. Rosling's health, and compelled him to resign his charge. We consider it a lamentable thing that a man of such eminently Christian character and gentle spirit, so thorough and conscientious a student, so faithful a preacher of truth, should be ousted from the work he loved, and compelled to face the world, with a wife and five children, without provision, on the charge that his preaching is not orthodox. That this should take place in an age when all denominations are seeking release from the bondage of trust deeds, and when theological restatements are called for on every hand, is, in our judgment, most detrimental to the cause of religious progress, and tends to put a premium upon compromise and dishonesty in the pulpit. We are obliged, therefore, to enter our most solemn protest against it, and we assure Mr. Rosling of our admiration of his fearless stand for conviction, and trust that the cross he so bravely bears may be transfigured for him, by the Master's presence, into a crown of rejoicing."

We understand that as a result of this division there is every probability that a new Free Church will be established in Bradford.

"THE NEW UNITARIAN."

WE noted last week the appearance of the first monthly number (January) of The New Unitarian, published at the New York Unitarian headquarters, 104, East Twentieth-street. Among much other interesting matter this first number contains the following letter from the Rev. William Channing Gannett, best known in this country as the author of "Blessed by Drudgery," and other papers. In one or two places we have ventured to correct what appeared to us palpable misprints.

MR. GANNETT'S LETTER.

DEAR MR. BADGER,

Thank you for inviting me to tell you in a few words what I wish The New Unitarian might be.

First, as you know, I wish its name were to be undenominational instead of denominational. This, not because I do not love the name "Unitarian," but because in this day of broadening fellowship in religion I think we ought to illustrate sympathy with, rather than differentiation from others, whenever we consistently can. "Unitarian," whatever broad meanings we give to it, is our name as a sect among sects. Instead of harking back to difference and separation in christening this new child of our spirit, I would in its very name hark forward to the better day coming, and interpret that noblest self in us which is distinctly allied with the noblest in others. Therefore I would prefer for it such a significant Puritan name as "IN SPIRIT AND IN TRUTH"—perhaps with the motto: "Neither in this mountain, nor in Jerusalem, but in spirit and in truth," printed beneath. That would set our mark high; it would tell the world better than "Unitarian" itself what that word really means to us, and tell it in a way that would affirm our aspiration one with the aspiration of all. That we are "Unitarian" and glad to be known so, is sufficiently told in the name of the publishing Conference.

Secondly, I hope the new magazine in the tone and spirit of its articles will emphasise the Ideals more than the Ideas of Unitarianism, its Principles above its Theology. For the essence of religion with us does not lie in ideas of the intellect, however noble, but in spirit and life. Moreover, our theology is manifestly taking care of itself. All the thought-changes, all the thought-tendencies in the religion of the age seem to be coming our way. The recognised leaders of Orthodoxy are more and more preaching and printing such views of God, of the Bible, of Jesus, of salvation and its conditions, of the kingdom of God on the earth, of the future life, as, until lately, have been associated with our heresy; and are accepting these views, not from us, but under the same influences, inward and outward, that a little earlier moved us to accept them. By our Ideals as distinct from these Ideas

I mean, if I may repeat what I said the other day at the Harlem Conference, these four things:

Freedom of Reason and Conscience, our Method in Religion, instead of Tradition and Authority;

Fellowship, the Spirit in Religion, instead of Sectarianism;

Character the Test in Religion, instead of Ritual or Creed;

Service the Aim in Religion, instead of Salvation for self.

These are the principles, these the ideals, which ethicise and spiritualise religion; and in proportion as they win their way in the world theology is sure to ennoble itself. Therefore these, I think, are the things which we should make it our business to emphasise. To liberalise is more than to Unitarianise; to spiritualise is more than to organise. And as these ideals belong to the Liberal Faith, whether connected with Unitarian or with orthodox doctrine, I hope that the new magazine will not try to fasten the "Unitarian" label upon them. Copyrighted as ours, they are so much the less ours; but they are all the more ours, the more we can help make them everybody's. Let us beware in the magazine of our besetting sin—the "We are the Chosen People" attitude.

Thirdly, I hope that in its theology—for of course it should and will have a theology—the new magazine will seek to interpret, rather than to refute, the older theology; to unfold and affirm the infinite fact of "Incarnation," the universal law of "Vicarious Atonement," the eternal movement of "Inspiration" for instance, rather than correct proof in the concrete and limited Orthodox statements of these and the other great ideas of religion. This not merely because the method of interpretation rather than refutation will make us better missionaries to others of any truth we have reached, but because the new visions of truth for ourselves seem to me to lie in those very dogmas called Orthodox—visions which in their glory are only beginning to rise on man's mind in this dawn of the "Evolution" day in which we are living.

On the other hand, I trust that the magazine will be too religious to greatly emphasise the name "Christian"; too deeply Christian to care much whether the name be denied or allowed us by others; too Unitarian, and too loyal to the spirit and example of Jesus, to ever dream of making that name ourselves the test of fellowship in religion or in Unitarianism.

Lastly, I hope that the new magazine will be "prophetic" rather than decorous in its utterances upon social questions; that it will dare something socially as well as Bible-critically and theologically; that it will distress us occasionally by what it may say, but not by its silence when the times call for a Voice.—Truly yours,

W. C. GANNETT.

THE IDEAL OF CO-OPERATION.

A SHORT time before his death, George Jacob Holyoake said: "I care most for co-operation. I care more for that than for any other movement I have been engaged in." The biography of Holyoake and the "History of Co-operation in England" are so closely connected that the one inevitably involves the other. He wrote the "History of the Rochdale Pioneers," and during the last weeks of his life was engaged in revising his "History of Co-operation in England" for a new edition. What is this co-operation to which he was so devoted?

Many people think of the Civil Service Stores and the Army and Navy Supply Association as examples of co-operation. These are limited liability companies trading for the money advantage of their proprietors. The co-operative stores patronised by the working classes appear to many, and even to some of their members, as associations merely for getting goods cheaper than at the shops of private tradesmen; and by their success in returning to their members a large dividend calculated on the amount expended at the stores they are judged. When this dividend is high it is often illusory, consisting in part of a return of money paid for goods in excess of the price at which similar goods could be bought at other shops and stores. Some part of the dividend, however, represents the profit of voluntary combination of individuals to purchase goods wholesale and sell them retail to themselves in small quantities as required. This obvious advantage is all that appeals to many members of nominally co-operative stores. But this is only a little part, by itself insignificant, of the intention of the convinced co-operator. Most societies give a dividend out of profits to their employees as well as their purchasing members, contribute something to charities, and have an educational fund provided out of the profits. They usually establish shorter hours of labour than those of other shops, and with more or less success aim at the supply of unadulterated goods. These characteristics bring us a little nearer to an appreciation of the co-operative ideals. The members are supposed to be united, not merely for individual gain, but for fellowship in beginning a revolution in the social, manufacturing, and trading life of the community. The retail stores are but a partial realisation of the ideal.

English co-operation developed from the teachings of Robert Owen. Holyoake was in early years a "social missionary," who went about lecturing in explanation of Owen's principles, at the meagre salary of sixteen shillings a week. It was when lecturing at Cheltenham on "Home Colonisation as a means of superseding Poor Law and Emigration," that a reply to a question on a side issue was made the ground of prosecution and imprisonment for blasphemy.

At Rochdale the teachings early took root, and resulted in the formation of the Rochdale Pioneers Co-operative Society in 1844, with 28 members and a capital of £28. The objects declared by this society exhibit both the connection with Owenism and the principles which Holyoake advocated as co-operation throughout his life, and to which it has been his constant endeavour to hold the co-operative organisations.

Besides the establishment of a store to distribute food, clothing, &c., for mutual advantage, they contemplated "the building, purchasing, or erecting of a number of houses in which those members desiring to assist each other in improving their domestic and social conditions may reside."

"To commence the manufacture of such articles as the society may determine upon, for the employment of such members as may be without employment, or who may be suffering in consequence of repeated reductions in their wages."

"As a further benefit and security to the members, the society shall purchase or rent an estate or estates of land, which shall be cultivated by the members who may be out of employment, or whose labour may be badly remunerated."

"As soon as practicable the society shall proceed to arrange the powers of production, distribution, education and government; or, in other words, to establish a self-supporting home colony of united interests, or assist other societies in establishing such societies."

When, ten years later, the Rochdale Pioneers opened a spinning mill, the object declared was that the members might have the profit arising from the employment of their own capital and labour, the scheme adopted being an allowance of five per cent. to capital, and the remaining profits to be equally divided between capital and labour.

It is clear from these extracts that the ultimate object was the establishment of a co-operative commonwealth in which members should be "members one of another," reaping the advantage of mutual service, associating to produce the goods they themselves needed and to distribute them as required, without loss. Profit sharing was, as Holyoake always affirmed, essential to the scheme; and co-operative production and profit sharing in production must go hand in hand with co-operative distribution, or the working out of the scheme is quite inadequate. Hence his disagreement with the methods of the Co-operative Wholesale Society, which does not share profits with its workpeople, but merely offers them better conditions of labour, and helps to keep up the standard of wages.

There are, however, now, a considerable number of productive societies in which profit sharing with the workers and sometimes the workers' share in management are recognised, and carried out in accordance with the principles advocated by Holyoake.

The ideal of co-operation, then, is the building up by voluntary effort of a community dwelling peaceably within the general community, that may gradually win people over from the competitive system of trading to that of production for use; sharing profits among all who like to make them; preparing the way for the establishment of a community in which land, factories, methods of exchange, distribution of goods, education and government shall be arranged for the equitable advantage of all producers and consumers, who, being in fact the same persons, have claims that can be readily harmonised.

The means proposed were the enrolment especially of those who were suffering under the prevailing system of competition. Those thrown out of work, those whose wages had been reduced, were to be chiefly considered in the provision of work. It was on one side a scheme similar to that now proposed for dealing with the unemployed in home colonies, only the home colonies were to be self-governing and the members taught the principles of mutual helpfulness.

Such being Holyoake's ideal of co-operation, he often criticised somewhat keenly the dividend hunting which for many who join co-operative societies is the chief motive, beyond which some of them never get.

Some words of his, spoken recently to Mr. W. H. Brown, were published in the Millgate Monthly :—

"In the early days co-operation sought to influence character. We admitted none who were not prepared to understand the meaning of the movement; the early members were not attracted by the dividend. They believed in the principle. Co-operation is a principle of life, and although its application may require different treatment in different times and different localities, the essential truth is the same. But we ought to go back to first principles, and do as was done in the early days at Rochdale. Poor as we were no person was admitted into membership until his name had been on a probationary list. It is right that in our democratic societies everybody should come in; but I do complain that they are never spoken to about co-operation. They are never asked whether they are prepared to live in amity and equity with all the other members of the society. And yet the furtherance of such ideas was part of the work of primitive co-operation."

Holyoake, together with his fellow-workers in those early days, was often called a "Socialist," a term of terrible disparagement then. It was, in fact, a scheme of revolutionary socialism that was propounded; but Holyoake's exposition of co-operation differed from the systems of State socialism that have been from time to time propounded, for there was in them no purpose of compelling anyone to do anything by Governmental force. Robert Owen and others with him were for withdrawing attention from politics and concentrating it on those measures of social reform which they believed would effect all that was necessary. Holyoake held that it was imperatively needful to keep watch lest politicians should waste the resources and destroy the liberties, without which such societies for the voluntary building up of character and healthy living could not exist.

With modern development in municipal trading, education under popular control, and the larger share of the ordinary citizen in the responsibility and power of Government, it seems probable that the ideals and principles of co-operation will be carried forward in the near future on a wider scale and with larger success, than in the industrial and distributive voluntary societies. These, however continue to increase. There are new organisations and companies, including Garden City and the Tenants' Housing Companies, which are making steady progress on co-operative lines, and the profit-sharing manufacturing societies have had far greater success in the last few years than they used to have. As Holyoake said :— "Participation in profits is the very element of co-operation. Co-operation without participation is imposture. It is the very essence of the principle."

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

SIR,—I have much pleasure in announcing that the various railway companies have now granted the concession to visitors to Oxford attending the Triennial meetings of return tickets for a single fare and a quarter. The tickets will be available from April 16 to 21. To take advantage of this favour it will be necessary to present vouchers, signed by me, at the booking offices. These will be sent out in April on application to me.

Invitations, programmes, and reports of the committee have been sent to all ministers, secretaries of congregations, and of societies on the Conference roll. If anyone has failed to receive his invitation, &c., I shall be much obliged if he will kindly communicate with me.

May I add, as there seems to be some uncertainty on the matter, that in the offer of hospitality the term "lodging accommodation" includes breakfast and light supper. Luncheon and tea will be served in the place named on the tickets, which will be issued in due course.

JAS. HARWOOD, Secretary.

105, Palace-road, S.W.

P.S.—I am endeavouring to make up two sets of reports of previous meetings—one for the Conference itself, and another for the Unitarian Theological School, Oakland, California, which has asked for them. The following are wanted :—Nottingham (1890), 1 copy; London (1891), 2 copies; Manchester (1894), 2 copies; Sheffield (1897), 1 copy. I shall be much obliged to any friends who can supply these missing numbers. J. H.

NOTICE OF REMOVALS.

SIR,—I am glad to see the suggestion of the North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association that letters of introduction should be dispatched from one congregation to another, intimating the settlement of a member in a new district. More than a dozen years ago I proposed to the Manchester District Association that such letters of transfer should be printed and circulated among the congregations on their roll; but though the proposal found considerable support, it was not acted upon. The more northerly Association has set a good example, which may well be followed by other district societies, or, better still, adopted for general practice by the National Conference. It has always been my custom to give or send letters of introduction in cases of removal;

but I know from long and vexatious experience that this practice is by no means general, and I am sure we lose in this way many who might be expected simply to transfer their membership from one congregation to another. If such letters were sent, the whole onus of lapse would be thrown on the indifferent member, whereas at present we have rightly to bear part of the blame.

AN ENLARGED LECTIONARY.

SIR,—Mr. Herford favours us with a story which has the fatal demerit of half a truth. Here it is:—"I preached, some years ago, in a chapel where Mr. Hopps' book of selected passages had been in use. I read the lessons from the Bible as I always do. After the service the remark was made to me: 'What a relief it was to hear the Bible again.'"

The suggestion here is that the Bible had been discarded. Will Mr. Herford tell us the name of the chapel? In all my long and very varied experience I have never known a chapel where the remark cited would have had sense and truth in it. My belief is that in every Unitarian chapel, and at every service, the Bible is read.

The "half a truth" in this story is that perhaps, in the chapel referred to, selections from the Bible were read. But every rational, honest, and decent man makes selections. Take, as one instance out of a hundred, the 17th Psalm. What does Mr. Herford do with verses 10 and 14? Shall I cite another deep ditch, Psalm 68? What are we to do with verses 21 and 23? Oh, but there is no end to it! We may be over-scrupulous, but some of us are very particular about our "Lessons," and take a great deal of trouble to get them sweet and clean, and edifying.

SIR,—The discussion on this subject interests me greatly. Some forty years ago I did a little lay preaching in a number of our Midland chapels, and having long felt that some more modern element was wanted in our too conventional services, I generally selected the second lesson from some more modern writer—Channing, Martineau, Parker, Emerson, &c. I soon discovered, however, that to find suitable extracts not too didactic or too abstruse, was a very difficult and tedious task, and it occurred to me to try whether something original could not be produced more suited to the object in view.

I made the experiment, announcing that at my next service I should read for the second lesson a Modern Parable. I used this parable in several different chapels, and found the result fairly satisfactory.

A few of the elders shook their heads, but the younger and more progressive members rejoiced at the innovation. I afterwards wrote about half a dozen similar parables, slight narratives with a moral purpose, written in as picturesque English as I could command, and I found them generally acceptable to the congregations. I commend this suggestion to our regular ministers, many of whom are much more competent to carry it out effectively. Jesus taught in parables, why should not we?

F. T. MOTT.

SIR,—There are many things in the religious life of the day which are hindrances rather than helps to the moral and spiritual advancement of the people. The reading of the Bible lessons is not one of these. It is an old and honoured custom, which does many people good, and can do no one any harm. I believe that the majority of the laity would be opposed to any attempt to displace the Bible from its traditional position in public worship. I am further of opinion that any general attempt to do so would in a large measure lessen our influence on the community at large, and prevent us from spreading the great principles of religion, for the propagation of which we exist as a Christian society.

BY A MINISTER.

XXXV.

MANY good people were troubled when the new lectionary came into use in parish churches in 1871. Their ears had been attuned to the old order, and refused for a time to be unset. The old order had remained untouched for two hundred years, and the last touch had been the insertion of Bel and the Dragon, and the History of Susanna, in 1662. It was a touch, perhaps, of wilful opposition to Puritan objection.

In the Preface to the Prayer Book of 1549 the public reading of the Bible is commended on two grounds; first, that the minister may by frequent reading be stirred up to godliness and made better able both to teach and to refute; secondly, that the people by frequent hearing may profit more and more in the knowledge of God, and be the more inflamed with the love of his true religion. And now, in this new century, there are murmurs amongst us of a new want, the want of an enlarged lectionary—a lectionary extended to the inclusion of non-Biblical reading.

I incline, I confess, to the old use. I am willing to allow that there is a theory of inspiration which admits, if it does not demand, the addition of uncanonical scriptures, but this may nevertheless be one of those cases in which the half is more than the whole. Liberty of choice would probably lead to such confusion in practice, that restriction of some kind would again be the only remedy. The office of the reader in public worship is to remind rather than to instruct, to stir up the remembrance of old neglected truths rather than to supply fresh matter for thought. Holy Scripture, as now received, has a distinctness, a uniqueness, a detachment, which no other writings can claim. In historical setting it stands apart, in dignity of association it is unapproached; it is the common heritage of Christendom, binding races and tongues together, fragrant with memories and sympathies which are themselves part of its meaning. With all its blots and imperfections it is the central light by which nations have been guided, and yet a light so near, and so familiar, that it has been to separate souls as the light of a lantern carried in the hand. The people who need the Bible most are the people who think that they have exhausted its meaning because they have grown tired of its sound. To some of us the Bible is to-day a new book, unexhausted and inexhaustible, renovated because reinterpreted, well-worn, but found to be at last that very treasure out of which it was said the scribe who had been made a disciple to the kingdom of heaven would some day bring forth things which were new as well as the things that were old. The Bible is not the easy book to read it once was, and less frequent hearing would mean intellectual as well as spiritual loss.

Some of us would ask, moreover, on what grounds, and by whom, the addition would be made. I have never yet been drawn to any man's collection of quotations from favourite authors; his choice passages are mostly a revelation of his own preferences and prepossessions. It is just this indulgence of idiosyncrasy that I would restrain. Non-Biblical matter is of necessity more contentious matter. The nearer books are to our time, the more impatient we are of their ruling on subjects which are still under discussion. The reader with a free hand would soon use his freedom to point morals of his own choosing. His lessons would be predilections in disguise. The Bible, happily, cannot be forced into direct commendation of modern theories and schemes. It is the book, it is true, from which we all draw defence for our own positions—quærit sua dogmata quisque—but this very variety, puzzling and contradictory as it may be, is its protection against conversion to party use. A literature follows no plan, and lends itself to none, whereas selected authors are easily ranged on one side.

It is to be remembered, also, that our Lessons are for a mixed assembly. They must be understood of the people. They must be so repeated, and so rehearsed, that the minds of the young may close round them, and the minds of the old retain them. Preachers and congregations alike need a common storehouse for common reference. What can be done with excerpts torn from their context, and sometimes prudently divorced from the lives of the writers? And is not literary excellence itself, in some cases, a drawback? A sonnet of Milton may be worthy indeed, but the sonnet, with its subtleties and complexities, is the last form of composition that we would choose for public recitation. There is wisdom in the old Greek saying, that handfuls in sowing are better than sackfuls.

At the same time I would not be too bigoted on these points, for I cannot forget that the first reading of Isaiah was as much an innovation in the Jewish synagogue as the first reading of St. Paul's Epistles afterwards was in the Christian congregation, and that in both instances there may have been those who then thought that the lectionary had been unwisely and unnecessarily enlarged.

[The above paper reached us before the appearance of Mr. Herford's letter in our issue of last week.—ED. INQUIRER.]

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT.

FOR various reasons I regret that the writing of the Manchester letter falls to my hands, but mainly because it means that we have lost the Rev. Charles Roper from amongst us. Mr. Roper could write with authority on the matters which concern us. He was able to keep up an intimate acquaintance with all our churches, and he was actively interested in the work of all our associations. But the thing we all admired in Mr. Roper was his warm generosity in recording the aspirations and achievements of the different churches as compared with his self-effacement in alluding to his own work and the work of his own most prosperous church. We have lost an able and trusted leader; I can only hope that London will properly appreciate his gain.

Fortunately, the large congregation at Moss Side is not to be left long without pastoral oversight. A suitable successor to Mr. Roper has been found without going many miles away. When the Rev. A. C. Fox comes to Moss Side he will find himself at the head of a large, active, and united congregation, a congregation still young, with all the hope and audacity of youth, planted in a neighbourhood which offers every encouragement to the great hope of still further progress. So may it be. For Moss Side means much to all of us. It rebukes our want of faith whenever we are inclined to despond; it leads the way whenever we are ready to advance, and always it is the loyal and generous helper of all weaker churches. Long may it flourish.

At Chorlton another parting looms in the near future. The Rev. J. Ruddle is leaving us for the bracing hills of Stannington. He passes from one of our youngest to perhaps our oldest congregation. He carries with him the affectionate regard of ministers and people alike throughout the Manchester district. At the Sunday School Association we shall miss Mr. Ruddle's work, everywhere we shall miss his gentle personality. He leaves behind him a gallant and united congregation, but unfortunately one which has not reaped a harvest worthy of its faithful labours. Both at Chorlton, Urmston, and Heaton Moor we are looking for the men who can show us how to realise the fair promise which attended the birth of these congregations. For some reason, so far, past our finding out, these three suburbs of our great city have not yielded us the bands of earnest worshippers we had a right to expect. Not that we have failed. In each case there is a group of faithful and true men and women. The quality is excellent, but the quantity is disappointing.

Broughton, our latest venture, is another shepherdless flock. With the fine traditions and the unexhausted ideals and enthusiasms of Strangeways behind them, our Broughton friends can be relied upon to give a good account of themselves as soon as they find the right man to gather up and direct their hopes and energies. For the other congregations I do not know that I can, or need, say much. We are holding our respective forts, and bearing our testimony. Not all the churches are riotously successful, but all are holding their own, and some are moving forward. There is no fear and no despondency. Our difficulties are many, and of the actual city congregations the chief is the weight of our traditions. We are old congregations, for the most part, in a new world. Conditions have changed, our old families have moved away. Meanwhile there is a multitude at our doors. Our problem is how to forget the days that are passed, the carriages that have rolled away, the families that have removed, so that we may start again to build our new Jerusalem out of the material lying all around. If we were new congregations we should start fair. I have faith we shall find the right lines in time.

Meanwhile, as I have said, we are holding our forts. I am sorry for the warlike metaphor, but, indeed, it is being thrust upon us. From the narrow exclusiveness which characterises "evangelical" councils in most centres our local exponents of the principles of religious equality have passed to deliberate and unworthy attack on our status and citizenship. They have persuaded the City Council to entrust to the Free Church Council the public duty of providing for Nonconformist interments at the public cemeteries. Under the impression that they were dealing with a body representative of the whole of Nonconformity, the Council entered into the arrangement. Every effort has been made by our local association to come to some arrangement with the Free Church Council whereby the ministers of our churches might take their place and part in discharging this public office. All such efforts have failed until, to our extreme regret, we are compelled to make the facts public. Nothing is more repugnant to us than the parade of these unfortunate sectarian differences. If we dared, we would willingly endure exclusion so that the scandal of a dissident Christianity might be avoided. But sacred principles are involved. Our whole character and competency for public service is challenged, and at any cost we are compelled to insist upon publicity, whether it will bring redress or not. Accordingly, a memorial is being prepared for presentation to the City Council. At least four Unitarians have seats on the Council. With them are many others of broad Christian sympathies and to these we look to secure us a hearing. The days are gone by of our great influence in the council. There was a time when most of its leading men were drawn from our Churches. But that was before the days of the dispersion. Our families are now scattered over a wider area, and new responsibilities exhaust the energies once concentrated on the public life of the city. Still there are many in the council to-day who will at least remember one great representative of Liberal Christianity—Alderman Rawson, and the Council which delighted to honour him will not, I believe, silently acquiesce in the infliction of civic disabilities on his co-religionists.

And now to conclude on a less warlike note, I am glad to report many useful collective activities amongst us. Taking time by the forelock we are already preparing for the coming summer at the Holiday Home. The last season there was the most successful in its history. Over eleven hundred of our scholars were helped to a week's holiday under simple and healthful conditions. The home paid its way and showed an excellent working balance. Now it is being repainted and overhauled ready for the hosts of children, who are already paying in their weekly pennies to secure the joys of a holiday there. Meanwhile there is ample provision for what remains of winter nearer home. And the most attractive of the fare provided is a course of four lectures to be delivered in the Memorial Hall on consecutive Thursday evenings by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant. Mr. Tarrant is always sure of a hearty welcome in Manchester. Not only does Manchester remember him as a student at its local College and University, but did he not do us the honour to find his wife here? And beyond all this we shall welcome him for the inspiration and encouragement he always brings, as also from our real interest in the subjects he is to discuss. Quite the dominant note in all our churches to-day is the application of our religion to the problems of social reform, and Mr. Tarrant is to lecture to us on "The Old Testament Prophets, and the Problems of Social Life Then and Now."

In harmony with this prevailing interest is the course of Sunday Afternoon Addresses now being delivered at Cross Street Chapel. A previous course given before Christmas was well attended, and now large audiences are again assembling to hear various experts speak on subjects which they have made their own. On Sunday next, Mr. Charles E. B. Russell, an excellent worker in our lads' clubs, is to speak on "Youthful Criminals: how they are made," and he will be followed on March 4 by Mr. T. P. Whittaker, M.P., on "Intemperance: is further legislation needed?"

Many other things are being done and said amongst us worthy of record, but this must suffice for the present. And it may also suffice, perhaps, to intimate to our churches that the mantle of my friend Mr. Roper has fallen on my narrower shoulders, and they will then, no doubt, favour me with church calendars and notes of events, which should find a place in this veracious chronicle.

CHARLES PEACH.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Chester.—The annual Sunday-school tea and prize distribution was held at Matthew Henry's Chapel on the 31st ult. Mr. A. Orrett presided. There was a large attendance of scholars parents, and members of the congregation. After tea an entertainment was given by the scholars. The Chairman, in the course of the proceedings, referred to the loss they had sustained through the departure of the Rev. H. E. Haycock to take up his new office of minister to the Halliwell-road Church, Bolton. The guild continued its good work under the direction of Miss Montgomery, and the school had progressed all along the line. The gymnastic class in connection with the chapel was now held at Mr. Rushton's Gymnasium in Lower Bridge-street, under the direction of Messrs. Frank Tasker and C. V. Orrett.—The advocates of municipal gymnasia as one method of checking the physical degeneration of the young have reason to be grateful to these two young men for the voluntary and self-sacrificing work they are doing and have done for the past three years to improve the physique of the poor working, lads of this city. This class is financed by small contributions from the boys themselves, aided by subscriptions from the chapel.

Chichester.—On Thursday, February 1st, there was a New Year's social gathering of members and friends and the Sunday scholars, and teachers, and a most enjoyable evening was spent. The programme, carried out by the scholars and teachers, consisted of a variety of recitations, dialogues, vocal music, &c., the whole being conducted by the minister, the Rev. C. A. Hoddinott. On Tuesday, by permission of the Board of Guardians, the programme was repeated at the Workhouse, where the minister is well known, he having been a member of the Board of Guardians and several of its committees for the past twelve years, and also as one of the preachers at the Sunday afternoon services held in the house.

Bradford.—Channing Hall was filled on Tuesday evening, when the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter delivered the first of two lectures on "The Gospels, and how to read them." The Rev. E. C. Jones presided. The second lecture is to be given next Tuesday.

Ilkeston.—On Wednesday, February 7, the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold conducted a special service, and gave an earnest devotional address, which was much appreciated. There was a good congregation.

London Guilds' Union.—On Wednesday, February 7, the annual meeting of the London Guilds' Union was held at Truro-road, Walthamstow. The proceedings commenced with refreshments and social intercourse at eight o'clock. After a short devotional service, conducted by the Rev. W. H. Rose, the president, Mr. A. Thompson, took the chair, and the annual business of the Union was transacted. "One guild has joined the Union during the year, thus making a total of six guilds belonging to the Union. Mrs. Wallace Bruce was elected president, and the Rev. W. H. Rose, secretary. After the business, representatives from Essex Church, Highgate, and Stratford, gave short papers and addresses on the subject of "Service."

London: Hampstead.—An organ recital was given in Rosslyn-hill Chapel on Wednesday evening by the organist, Mr. S. Liddle, the well-known accompanist. The attendance amounted to about 500, the building being nearly filled, and included a large proportion of the regular congregation, as well as a great many strangers. Mr. Cecil Pearson and Miss Margaret Dobson rendered solos, and the organ music was from Bach, Mendelssohn, Guilmant, and Wagner. At the termination of the music a collect and the benediction, pronounced by the Rev. Henry Gow, fittingly brought to a close an evening of rare pleasure and inspiration.

London: Wandsworth.—On Thursday, February 8, a social meeting was held to welcome the president and other representatives of the London District Unitarian Society. After music and refreshments the chair was taken by Mr. H. B. Lawford, who, in the name of the congregation, expressed pleasure at the visit paid by the visitors and other friends who had come to see them, and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, as minister, also offered a welcome. Short addresses were given by Mr. Hahemann Epps (president), Mr. D. Martineau (vice-president), the Rev. E. Savell Hicks and Mr. G. H. Clennell (secretaries), Mr. Grundy, the Revs. T. E. M. Edwards and F. W. Stanley. There was a general expression of satisfaction at the good work done by the society in the past, and commendation of similar work at present in hand. A vote of thanks, proposed by Mr. Ernest Jones, seconded by Mrs. Tarrant, was accorded to the speakers and others who had helped to make the occasion agreeable and profitable.

Manchester: Gorton.—A sale of work in connection with the Brookfield Church was held in the schools on Saturday and Monday, February 10 and 12, with the object of raising a sum of not less than £100 towards the cost of asphaltting the walks around the school. The sale was opened on Saturday by Lieut. Colonel Pilcher, under the chairmanship of Mr. Councillor Hugh Dean, Colonel Pilcher, in declaring the sale open, expressed his pleasure at being present. He was no stranger to Gorton. In his younger days he often came to hear the late Rev. G. H. Wells, who was a very old friend of his brother, Richard Pilcher. He commended to them the motto from the handbook for the day: "Spend freely, and your heart will be as light as your pocket." A vote of thanks to the opener was proposed by Mr. G. Daniels and seconded by Mr. Broadhurst. There was a large attendance, and the various entertainments provided were much enjoyed. The amount realised by the day's sale was about £80. On Monday afternoon the sale was opened by Mr. H. P. Greg, of Handforth, the Rev. Geo. Evans in the chair. Mr. Greg, before opening the sale, expressed his delight at the bright and cheerful appearance of the church and school buildings. After looking round, and especially after reading the last annual report of the school which had been sent to him, he felt indeed that Brookfield Church was a church which realised to the full that any church to be a living church must consist of workers. Those, he said, who merely attended occasionally, and applauded or criticised, did not make the backbone of church life. The people who made that life were those who were willing to give up their days and evenings to achieve some improvement for the common good: people who were not moved by any ideas of self, but were anxious to benefit the cause. A vote of thanks to the opener was proposed by Mr. Geo. J. Robinson and seconded by Mr. G. Cocks. There was again a large attendance of friends, and the excellent entertainments provided were well patronised. The day's receipts amounted to about £50.

Midland Ministers' Monthly Meeting.—The 750th and annual meeting was held at the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham, on February 5. There were seventeen members present. Also as visitors the Rev. S. S. Brettell, Mrs. Wood, Mrs. Austin, Mrs. Voysey, and Mrs. Sneath. Letters of apology were read, amongst others one from Mr. Lummis expressing a hope to return to England in June next. The annual report was read and adopted. The Rev. J. Wrigley was re-elected secretary and treasurer, and the Rev. A. Thompson was re-elected auditor. The Rev. C. M. Wright was elected a member, and the roll of members was then read and adopted. The usual monthly business followed, and then a paper was read by the Rev. Joseph Wood on "Christianity and Civilisation," and discussed by the members. Tea was kindly provided by the wardens of the Old Meeting Church.

Oxford: Charles-street Mission.—On Thursday, Feb. 8, the children of the Charles-street Institute and Mission had their New Year's party. Under the fostering care of Miss Upton the school just now is in a flourishing condition. A neighbouring Baptist church kindly allowed the children to adjourn to a large room of theirs close by during part of the evening. Gifts from a tree were distributed, with many a humorous sally, by Dr. J. E. Odgers. At 7.30 many of the parents of the children came, and an entertainment with recitations and music and dramatic pieces by friends was very much appreciated by the whole company.

Sidmouth.—Early in the winter the Rev. William Agar gave a course of lectures on "Bible Stories," which was most interesting to his own congregation, and attracted a large number of strangers, some of whom have continued to attend the chapel. The Sunday-school, Bible-class, sewing society, and glee class are all in a healthy condition and doing good work, and two or three social evenings have been held, the Christmas party in especial being very much enjoyed by all members of the congregation.

Southend-on-Sea.—A public meeting is to be held in the church in Darnley-road on Wednesday evening next, to welcome Mr. Delta Evans as minister of the congregation. Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, Rev. F. Summers, Dr. B. C. Ghosh, and others, have promised to be present and to speak.

Stockton.—A sale of work was held on February 8, and 9 for the purpose of raising funds for church renovation, &c. The Mayoress of Stockton opened it on the first day, Alderman Hind, J.P. (Wesleyan) presiding; and on the second day Mrs. T. H. Ward, of Middlesbrough, Councillor M. Robinson presiding. The members of the church and congregation and Sunday-school all united heartily in the work, and it is hoped that the pecuniary result will be satisfactory.

Sychbant: Cardiganshire (Stonelaying).—The much longed-for ceremony of laying the foundation stones of the new Unitarian Church at Sychbant took place on the afternoon of Tuesday, February 6. The weather was not all that could be desired; but, in spite of this, the ceremony was witnessed by a large crowd of people. The chair was taken by the Rev. John Davies, the minister of the place, and the devotional part of the ceremony was conducted by the Rev. E. O. Jenkins, of Llwyn. The stones were four in number, one each being laid by Captain Davies, Rhydownfach; Rev. J. Davies, Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, of Bradford, and the Rev. W. James, J.P., of Llandyssil. After the ceremony was over, the assembly resorted to one of the village houses, where speeches were delivered by the Revs. J. Davies, E. Ceredig Jones, W. James, E. O. Jenkins, Lewis Williams, and Captain Davies. The treasurer and the secretary also spoke on behalf of the congregation. In the evening the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones preached in the "Carpenter's Shop." This place was far from being equal to the occasion, there being dozens of people standing outside failing to get admittance. It is the sincerest hope of the members of this congregation that even one more eventful day is to happen in the history of this quiet place—the occasion of the opening of their proper religious home, at the end of next August, free from all debts.

Walthamstow.—On Thursday evening, February 1, the cantata, "A Happy Family," was admirably performed by about thirty Sunday-school scholars, under the direction of Miss Mary Read and Miss Prosser. The room was quite full. The proceeds go towards the building fund.

Yorkshire Sunday-school Union.—The last conference for the session was held in the school of Chapel-lane Chapel, Bradford, on Saturday, and was attended by between seventy and eighty teachers and friends from Leeds, Pudsey, Huddersfield, Dewsbury, Lydgate, Halifax, and Elland. After ten a meeting was held in the Channing Hall, the president of the Union, Mr. O. E. Dodgson in the chair. A paper was read by the Rev. Alfred Amey, of Pudsey, on "Thoughts on Sunday-school Work." The discussion which followed wandered considerably from the paper, but was of an interesting character, and always in touch with some aspect of Sunday-school work.

BODY AND SPIRIT.

HERE on this earth we live in time and place,

The future dim, much of the past forgot;

The measureless—we comprehend it not,

The eternal now, the infinite of space.

Such thoughts beyond our ken we fear to face,

Where all succession ends; we know not what

We shall be, and the soul's mysterious lot
Is like a labyrinth no clue can trace.

We are but fragments of a Life divine,
God's Light divided into varied hues,
And imperfection marks each borrow'd ray:
Earth's limitations heavenly pow'rs confine,
To win the higher life this life we lose,
Passing thro' darkness into perfect Day.

R. ASQUITH WOODING, Hon. Sec.

CULLOMPTON, DEVON.

With the aid of a Bazaar and Donations from friends, various Repairs and Improvements have recently been effected at Pound-square Chapel; and an Organ has also been provided. The total outlay has been £131 2s. 2d.

A sum of £163 17s. has been raised, including £20 granted for Chapel Repairs by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Of this amount £32 14s. 10d. thus remains in hand.

In addition to the provision of better chapel ventilation, it is desired to convert some adjoining chapel property into a Dwelling House, at an estimated cost of £67 10s., with a view to an increase in the small permanent income.

The Minister and Congregation venture to appeal to their friends to assist in raising a further amount of at least £40.

Donations, forwarded to the Rev. JEFFERY WORTHINGTON, Treasurer to the Special Improvements Fund (Chudleigh Cottage, Cullompton), will be gratefully acknowledged.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

SUPPLEMENTING our note of last week with reference to the visit of the Rev. S. M. Crothers, D.D., of Cambridge, Mass., to this country, we may say that Dr. Crothers is to preach at the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham, during the months of May and June, and at Essex Church, Kensington, during September and October. In July and August Dr. Crothers will be with his family on the Continent, and we understand that it is no use for any other congregation to ask him to preach. While he is in Birmingham, the Rev. Joseph Wood will be at Cambridge, and the Rev. F. K. Freeston, while he is at Essex Church. In each case it is an exchange of pulpits.

At Bradford on Tuesday evening the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter gave the second of two lectures on "The Gospels and how to read them," in Channing Hall, the Rev. E. Ceredic Jones presiding. Half a column of Wednesday's Yorkshire Daily Observer is devoted to a report of the lecture, which dealt chiefly with the Fourth Gospel. There was a large audience, representing practically all the denominations of the town, and at the close the lecturer was warmly thanked on the motion of Dr. Duff, seconded by the Rev. T. Rhondda Williams, and supported by the Rev. R. Roberts. At Preston, also, these two lectures have been delivered to large audiences, and have attracted great attention. The Vicar of St. Mark's preached in opposition to Mr. Carpenter's views, and gave the opportunity to the Rev. Charles Travers for a full reply, which has been well reported in the local papers.

THE new Parliament met last week, and was chiefly occupied with the swearing-in of members. Mr. Lowther was again elected Speaker. This week opened with the King's Speech on Monday, and the debate on the Address has since been proceeding. It elicited one welcome announcement on Wednesday, that by an order of the Admiralty the punishment of flogging had been abolished in the Navy for a year, and is not likely to be resumed.

THE King's Speech announced the intentions of the new Government for the present session, the proposed legislation including a measure of devolution for the government of Ireland "in a spirit respectful of the wishes and sentiments of the Irish people," a measure with the object of bringing the rural population back to the land, and Amendment of the Education Act, the Workmen's Compensation Acts, the law relating to trade disputes, and the Unemployed Workmen Act, also a measure to equalise rates in the metropolis. It is to be a session of hard work.

LAST August, to the great regret of many friends, the Echo ceased to appear. Last Monday Mr. F. W. Pethick Lawrence, who was the editor and chairman of the company, the Consolidated Newspapers, Ltd., which owned the paper, made a statement to a meeting of the unsecured creditors. The Receiver, he said, had notified that the realisation of the assets of the company would be insufficient to meet the claims of the debenture-holders, and there was nothing available for unsecured creditors. Legally they had no claim against him, but, in his opinion, the legal liability of directors under the methods of modern company finance did not exhaust the whole of the responsibility attaching to the control of such undertakings. Moreover, he thought that among the unsecured creditors there were probably some who might have given credit to the company because of his connection with it. He therefore intended out of his own pocket to discharge in full the unsecured trade debts for goods delivered and services rendered, incurred by the company during his term as managing-director, amounting in all to several thousand pounds. That is an action which it is good to record.

WOMEN'S SOCIAL CLUB.—This society held its first meeting at Essex Hall on the afternoon of February 9. It has been founded with the aim of promoting friendship and intercourse between the women of our London congregations. The idea of such a club has been very well received, and there are already over 120 members. Sub-sections have been formed for different kinds of work, which many members have joined. The subscription is 5s. for one member of a family, and 2s. 6d. for every other member. Further particulars may be obtained on application to the hon. secretary, Miss F. Lawford, 4, Wexford-road, Wandsworth Common, S.W.

CHANNING HOUSE SCHOOL.—Seven pupils were entered for Junior Cambridge Local Examination in December, 1905, and all passed, three obtaining honours. Honours: K. Cowell, J. Wright, E. Hocking, Pass: A. Hargrove, D. McMurtrey, H. Hocking, and M. Thomson.

"OUR OWN."

IF I had known in the morning
How nearly all the day
The words unkind
Would trouble my mind,
I had been more careful, darling,
Not given you needless pain;
But we vex "our own"
With look and tone,
We might never take back again.
For though in the quiet evening
You may give me the kiss of peace,
Yet it might be
That never for me
The pain of the heart should cease.
How many go forth in the morning
That never come back at night!
And hearts have broken
For harsh words spoken,
That sorrow can ne'er set right.
We have careful thoughts for the stranger,
And smiles for the sometime guest,
But oft for "our own"
The bitter tone,
Though we love "our own" the best.
Ah! lips with the curve impatient,
Ah! brow with the look of scorn,
'Twere a cruel fate
Were the night too late
To undo the work of morn.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

LIFE is so wondrous a gift that we are bound to trust its Giver, even when we cannot understand His dealings with us.

OLD TESTAMENT PROPHETS AND THE PROBLEMS OF SOCIAL LIFE.

THE Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., delivered the first of his series of lectures in Manchester last week. In some general introductory remarks Mr. Tarrant referred to the widespread interest in social questions to-day, and to the genuine awakening of the Christian conscience. The depth of our pain was, however, the proof that things were going to mend. There must be a way out, and it would be found in following up the thought of the Reign of Law. If there was a science of growing plants there must also be a science of growing human beings. A wide basis was, however, needed of knowledge and observation in order to judge properly, and this would be found in the study of the Old Testament prophets and the social problems of their time. Rightly understood, we had in the Bible a classic literature second to none for its interest, sublimity, and importance. But we should approach the Bible as the actual story of a real people. If we approached it as students of social life it would give us a living chapter of human story. Briefly discussing the literary results of Biblical criticism, Mr. Tarrant hastened on to tell the story of the rise of the Hebrew people. Told by him it proved a fascinating theme, as the nation was made to live and unfold itself before the audience. There was the coming together of certain nomadic tribes and their eventual settlement in the land of Palestine—a land no larger than Wales in size, but so vast in human interest. But when they came it was not to a barren land, but to a land of high antiquity, where an advanced civilisation had flourished for three thousand years, with art, literature, government, and, no doubt, social problems also. It was in the fourteenth or fifteenth century B.C. that the Hebrews came to this fertile land to seek a new home. And when they came they found themselves not unrelated in speech and race to those they found there, and they were able to settle down and live side by side with them. Gradually the physical conditions of the land affected their character and pursuits. The nomadic life was perforce given up, and they became a settled people. The clan gave way to the township and citizenship. For a time they formed small isolated communities, amongst whom Judges, that is, vindicators, arose from time to time, to rally and lead their scattered forces against some threatening danger. Gradually, however, the consciousness awoke that they needed something more than these sporadic vindicators—some one permanent head to weld them into one power. This was hastened by the appearance of a warlike and non-semitic people, who seemed to be sweeping all before them, the Philistines. Out of this need arose their first king, Saul. And Saul not only defended their interests. He carried forward the process of nationality—raising this nomadic people into a nation, teaching them that they belonged to each other, and so preparing the way for the idealised king who should complete the process—David—Israel's most brilliant and important king. This old story of the rise of a nation must be full of interest to an age like this, which had witnessed the rise of new nations, and honoured Mr. Gladstone's passionate defence of nationalities. What was the living force amongst us to-day but a heightened sense of our own Imperial Unity? It was well that we were asked to think imperially, but to do so we must feel imperially, and that involved the whole duty of man. It was to help this dawning sense amongst us, and to find such light as might be shed on the problems it involved, that he proposed, Mr. Tarrant said, to follow up the study of the Old Testament prophets.

The chair was taken by the Rev. Dendy Agate, President of the Manchester District Association, who announced that the lectures would be continued on consecutive Thursdays. The lectures are given in the Memorial Hall at 8 o'clock. This week's subject was "Origins and History of Old Testament Prophecy." Next week's is "Passing and Permanent Elements in the Prophetic Literature."

PHILETUS, a married don, sends me the following little study of child life. I like it well enough, but I cannot forget that it is by a parent, and that in these days knowledge of children is the special possession of the unmarried. The reader will, therefore, make full allowance for the ignorance of a mere father.

BABY.

BY A PHILOSOPHER.

To the absent-minded and the supercilious all babies are alike; to the discriminating there are babies and babies; to the initiated there is but one in all the world. They see Baby as they see the sun in the heavens.

The poet's goddess betrays herself by her walk. So does Baby. When she floats across the floor she trails the clouds of glory with which she came. There are who perceive them not, but neither would they discern the steps of a goddess passing by.

There are, in like manner, those who do not comprehend her speech. To us it is simplicity itself. It is the primitive tongue, free and unfettered, unspoiled as yet by formula and rule. That a language, to be intelligible, must be logical and grammatical is as much an invention as are logic and grammar. She says what she has to say, and not what others have already said; she fits fresh thought to new expression, unhampered by tradition; and, if she makes her own inflections, they never fail to convey her meaning. Her vocabulary is a sufficient medium; its use in our household is already superseding that of the vulgar tongue; our whole nomenclature is changing; things are brought to her to be renamed, and what she pronounces them to be, that they are called.

She has lived through some eighteen moons. I speak of moons, for we have no other reckoning. The day of her birth was the beginning of a new era, and all events are regarded as happening before or after that date. For common use the old calendar remains in force, but in the circle of affection a new dynasty has begun.

Baby's two eyes are volumes harder to read than any printed page. In them are written in sibylline confusion reminiscences of the past, interpretations of the present, premonitions of the future. Humour and seriousness, wonder and indifference, reproach and forgiveness, reveal themselves in turn. On that which has power to hurt and destroy they gaze unmoved. Fire and poison and whetted steel daunt them not. Here are no shadows of regret or of doubt, no questionings of will or of fate; only wise acceptance of that which is, and is to be. Milk is spilt, but not cried over. Here is philosophy deeper than my own.

In social matters Baby is well-balanced and composed. She sits with equal ease and dignity at the head of the table or on the floor. If on the floor, and she desires it, you must sit beside her. She is no respecter of age or of rank; she smiles upon the milkman and the postman, though a duchess might kneel to her in vain. She has the instincts of self-protection, but not the presumptions of pride. Without guile, she is also without shame. Humility she knows not, apology and excuse she never makes, appearances are never studied, self-denial never practised, for the simple reason that she has none of those opposite qualities which need these for their correction. As she neither flatters nor offends, it is as natural to her to turn her back upon you as to throw her arms round your neck. She does not burden her memory with that which is not worth remembering, nor her conscience with undeserved blame. Disguises and affectations she disdains, for she has nothing to hide. I wish I were as sure of my social status, and could weigh as easily my social duties, could discharge them as gracefully or decline them as innocently. Her savoir-faire and savoir-vivre make codes of conduct and politeness superfluous.

In matters intellectual she is not less independent. If curiosity is one of her attributes, so also is unconcern. Everything that holds a secret attracts her inquiring mind; but she is no utilitarian; knowledge is pursued for its own sake; analysis, not synthesis, is her aim; all things are reduced by her to their simplest elements, and this, if I know anything of science, is what scientists mean by research. Only they do painfully and laboriously that which to her is child's play.

In theories of education we presuppose the good father, but who, if not the child, is to make the father good? I have seen neglected children, but I have never seen a neglected parent; at some time in his parenthood a teacher, small but wise, has been ready to take him in hand, and to scold and pet him by turns. If he has turned out badly, it is because he has disgraced his bringing-up. Our proverbs and wise saws set too much in one direction. Spare the rod, and spoil the child? Why not, Spare the kiss, and spoil the man? It pleases me to reflect that the training of one at least of Baby's elders is proceeding apace.

SCARCELY need the child know that he has a soul; it is ours to take care that, when at length he finds it, it shall be a noble and august discovery.—James Martineau.

PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS AT THE BENARES THEISTIC CONFERENCE.

BY PUNDIT S. N. SASTRI.

II.

BEING thus endowed, this Theism, which we have come here to celebrate, is eminently fitted to take its place as the future religion of emancipated mankind.

But its definition is not yet complete. Let me try to characterise it a little by contrast also. It is not that esoteric philosophy which ran like a secret vein below popular forms of faith in ancient India, in ancient Greece and Rome, latterly in Europe of the eighteenth century as a form of Deism. It has drawn much of its sustenance from the Upanishads, but it is not the Philosophy of the Upanishads. It is not mere Philosophy, it is religion. It is not Deism, it is Theism. It believes in prayer, and bases its spiritual life upon it. Prayer may be justly regarded as the distinguishing line between Deism and Theism. The faith of the Theistic Church, therefore, is not Deism but Theism. But our Theism is not the Theism of ancient Judaism, of Mahomedanism, or current orthodox Christianity. The Parama Purusha or Supreme Being whom we worship, is not that anthropomorphic and extracosmic Being familiar to those forms of faith, who has his seat in a place called heaven and rules the world therefrom. He is immanent in matter and mind. He is a besetting Presence, within and without, behind and before. He is with us "to-day and to-morrow," as the Upanishads say. He is immanent in matter and mind. Yet he is not that impersonal entity, known to Vedantism as Brahman. He is Purusha or a Person, all-knowing and all-wise holding us in his embrace, and ordering everything for the good. He can be loved and adored and in this love and adoration is religion.

Thus it will be seen that the Theistic Church sides with the bhakti school rather than with the Vedantic school of pantheism. Its religion is the religion of love. But though belonging to the bhakti school we are yet very far from its popular accompaniments—the doctrines of incarnation and image worship. In the matter of bhakti or ardent love of God, we are followers of such masters as Nanak, Kabi Tukaram and Chaitanya, but we differ from them, in shunning incarnation, idolatry and caste. In one sense every great man, every great teacher of humanity, is an incarnation of the Deity, i.e., a manifestation of the Divine Principle and an embodiment of divine energy; but incarnation, in its popular sense, we reject as tending to limit the sense of the Infinite and to clothe the sayings and doings of frail man with infallibility. Idolatry also we object to because it tends to remove religion from the sphere of the conscience to that of external observances, and also because it fosters incorrect moral and spiritual ideals, and thereby dooms the mind to spiritual darkness. Caste we abjure because it is based upon the denial of human brotherhood. Thus our religion, though a natural evolution of the bhakti movements of this country, and resembling them in its main spiritual aspects, has original features of its own for which it is for the time being unpopular. Men's notions about religion in this country are intimately associated with image worship, with authority and with rules of caste. It has been justly remarked that popular religion in India is more social than spiritual, consisting more of the punctilious observances of caste rules than of rules of moral conduct. Then we must take into account the fact that the Hindus of India, like the Chinese, are most conservative with regard to the acceptance of new ideas. The social system under which they live is not favourable to the exercise of independent judgment. Their caste system has all along proved to be an impregnable iron wall against the inroads of new ideas. Buddhism did beat in vain against this iron wall till it agreed to live only by compromise. Mahomedanism, with its fire and sword, succeeded in seven centuries in converting only a fifth of the vast population, whereas Christianity, backed by the ruling power, and propagated by numerous agencies, has affected but the outer fringe of that population in four hundred years. Its progress has also been checked by that iron wall. In a country like this it is but natural that a creed like that of the Theistic Church should make but slow progress.

But let us inquire if there be other causes leading to the unpopularity of the Theistic Church. I shall state what I have heard from outside critics, and shall leave you, brethren, to reflect upon them. The main cause of the unpopularity of theism in India, specially of the Brahmo Samaj in Northern India, is the impression that has gone abroad, that Indian theism is another form of Christianity. The Brahmo's God is the Christian God, the same extra-cosmic being spoken of in the Bible, the Brahmo's religious ideals are Christian ideals, and his leader unto salvation is Jesus Christ—say these critics, and they turn away from us. I think there is some ground for such an impression. Many of our prominent men have professed extraordinary reverence for Jesus—some of them going so far as to call themselves his disciples. Following these teachers, many of the younger generation also have borne testimony to their indebtedness to Christ and Christianity. Thus inside the church there is an under-current of personal regard for the founder of Christianity—a sentiment in which all the sections have not shared, and to which some of them even object. Then again, the above mentioned popular impression has been further strengthened by the fact that theistic journals belonging to almost all sections, with the exception of Adi Brahmo Samaj, quote freely from Christian papers, and depend largely for their inspiration on Christian writers, as if there were nothing in our national treasury of thoughts worth showing to the Western races. And to all this add the fact that during the last few years we have shown greater disposition to cultivate the friendship of the Unitarians in England than to unite with any class amongst our own people; and it is no wonder that outside critics should be led to infer that the theists of India turn to the West and West alone for inspiration and guidance.

But let not our position be misunderstood in this respect. We give the fullest scope to these personal preferences. We act on the principle, in our father's house there are many mansions; there is room in our church for the Yogi or the Bhakta or the Karmi, for the lover of the Rishis, or of Christ or of Mahomed. As there are theists who sit at the feet of the prophet of Nazareth, there are theists who have never opened their soul to Christian influences, and who draw their inspiration mainly from our Rishis and our scriptures alone. As some turn to Jesus, others turn to the great Sakya Muni for lessons of wisdom and true spirituality. Nay there are men amongst us who look upon the prophet of Arabia as an ideal of spiritual integrity. We follow in this respect the well-known Roman Catholic principle—"In things essential unity, in things non-essential liberty, in all things charity." And that should be our guiding principle, so that we may secure union and co-operation in our general aims.

Then, it is not true that the theists of India are regardless of their past or not sufficiently appreciative of their own things. It is a fact of literary and religious history in Bengal that the Brahmo Samaj has led the van in ancient Sanskrit research. It was Raja Ram Mohun Roy who translated the Upanishads first; it was Maharshi Devendranath Tagore who followed in his steps, and made the Rig Veda familiar to his countrymen by translating portions of it. Coming after them other Brahmo leaders, belonging to all sections, have also published other Hindu scriptures. Nor have they forgotten more modern teachers of Hinduism. Who, for instance, are greater admirers of Baba Nanak, of Kabir, of Tukaram, of Chaitanya, and other Hindu sages and saints than the Brahmos? In fact, in Bengal Chaitanya, our great prophet, had fallen into disfavour with the educated classes, and it was the Brahmos, led by Mr. Keshubchandra Sen, who revered his memory, and introduced him to the educated community. At present Chaitanya has many disciples even amongst educated men in Bengal, but all of them are not aware of their indebtedness to the Brahmo Samaj in this respect. Even now, some of the best lives of the prophet of Nadia are from the pen of the members of the Samaj. It is not true that we are less appreciative of our own men and of our own things.

The same thing that I have just now said with regard to the Brahmo Samaj and Chaitanya can be said with equal justice of the theists of the Western Presidency. Tukaram has found nowhere more sincere admirers than amongst the theists of that Presidency. Dr. Bhandarkar and his friends stand foremost amongst the worshippers of Tukaram's memory. Not only Tukaram, but Namdev and other masters of the Bhakti school have found warm admirers amongst the southern theists. It is not true, I again repeat, that we theists of India are lacking in love of our country or in appreciation of our good things. I for one, standing here this day, am not prepared to yield to any Indians living in love of my own country and of my people. But my love for my own country and my own people does not prevent me from seeing the operation of the Divine Spirit in other lands and amongst other nations. I can truly say that I have my teachers in many lands and in all ages of the world.

I belong to a family whose dwelling place is this world, whose father is the Parama Purusha, whose inheritance is the scriptures of all nations, whose elder brothers are the Rishis of India and the lovers of God amongst all nations, and whose final destiny is union with the Parama Purusha.

But this universality of my faith does not prevent its being also intensely national. There is no conflict between these two aspects of religion. It is universal in its principles, in its main doctrines, and main lines of action; but national and local in its external forms, its domestic and social usages and its modes or propagation. Let me try to illustrate my meaning. The members of the Brahmo and Parthana Samajes in India, as well as the members of Mr. Voysey's congregation in England, equally belong to the universal Theistic Church. But our respective forms of service are different. We use texts from our old books as guiding our form of service, Mr. Voysey uses forms of service moulded on the pattern of the traditional forms of the Church of England. Is he less a theist on that account? Similarly if a body of theists, like the Babis of Persia, were to appear amongst Mahomedans they would certainly use, in their services, forms traditionally familiar to their people divested of their superstitious elements or modelled out of forms familiar to them. Would they be less theists on that account? The English theists kneel while praying, we sit cross-legged, and the Mahomedan theists would perhaps make their familiar movements. Does that detract from our universality? We have our Namakaran and Sraddha, which the English theists have not, but instead have their services of Confirmation and Dedication; do these national differences constitute any departure from the principle of universality? No, we may go further and say, that however universal a faith may be, it must assimilate national ideals and national forms to be able to appeal effectually to the national mind. The religion of the Theistic Church is doing that already. It is universal in its ideas and principles; but it is slowly imbibing many national forms. The main lines of our form of service, our domestic ceremonies, our modes of sankirtan, are all national. And I am sure, as we grow in intensity and depth, in reality and strength, this power of assimilation will be more manifest—for it is life that grows by assimilation.

Here let me remark, that it may be that as the effect of the first impulse for reformation, we have given too much reins to the spirit of protest and have too lightly discarded many things in our traditional spiritual inheritance. Perhaps it has generated in us a spirit of individualism, which is more concerned with points of difference than with points of agreement, more attentive to other's faults than to their virtues, more eager to assert rights than to find duties; but as love of God strengthens in us it will surely generate a spirit of reverence which will effectually counteract this individualism by a due regard for the collective experience of others. Love alone is constructive; and our growth in love of God will truly and surely conserve everything good and build us up as a spiritually effective body.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME; and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the sender.]

AN ENLARGED LECTONARY.

SIR,—May I add something to my previous letter on this subject?

(1) The discussion amply proves that there is a widely felt need. Is it not a sacred duty of every minister and every member of a congregation to allow for variety of need?

(2) Some have written as though it were a question of rivalry between the two kinds of lesson, or as if someone were aiming to exclude the Bible altogether. But the thought of rivalry or exclusiveness is not on our side. The Bible is quite safe. In a discussion on this subject at Little Portland-street, when I was there, a member said that he had once been very anxious for non-Biblical readings, but that when he had heard a good many he realised what noble passages the Bible contained. Precisely. That is the natural result, and it strengthens the case for a judicious combination, though not stated with that view, I believe. To be homines unius libri is not better in a church than elsewhere. Misappreciation of the one book itself is the sure consequence.

(3) But the principal reason for a combination of lessons is that we ought to make the best use of our resources. In one sense, it may never be "necessary," as Mr. R. T. Herford says, to go outside the Bible. But, with a view to the end just named, I often find it absolutely necessary. Place the Bible as high as you please, it has its limitations both as to matter and as to style.

(4) Mr. Herford pleads also that "if a passage be read from some other book, (a) they (the congregation) have nothing to guide them as to what it is all about, and (b) they could very seldom be in a position to follow the reading in a copy of their own." With regard to (a), I have never heard of such an instance—except when a certain kind of Biblical passage has been read. How many examples in Prophets and Epistles! A few Sundays ago I read Phil. ii. as a lesson. I felt bound to preface it by quoting the first words of Dr. Drummond's note on vv. 5-11—"This passage presents great difficulties"—and added that I read it for the sake of other verses. What more could one do? The note is more than seven pages long (Internat. Crit. Comm.). Candidly, I think it is easier to find non-Biblical than Biblical readings which are at once complete in themselves, plain throughout in their meaning, and noble in their teaching. But, of course, nothing is easier than to choose Biblical readings only if this standard be not aimed at. With regard to (b), I have known many instances of persons forthwith buying the book from which they have heard a reading, and more instances of persons feeling a new interest in the book and its author—such persons being always grateful for the new light or impulse.

(5) The minister who "muses" on this subject with his usual charm ends by generously fixing himself with an arrow out of his own quiver. How, then, should his other shafts, though skilfully polished, reach their mark? He says, "Holy Scripture, as now received, has a distinctness, a uniqueness, a detachment, which no other writings can claim. In historical setting it stands apart, in dignity of association it is unapproached." This is the kind of saying which seems to challenge us to put up rivals. But why place in ranks the books or the men from which one gets that impalpable and immeasurable and multiform thing—inspiration? I care not for such work. And especially may one decline it in the case of a book which is not one book but many, differing greatly in character and quality. If nothing else, Martineau's noble sermon, "The Bible and the Child," and the personal as distinguished from the ecclesiastical habits of Unitarians, would have taught me to think little of such qualities as those named in the above quotation, compared with the Bible's power to teach and help me. From this point of view, the Bible, "as now received" by thinking people, is very different from what it was formerly. Once it had "a distinctness, a uniqueness, a detachment," which belonged to it as a special divine revelation. Relatively to all other literature it had a peculiar authority. These qualities it has now lost. It has gained, however, in reality, in vividness, in usefulness. And the better parts have gained in moral and spiritual power through being read in their right relation to the other parts and seen in their due proportions. In a literary and historical sense the above saying is no doubt true of the Bible as a whole. But should literary and historical values, or moral and spiritual values, decide our choice in a church?

(6) "Non-Biblical matter," says our excellent muser, "is of necessity more contentious matter." Marvellous statement! Why "of necessity"? It is sufficient to ask the question—and this other: Does any book give rise to more contention than the Bible? How many of its chapters are associated with theological wranglings! The problem of wise selection gives rise to difference of opinion, even amongst us.

(7) We are asked, "Is not literary excellence itself in some cases a drawback?" And Milton's Sonnet on his Blindness is regarded as an instance because of its "subtleties and complexities." But what could be simpler than the thought of that poem? The humblest person can understand it; and the subtle and complex structure of the verse will not trouble him because he will know nothing about it. And as for the literary people—well, the sonnet was offered to one of them as an example of "the fit word perfectly expressed" which he must have when he goes to church; and it seems a little hard that another literary person should condemn it as too perfect for church use.

Another proof of the variety of men's needs!

H. RAWLINGS.

Mr. William Ashton, of Southport, in the course of a letter on this subject, writes:

There are, perhaps, a score of chapters in the Bible which are void of all such offence (the contradiction of modern ideas of the universe and Divine law), and which will have power to stimulate the imagination, and to meet the spiritual needs of the average man and woman as long as human nature remains what it is. But this choice is far too restricted. It would be strange, indeed, if the yearnings after the higher life, and the intellectual labourings of twenty centuries, had not brought forth a mass of literature from which much that is suited to the satisfaction of man's moral and spiritual cravings to-day could not be extracted. As a matter of fact, there is an ample range of choice, even within my own knowledge. There is a passage in Ruskin's "Unto this last," which I read twenty years ago, a passage of profound moral import, which sunk more deeply into my mind than any Bible passage that I ever heard read from the pulpit. Channing, Emerson, Marcus Aurelius, Stopford Brooke, Martineau, Tennyson, Renan—are all mines of noble and elevating thought. My desire is to see the comparative barrenness of the scripture lesson replaced by matter which is, at least, as nourishing, interesting, and quickening to all that is best in the average listener, as is the sermon—at its best. Is it to be wondered at that visitors from other churches are so apt to ask questions about the apparent inconsistency in our beliefs and services—of which this is the most conspicuous? I earnestly protest against the continuance of a usage which lays us open to the charge that we have not the courage of our opinions. How often have we railed at other churches for the indolence and moral cowardice in not adjusting their creeds and services to their changed beliefs?

SIR,—It is my own belief that we are greatly in need of additions to our present Bible. What should we think of our men of science if their text-books were 1,700 years old? A science course which knew nothing of Galileo, Kepler, Newton or Darwin, but stopped short at the point reached when the New Testament stopped, would be a disgrace to science.

The Christian religion is disgraced by this—that it has added nothing during 1,700 years; it has added not one chapter to sacred Scripture!

Palestine had sacred writers; Western Christianity has had none! It has not known God directly, but only through a mediatorial scheme of revelation, and it has received no revelations whatsoever capable of comparison with the Jewish Scriptures.

Christianity is thus the one great religion that has proved sterile in revealing Power. The first two hundred years of its history is the one exception. Surely, sir, something has gone wrong with Christianity! Why have Christians lost communion with God? Why has God ceased to reveal Himself? Why has the writing of sacred and inspired words of God come to an end? To me the finger of God points to a matter here too serious for many words.

Let me say only, has Christianity then done nothing for God? Is there no work accomplished by Christians worthy of being called divine? Surely, there is much, but lack of faith to say so. Has Christianity no prophets? No sacred history? No hymns of praise? No prayers? Was the high-water mark of religious inspiration reached 1,700 years ago; and has the tide been ebbing ever since? Where is the sacred and inspired literature of Christian revelation? Has God been utterly absent in Christian history? Or have we shut our eyes to His Presence? Why does my English Bible have not one chapter upon St. Augustine or Wiclif, or Bunyan, or Milton, or Wesley? Were these Christian men, then, not inspired of God? Were Habbakuk and Hosea inspired; but are Christian prophets without inspiration? I turn to my Protestant Bible, and behold, Luther and Calvin are not mentioned! Are Protestants so far from God that their whole work of religious reformation is unworthy of being read in a church? Has Protestantism no religious lesson, no inspiration, no word of God in its history? I find in my Bible the story of Elijah and the Priests of Baal; but I look in vain for any account of the conversion of the English; of St. Patrick, of St. Francis of Assisi, of Savonarola. I read of Abraham leaving Ur of the Chaldees. I read not one word of the Pilgrim Fathers! I read of Sodom and Gomorrah, but not one chapter upon the suppression of the slave trade, the fight for civil and religious freedom, the struggles of Christianity in conflict with vice, intemperance, and all the evil that Christians have fought against.

Surely, Christian history, if it be a forward and not a backward step, has lessons to teach? From the date of the close of the New Testament to the present day there is a gap in our Bible—a gap that is a condemnation of Christianity so long as it continues. Has Paul done everything, and Livingstone nothing? Let those who judge the Bible complete which omits God's work in the world for the last 1,700 years, defend themselves by the plea that Christianity has done nothing worth recording, and has produced no prophets capable of inspired writing. For, why else is there nothing to read?

Bolton.

WILFRED HARRIS.

SIR,—In reply to Mr. Hopps' question, I have to state that the chapel to which I referred in my previous letter was the Great Meeting, Leicester, and that the occasion was October 9, 1892; shortly after Mr. Hopps had left.

The second part of his letter needs no answer.

R. TRAVERS HERFORD.

[As this correspondence was to be closed, we sent on Mr. Herford's note to Mr. Hopps for any remark he might wish to make on it. But whoever has the last word will hardly satisfy the other.—ED. INQ.]

SIR,—Thank you for a sight of Mr. Herford's letter. I can only say that he has probably forgotten precisely what was said, and that, if he recited the words correctly, they convey a sense which is untrue. I do not wonder that he shrinks from the questions I put to him about reading aloud the Psalms, &c., straight on, without selection and without omissions.

J. PAGE HOPPS.

SIR,—It is one of the sheet anchors of our faith that "every scripture inspired of God is profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness."

We count Tennyson, and Martineau, and Emerson, and a host of others among the prophets of the living God. Why, therefore, read in our meeting houses no "lesson" later than the latest of the New Testament writings? Among many grateful recollections of the ministry in Leicester of the Rev. J. Page Hopps is his occasional use of a modern scripture. The selection requires the devout mind, and literary taste for discernment of the best, but this latter faculty, at any rate, should be secured by the elaborate education our ministers receive. Like a whiff of fragrance from hayfield and hedge, gladdening the air in a village church, may be this reminder that "God is not dead, that He should speak no more."

In all the ages to come is there to be no modification of the established practice? In this direction, as in some others, would that we people of "the freest of free churches" were consistent with our profession!

EDITH GITTINS.

Leicester, Feb. 24.

SIR,—The difficulty with regard to this, as it is of so many other matters with us, is that in our congregations we are not all of one mind. I do not regret this fact, but it sometimes constitutes a difficulty, and what one individual would think to be an improvement, to a score of others would probably be anything but that. We all agree, I suppose, with Mr. Hopps, that we want our readings to be sweet and clean and edifying, and I for one, should simply leap over the "deep ditches" he mentions, which strike me as being but "shallow puddles" compared with some he has pointed out in other places. While, as a rule, reading both lessons from the Bible, I have never yet met with difficulty or trouble when occasionally I have thought a reading from some other source would best suit the purpose in view in the whole service. Surely lessons, hymns, prayers, and sermon should express a unity in purpose and aim. We have need of readings that are edifying and religious, and generally speaking they are to be found in the best religious literature of the world, i.e., in the Bible. I agree with Mr. Herford that—again speaking generally because a hard and fast rule does not seem desirable on either side—the better place for selections from other literature is the sermon.

PROVINCIAL LETTER: LIVERPOOL.

SIR,—Can you spare a line for me to rectify an unwitting omission in my Liverpool letter. Warrington is half-way between us and Manchester, and belongs to both districts, so should have been named as a mark of our interest and goodwill.

While nothing very new is afoot there, the grand old Sunday-school still teems with life, and is noteworthy for its elder scholars. The chapel services have been well attended, and at the annual meeting held recently financial improvement was recorded, an adverse balance having been wiped off, and something left to the good. This is all cheering. The associations of Cairo-street Chapel with old worthies give it an almost national interest, and its well-being is worth recording.

H. W. HAWKES.

THE SIN OF SEGREGATION.

SIR,—May I be allowed to try to remove what appears to be a serious misapprehension in your Liverpool letter of the 10th inst., and that one, coupled with what I venture to characterise as one of the curious and truly mischievous sophistries by which "we" and "our" are constantly being used distinctly on behalf of a particular, and to that extent, a sectarian so-called church, and contracted within its specific Unitarian denominationalism. This is a very different thing from using "we" and "our" simply and really as symbols of universal brotherhood. The Father was not addressed by Jesus with any narrow reference to His own company.

This is the sophistication of which I complain—namely, the use of "we" and "our" as defining a Unitarian denominationalism, and then pretending to imply thereby quite another universal comprehension.

This common, and too pretentious, and too imposing usage seems to me to be neither more nor less than just the old ecclesiastical sin of self-satisfied doctrinal segregation.

It is the same as that which marks off the arrogance of Roman Catholicity, of the pretensions of the so-called Church of England, and of other more or less regularised bodies which seek to establish themselves as what are called Visible Churches—which are never like Paul's Church of God at Corinth—"those who are sanctified in Christ Jesus," being always more or less servants of their separate images of God, made by themselves and set up in temples made by their own hands.

The Liverpool letter seems to me (full as it is of warm-hearted brotherly interest) by no means speaking in Paul's sense "to all that in every place call on the name of Christ our Lord," but ostentatiously on behalf of "we" and "our," namely, the self-styled freest Churches, in a certain distinction from other rival churches, equally sincere, and equally aspiring in extension.

It is impossible to doubt the energy and genuine interest which your correspondent characterises and is proud to report; but, while I must absolutely disclaim any personal reference to any man or men who so willingly spend themselves in brotherly service, I must say that all this sort of self-gratulating talk always seems to me a mode of writing like the speech of one of the two men who went up into the Temple to pray.

I can only go out and pray for mercy to me, a sinner, as I know too well.

THE PENWORTHAM BURIAL SCANDAL.

SIR,—I ask your permission to lay before the Unitarian ministers and laity a matter of grave importance.

It will be remembered that a few weeks ago one of the trustees of my congregation died, and it was arranged to deposit his remains in the family grave in the Penwortham churchyard. The curate agreed to take the service in the church, and I was to take it at the grave side. This had been done in the case of the father and sister of the deceased, both Unitarians.

On the day of the funeral the curate failed to attend, and I took the two services. The curate has given various reasons for his action, amongst which are the following:—"It was not a Christian burial"; "I am ordered only to conduct Christian burials"; "it was a matter of grace"—the use of the church; for him to take part was "contrary to the law of the Church"; "the interment of a Unitarian in consecrated ground is contrary to Church law"; "I could take no part in the service, as I believed Unitarians were not baptized into the name of the Holy Trinity, and we are forbidden to read the burial service over the unbaptized."

I forwarded a full statement of the case to the Home Secretary and the Bishop of Manchester, together with questions framed on the curate's explanations.

The Bishop informs me that he had written the curate "to point out that he should have informed you of his change of mind." He then adds "that in my judgment the Burial Act, 1880, does not contemplate or provide for burial services taken partly by the clergyman and partly by a minister or other person chosen by the relatives of the deceased; and that such a service is not regular or legal." He apparently agrees with the curate's theological objections.

The Home Secretary replies "that he regrets that he has no authority to determine any of the questions raised in your letter."

If the law enables a curate to outrage common decency in this way; if his narrow views pass unrebuked by his Bishop; if Unitarians are outside of "Anglican Christian" burial when they desire one of their own ministers to utter a few words at the open grave, but can be buried with stately ritual, as I have witnessed, when an Anglican takes the whole of the ceremony; if the Home Secretary cannot pass an opinion on the statement that the burial of Unitarians in consecrated ground is contrary to Church law, it is surely time that Unitarians realised these facts and acted as their forefathers would have acted.

I venture to suggest that a question of this character merits the earnest attention of those in whose hands the protection of our rights is supposed to rest, and whose duty it is to lead in a struggle against ecclesiastical privilege until such a scene as that at Penwortham becomes an absolute impossibility.

THE GENEVA INTERNATIONAL.

THE volume of the Proceedings of the third meeting of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers held at Geneva last August, is now published.*

It is a large octavo volume of nearly 400 pages, edited by Professor Edouard Montet, Dean of the Theological Faculty of Geneva University, who from the first most generously devoted himself to the interests of the Congress, and acted as its president. He is to be congratulated on the completion of his labours in the issue of this volume, which contains all the papers read at Geneva (except Professor Pfeiderer's), and a full record of the proceedings.

The volume is due to all the members who paid the full subscription, and copies for the English members have been sent to Essex Hall for distribution. As soon as the consignment arrives, members will receive their copies post free. In Geneva the book is sold at 7 fr. 50 c., but the B. and F.U.A. having ordered copies while it was passing through the press are able to offer it to purchasers at Essex Hall for 2s. 6d. net, or by post 3s., merely covering the cost of printing and carriage. The number of these copies is limited, and orders should be sent in at once.

Two disappointments we meet with in turning over these pages, one of which is noted above. Instead of Professor Pfeiderer's paper on the "Sources of the Christian Doctrine of Redemption," we find simply the theses, which were furnished to the audience at the time of delivery. The paper itself is perhaps reserved for inclusion in some larger work. Nor do we find the eloquent sermon preached on the second morning in the Cathedral by Professor Furrer, of Zurich. The text was, "Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty," but we have to be content with a brief synopsis of the sermon. On the other hand, we find an extra grace in the inclusion of two other sermons not belonging strictly to the proceedings of the Congress—the English sermon, preached by the Rev. Joseph Wood in the Chapel of the Maccabees, on the previous Sunday evening, and the French sermon by the Rev. Charles Wagner, preached in the Cathedral on the following Sunday. Of this our readers had an English translation in the INQUIRER of Dec. 30, and also of the Rev. J. E. Roberty's sermon at the opening of the Congress on "Anathema and Faith" in the INQUIRER of Nov. 25.

Of the thirty addresses, sermons, and papers here included, ten are in English (India and Hungary availing themselves of the hospitality of our language), four in German (Pfeiderer and Furrer only in abstract), and the other sixteen in French, to which must be added the six speeches at the final banquet. In the appendix, in addition to the theses and resumé of papers in various languages, we find a French translation of the general secretary's report and of Dr.

* Actes du III^eme Congrès International du Christianisme Libéral et Progressif, Genève, 1905. Publiés par les soins du Professeur Edouard Montet, Président du Congrès. Genève: Georg & Cie, Libraires-Éditeurs. Libraires de l'Université. 1906.

Savage's sermon, and an English translation of the two presidential Addresses. Thus those who were present at Geneva have the opportunity of studying at leisure all the good things provided for them there, while those who were not so fortunate can now share the ample feast.

The record opens with the programme and list of members grouped under their respective countries. The list, however, includes a few names of those who were not present, but sent in their adhesion. Thus in the German list we find Professor Harnack, Dr. Max Fischer, and Herr Direktor Schrader, none of whom were at Geneva. ("Frau Dr. Schrader" is a mistake altogether, for she has been dead for some years.) In the list of American delegates also Professor Peabody's name is down, but he was not there. The final reckoning of those present gives a total of 568, of whom 237 were English, 36 American, 10 Hungarian, 9 Belgian, 9 German, 42 Dutch, 76 French, and 139 Swiss; the other ten from Austria, Italy (4), Russia, Morocco, India (2), and Japan. From Denmark friends in Copenhagen sent a message of greeting. From Australia also the Rev. Charles Strong, D.D., of Melbourne, sent a letter regretting that it was impossible for him to come, and wishing the Congress all success, and asking for help to encourage the cause of a really liberal and universal religion in Australia, and to bring about the reunion of Protestant Christendom.

"I believe," he wrote, "in 'the Holy Catholic Church,' and long to see a spiritual church swallowing up meaningless divisions, and uniting our young Australians in broad spiritual and practical aims. Can you send us missionaries of 'the Larger Faith,' to preach us the Gospel of Love, Social Progress, Everlasting Hope? We want the old evangel interpreted in the language of Australia and the present. Cannot you issue regular 'pastorals' to the ministers and members of all the liberal churches? A congress is very good, but we want association, and the personal touch. Excuse my great boldness in this writing. But the liberal flock throughout the world are 'as sheep without a shepherd,' and there is no symbol of catholic unity to fire their imagination, and round which they may gather."

This letter arrived only after the meetings were over, but it is added in a note to Professor Montet's account of the proceedings. That account includes the replies to the telegrams of congratulation sent to the Mikado, the Tsar, and President Roosevelt on the conclusion of the Peace of Portsmouth, and also all the resolutions passed at the business meeting. We looked with special interest to see how the discussion of Professor Albert Réville's resolution on a proposed declaration of faith was recorded. It was made clear, in face of earnest objections from several English delegates and Professor Pfeiderer, that what was intended was a declaration not of dogma but of principles. Our report at the time was that the whole matter was left in the hands of the general committee for consideration and report to the next meeting of the Council, and we find Professor Réville's proposition thus recorded in the volume: "Le Congrès invite son Bureau à réunir, en vue du prochain Congrès, les éléments d'une déclaration de principes." This was adopted. At Boston, in September, 1907, we shall, no doubt, hear of the result.

That this volume is full of matter of great interest our readers do not need to be assured. We are particularly glad to have M. Loyson's eloquent address on "Jesus of Nazareth and Monotheism," the paper by the Rabbi Lévy, of Dijon, and the speeches at the concluding banquet, all in French, for quiet reading, for no report which we saw at the time did justice to these. How great and widespread was the interest taken in the Geneva meetings Professor Montet records at the end of his preface, noting that as many as 400 reports in journals and reviews of various lands had reached him. We trust that an equally widespread interest will welcome this complete record of the proceedings.

THE LATE MRS. JAMES WORTHINGTON.

A LARGE number of friends of the late Mrs. James Worthington, of Sale, met on Saturday last at Hale Chapel to join in a service of commemoration and to witness the unveiling of a memorial window.

The service began with the hymn, "O God, our help in ages past," after which the Rev. A. Leslie Smith read passages of Scripture. The Rev. J. Edwin Odgers offered prayer and gave a commemoration address. Mr. R. D. Darbishire also spoke, and afterwards unveiled the window. The service closed with hymn and prayer.

The window, which has been erected by Mr. Henry Worthington to the memory of his mother, was executed by Messrs. Morris & Co., of Merton Abbey, from the designs of Burne-Jones. It is a beautiful three-light window in subdued colouring, the central light being filled with the well-known figure of Charity, holding two children in her arms and with other children clinging to her garments. One lovely bit of symbolism is introduced in the form of a dove which one of the children is nursing. The side lights are filled with conventional designs of angels with trumpets. The whole effect is in striking harmony with the charm and quiet beauty of the chapel, with its open timbered roof, its high back pews, the sounding board over pulpit, and other beautiful old-world features. It is a fitting place for such a memorial of one who loved to worship there.

THE Oxford University Press announces a small book by Professor S. R. Driver, "The Book of Job in the Revised Version," edited with introductions and brief annotations. The aim of this volume is to make the poem intelligible to the ordinary educated reader, and the editor maintains that, if care be taken to adopt the right marginal readings, the revised version gives correctly the general sense of the Book of Job.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

DID you read Luke xv. 11-24, last week? Of course you know the story quite well—the parable of the Prodigal Son. The young man had asked his father for his share of the property, and went away among strangers, and there wasted all that he had in selfish and evil pleasures. When it was all done, his false friends turned their backs upon him. He was alone and miserable in a strange land, and to add to his trouble there came a great famine, and he was in danger of starving. Then, in his misery, he saw how utterly foolish he had been, and what wrong he had done. He longed to be back in the old home, but he was bitterly ashamed of himself. If he went back he would have to tell his father he was not worthy to be called his son. But he would beg to be allowed to stay, and at least be in the house once more, and do something for his father, though it could be only in the place of a servant. So he went back, ready to make his confession. But before he could begin, while he stood at a distance, hesitating, perhaps, with hardly courage to go in, his father saw him, and, filled with pity and great gladness to see his son back again, ran to him, and kissed him very tenderly, and welcomed him home.

The request that he might be taken back as a servant was never made. He was still a son, and his father made them all rejoice that he was home again. He saw the marks of suffering, and the penitence and sorrow in his son's face, but what he most wanted him to feel was that the home love was still there, that they cared for him in spite of all that he had done, and would help him back into the true way.

Think what that would mean to the young man. He might indeed wish to hide himself for shame, but he was received back with that warm love and rejoicing. More than ever he would feel how unworthy he was, and the constant pain would still be there, in the thought of the wrong he had done; but with it a deep feeling of rest and safety and new hope. He was at home again, and with his father. With a love he had not known before and a passion of humble gratitude, he would determine now to be a true man. Bravely and patiently he would set himself to do his work and to bear whatever he had to bear, as a consequence of the wrong he had done. For that could not be altered. What he had wasted and spoilt could not be made good. The disgrace he had brought upon himself and upon his home remained, for even his father's loving forgiveness could not make that other than it was.

And yet there was a new world open to him now, a world in which love was greatest and strongest of all. Forgiven, and once more in the old home, he could look with courage and hope into the future, and with a deep and thankful gladness of heart. In time the old wounds would be healed. Love would help mightily in that, but most of all, it helped at once, and made him a new man in his father's house.

It is a parable in which Jesus teaches us all really to believe in the love of God, our heavenly Father.

A PLEA FOR MORE SCRIPTURE.

THE correspondence which originated in the leading article on "An Enlarged Lectionary," in THE INQUIRER of January 20, and is closed in our columns this week, has revealed a great diversity of opinion and of practice in the matter of Scripture lessons read in our public religious services. We have not been able to publish all the letters which we have received on this subject, but the correspondence fairly covers the ground, and one sees that there are serious reasons on both sides, with those who hold that the Bible must still retain its position as the only source from which Scripture lessons may be taken, and those who plead, on the ground of the perennial nature of religious inspiration, for a wider conception of the "Scripture" to be used for lessons. We shall not offer here any summary of the various arguments, though it might be interesting to point out how in the matter of the old Bible lessons one experience directly contradicts another. What we propose is simply to add a few more notes on the general subject.

One thing we are anxious to emphasise. A minister, in the matter of public worship, must always bear in mind that he has no right to claim exclusive control. In the pulpit, as preacher, the responsibility is his alone, but in the service of devotion, both as to its order and contents, there is a joint responsibility which he shares with the congregation. Any radical change, therefore, could only be rightly effected after full consideration, with a clear understanding that the congregation desired it no less than the minister. To adopt or abandon a liturgy, or to choose a new hymn-book, must involve such consideration and mutual consent; and so, we hold, should a complete change in the matter of lessons.

For our own part, if the principle were admitted by a congregation, that lessons should be taken from a wider range of religious literature than that of the Old and New Testaments, and they desired that it should take effect in their own services, we should prefer not to lay down any fixed rule such as that the first lesson should be from the Bible and the second from some other source; that would but perpetuate the formal distinction, which is no longer true to spiritual insight. We would rather have freedom to choose for each service what was most in keeping with its spirit and best fitted to express the truth and quicken the devotion to which it was desired to attain. Sometimes one, sometimes the other lesson might be from another source, and sometimes both from the Bible. So what is best and most inspiring in other religious literature would be set in its rightful place in equal companionship with the books of the Bible, and so also the supreme excellence of the Bible would, we believe, be more clearly brought out, not only from its age-long association with the devotional life of the Christian Church, and its unique position, as at the fountain head, the utterance of the first creative period of Christian history, but from the nobility and beauty of the pure English in which it is expressed.

Where other things are read there must undoubtedly be great care in the selection. "Thin, commonplace, poor in utterance, foreign to the spirit of devotion, with no kindling power, marking by the choice of it only the shallowness of the parson's mind and his utter lack of devout feeling and of poetic and spiritual insight! We should at least be saved from that if he would keep to the old Bible words!" Such are the comments one has heard on some extra-Biblical lessons read in church. And certainly one does not want for lessons in the service of devotion anything but the best, beautiful in utterance, touching upon the deep things of the spirit, with a simplicity that can be easily grasped, with a power that will hold attention and stir mind and heart alike. Familiarity and long sacred association now give much of the power to lessons from the Bible, especially, as we have been reminded, with the simple and unlearned. But there are surely lessons which have come out of the prophetic spirit of later centuries, and the purest heart of their devotion, which would have a like power to control, to kindle, to comfort, and uplift, which might long since have been made familiar, even to the unlearned, and so have been added to the common store of inspired "Scriptures" for the instruction of the people, and the enrichment of the devotions of the church,

One of our correspondents this week strongly enforces the plea that the great movements of Christian life in all these latter centuries must have produced things worthy of utterance, and that have been worthily uttered in such form that they might and ought to be used as "Scripture." Are there no pictures from the lives, for instance, of FRANCIS OF ASSISI, and DANTE, of MARTIN LUTHER, and other great reformers of such Englishmen as WILLIAM TYNDALE and JOHN MILTON, so presented in noble literature as to make "lessons" at least as fitting as much of the Old Testament history, and in closer touch with the needs and aspirations and affections of our own life? And are there not prophetic utterances of the spirit of English Puritanism and of the Pilgrim Fathers, of the great philanthropists, of the modern seers of God in Nature, the modern prophets of righteousness, of social aspiration, of national and international brotherhood, such as cannot be found in the ancient Scriptures, but which ought now to be found and made familiar to the people as Scripture, to make them feel through such lessons read in the hour of worship that God is in the midst of them as truly as He was with His people of old?

These questions we ask, not to clench an argument, but simply to stimulate inquiry and search for the passages in literature fitting both in form and substance to be used as "Scripture" of our own religious life.

ENGLAND'S DEBT OF HONOUR.

GEORGE FREDERICK WATTS.

(Born Feb. 21, 1817; died July 1, 1904.)

WHEN the traveller from the Continent first sees the English coast rise out of the sea in the morning mist, he has usually a very dim idea of the country which lies before him. He knows that England has succeeded in winning to herself half the globe, and when he comes to London he sees with wonder how all the threads of this world-empire are gathered together here. He sees Manchester or Birmingham, where, in the Black Country, amid steam and smoke and fog he watches these hives of industry turning out wealth, which will be shipped to the ends of the world. He sees Oxford with its architectural beauty, with its towers and spires, its quiet quadrangles and colleges. Perhaps he sees it in autumn when the creeper and the grey walls become flaming red and the soft October sun shines down on the weather-beaten colleges, that seem to rise out of their gardens like a dream of the centuries. He may go to the Lakes or to Scotland, or he will visit the abbeys and cathedrals, and then he will understand why this nation is proud. He will understand why England's poets have sung her praises. By her position and the nature of her people she was destined to become one of the foremost countries of the world. As no other were these people sent forth on to the seas—as no other have they learned to know men and the ways of men over all the earth, and for all that they have developed undisturbed a national character that is all their own. These national traits have produced many great men and works.

Yet in one sphere England is lacking. In the Fine Arts, especially in the art of painting, which has given such noble power of national expression to Germany, Holland, Italy, and Spain, she has seemed to lag behind. A want of which England's interest in literature, sport, politics, and other questions of practical importance, has made her almost unconscious.

With Turner died the last of the great English artists. English art became pedantic and academical. It only existed to satisfy popular demand. In it none of the great traits of the nation found expression, and the world forgot that English art existed at all. But at last there came one who felt the unworthiness of this position: one who was filled with the deep longing to found a great, strong national art, which, by means of the Fine Arts, and especially of painting, should give form and substance to the great ideas and ideals, and to the worth of beauty expressed in noble works.

"Nobleness, which is lacking in the English school, is in no sense lacking in the English character, it is therefore our duty to express it." It was George Frederick Watts who wrote these words, and it is of him that we now wish to speak.

No artist ever gave his whole genius and life to his country so entirely as Watts. From first to last his art was never an end in itself. He always worked for others—for the English nation, for humanity; and yet he never lost his artistic personality; he never made compromises. It was his nature to work for others, and his art was the means he chose whereby to help his fellow men: to comfort and strengthen them; to show them that the petty, vulgar, and ugly are only accidental and transient, whereas the great, good, and beautiful alone are aerial and permanent. His deep insight into the essence of things led him to realise the tragedy of our existence—Life and Death. And so Death becomes one of the two great problems of his art. His pictures of Death surpass Holbein's in their earnestness and depth. Their convincing weight and sublime solemnity place them on a level with the greatest revelations of art in any age. But his virile idealism could not rest here. What shall deliver us from Death? was for him the supreme question, and it was not in the bosom of a church, nor in the tenets of a philosophic school, nor in the renunciation of life that he found the answer. In the second great subject of his art, the central idea of his life's preaching and work lies the answer. It is Love, the world-embracing Love, which saves and redeems us. And so are Death and Love—love for one's neighbour, compassion, charity, work for others the chief thoughts of his art.

Though Watts' thoughts are for all times and all peoples, yet his art is thoroughly English. He preaches morality and fights vice. Before Watts, Hogarth had done the same, but what was raw and inartistic in Hogarth, Watts portrays in refined and lofty tones. Hogarth is like a Salvation Army orator; Watts like an aged patriarch, who in beautiful parables drawn out of the wealth of his own experience, advises or admonishes his people, though Watts strips his parables of all that is temporal that the lasting may be the more clearly seen. His figures are not of time, they are stern, harsh, almost pitiless; and as they pass by us their garments interwoven with the everlasting stars are stirred by the breath of the Eternal.

Watts' art is symbolic and fantastic as was William Blake's before him. But Blake seldom succeeded in portraying those tempestuous visions and pictures which his inner eye saw. He seems to stand helpless before the overpowering forces and shapes, which oppress his inmost self. Under his hands the warm, living forms of his imagination become cold and abstract. His means of expression are inadequate. The deepest and most inexplicable thoughts of his soul remained dumb; we can feel vaguely, though we cannot see that which lived in him. With Watts it is quite otherwise. During his long life he won, not without immense labour, the means of giving his genius expression. He studied and learned much from Phidias and Titian, but always without surrendering his own individuality.

Watts is a democrat. That is the third English trait which his life and art display. Art for Art's sake was foreign to his spirit, as impossible to him as a preacher without a congregation. In order to realise the ideal of his youth, and devote his art to those around him, he would not paint for the market, nor would he sell his pictures, lest they should be scattered. For when still a youth he had planned a Temple of Life and Death, a sanctuary of art, where he could represent by his works those eternal truths and great ideals which are above and beyond mere time and space. He did what he could to achieve this ideal. He could have become rich like Rossetti, but he gave his works to the nation; he could have become popular like the portrait-painter Millais, but he chose to paint the great among his contemporaries, and then handed over the pictures to the National Portrait Gallery. He was offered a baronetcy, but remained true to his democratic views and declined it. And how has the nation thanked him?

Watts offered to decorate Euston Station for nothing. He wished to introduce some form and colour and thought into our bare, work-a-day life. His offer was declined, although we generally find people are always ready to accept what costs them nothing. The portraits were graciously accepted (if the originals were long enough dead), and they were crammed into a small room at the National Portrait Gallery until they filled it from floor to ceiling, and the uppermost were almost out of sight. His splendid symbolic works have at last found a place in the Tate Gallery—and that is the end of a great artist's great dream.

Is his youthful ideal still to remain only a dream? Has it never occurred to an Englishman how unworthily the nation has rewarded this great man for his work? When the thousands who visit the Tate Gallery, passing from Rossetti to Burne-Jones, from Burne-Jones to Millais, and thence to Wilkie or Landseer with his large and small dogs, come to Watts with his solemn, majestic art, have their hearts not beat faster, and have they not felt that these works require an atmosphere for themselves, a separate abode? They demand a temple of art where every work will attain its true value, where the picture and its environment will form an harmonious whole. In such a resting place there would be no clashing of the pictures, with their various thoughts and feelings. Each would convey its message to us undisturbed, one in solemn tones of eternal law and justice, the other in whispers of the incomprehensible secrets of life and love, and of death, the great deliverer. Watts' works were not painted for the glare of exhibitions and galleries; his is "temple art" as is Richard Wagner's.

Wagner created the Bayreuth sanctuary for his masterpieces: an English Bayreuth of the Fine Arts, the fulfilment of Watts' dream of a Temple of Life and Death, is the debt of honour, which the English nation owes to his memory. Only in such a temple raised by the nation to the memory of the greatest, and of the most English, of their artists would the sublime works of Watts find their true national, educational, and artistic value. When the veteran Richard Wagner opened his theatre at Bayreuth in 1879 and handed over his life's work to the German nation, it was still doubtful whether all his toil had not been in vain. The building stood there, his masterpieces were completed, but the power to appreciate lay dormant and was slow in awakening. But Wagner believed at heart in the ultimate victory of his ideas and in the idealism of the nation. He handed over the house to them with the words: "Im Vertrauen auf den deutschen Geist" (Trusting in the Spirit of the German People).

Watts' whole activity was devoted to the English, and his work loses its significance if the whole nation does not accept it in the same spirit in which Watts offers it. His greatness does not depend on any single achievement, but on his whole work, and the ideas which run through them all like a mountain chain. The Tate Gallery and the National Portrait Gallery alone cannot show us the whole greatness of his art, its many-sidedness, its catholicity; this fact is responsible for much of the misunderstanding and false estimates of his art. In last year's winter exhibition at Burlington House many of his pictures showed sides of his character, both as man and as artist, which were new to the great majority—such works as "The Rider on the Pale Horse," "The Rider on the Red Horse," "The Rider on the White Horse," "Time and Oblivion," "Britomart," "Dawn," "Diana," "Endymion," "Good Luck to Your Fishing," and so on.

What remains then to be done?

The English nation ought not to allow Watts' works to remain scattered, but collect them into one building where they will have full justice done to them. This is no new idea. It has been done in Copenhagen with Thorwaldsen's works, in Nürnberg with Dürer's, and in Leipzig with Max Klinger's—and what these towns have done, England can do much more easily, as it possesses one hundred times the money. For a country in which one man can spend over £100,000 on a racing yacht, this can present no difficulty. The nation which prizes its pleasures more than its heroes is worthless.

Over the life-work of Watts stands clearly written for all to read who love him: "Trusting in the Spirit of the English People." May his trust be not in vain.

THE SUSTENTATION FUND.

THE annual general meeting of the contributors and friends of the Sustentation Fund for the Augmentation of Ministers' Stipends was held at Dr. Williams's Library, Gordon-square, London, on Wednesday, February 14; the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, president, in the chair. There were also present Revs. C. C. Coe and James Harwood, Messrs. E. J. Blake, John Dendy, Edgar Chatfield Clarke, Delta Evans, W. Byng Kenrick, William Long, David Martineau, Oswald Nettlefold, and A. W. Worthington.

Mr. A. W. WORTHINGTON, senior hon. secretary, read the report of the Board of Managers as follows:—

THE REPORT.

The managers are glad to report that the Fund still continues its beneficent work with satisfactory results, though a much larger income would be needed to make its grants adequate to the recognised needs of congregations and ministers. While endeavouring to meet the numerous appeals from congregations which stand in need of help, no opportunity is lost of urging them to meet the Fund's grants by increasing their own contributions to their ministers' stipends. The managers are glad to report that such appeals are rarely refused, and never unless inability to increase the congregational subscriptions is shown. Numerous letters of thanks of a very gratifying character have been received from the ministers and secretaries of congregations.

The accounts show a satisfactory condition of the funds for the year. The treasurer has been again successful in securing the repayment of income-tax to the amount of £43 4s. for the past year. The balance in hand would have been considerably reduced if the usual number of grants had been made; but six congregations, who have been usually aided by the Fund, were without ministers in June last, and the grants were thus reduced by at least £120 in amount. But such an economy is neither desirable nor likely, it may be hoped, to recur. A legacy of £50 from the late Mr. J. Cogan Conway has been reported to the treasurer, but does not become payable during the lifetime of his widow.

The appointment of a local treasurer for Ireland, though it has not yet led to any considerable additional contributions to the Fund from that country, has proved otherwise advantageous, as the managers at their meeting in July last received from Rev. Douglas Walmsley some interesting and useful notes with regard to the Irish congregations assisted by the Fund. At the Board meeting to-day, Mr. Walmsley asked to be relieved of his local treasurer-ship, owing to his leaving Belfast and Ireland. Mr. Walmsley also reported that suggestions had been made for the establishment of a Sustentation Fund for Ireland. Such a society is desirable for various reasons. It would relieve your Fund from a considerable expenditure in that country, towards which the local contributions are not large; while the conditions, needs, and prospects of the Irish congregations could be much more wisely and efficiently dealt with by a Board of Managers resident in the country.

Three of the Managers retire by rotation, and are nominated for re-election, but other vacancies on the Board have caused some anxiety as to the due provision of successors. The lamented death of Mr.

Charles Harding was reported at the last annual meeting, and the Board was authorised to fill his seat. They were fortunate in securing the services of Mr. W. Byng Kenrick, of Birmingham, who, as President of the Midland Christian Union, has much knowledge of the congregations in the Midland Counties. It will be remembered that Mr. J. Cogan Conway's sudden death occurred immediately before the last annual meeting, and the Board are glad to report that Mr. E. J. Blake, of Crewkerne, has consented to take his place. These appointments could be made by the Board for the remainder of the year only, and will have to be confirmed by the contributors at the annual meeting. Mr. Clephan's resignation caused a vacancy for the North Midland district, which there has been some delay in filling, but the officers have at last secured the consent of Mr. John C. Warren, of Nottingham, to be nominated for election. Mr. Warren is well acquainted with the congregations in the North Midland district.

The report of last year stated that representatives had been appointed to attend the Conference of Trustees of Funds in aid of ministers and students convened by the Committee of the Triennial National Conference, and that that Conference was adjourned that the representatives might obtain further instructions and authority as to the proposals submitted. Your former representatives (Messrs. Worsley and Clarke) were deputed to attend a second meeting of the conference, held in October last, when a sub-committee was appointed to prepare a preliminary scheme for a Consultation Board. Such a scheme has been prepared, and has been under the consideration of your managers this morning, who have adopted the following resolution:—“That in the opinion of the managers the proposed scheme includes objects which are not within the scope of the operations and powers of the Fund; but the managers would look with approval on the formation of a Consultation Committee to be constituted as proposed in the scheme for the purpose only of exchanging information, and suggesting such co-operation and co-ordination as may be possible, having regard to the limitations imposed by the constitution of the several Trusts and Funds; but the managers do not think they would be justified in applying their funds in defraying the expenses of such a committee.”

The managers cannot close their report without expressing their sorrow that the list of contributors has again been reduced by the deaths of several highly respected benefactors, viz., Mr. W. J. Crompton (Rivington), Mr. H. J. Morton (Scarborough), Mr. Holland, Mr. Hall, Mr. John Warren (London), and Mr. John Warren (Nottingham), some of whom were original contributors to the Fund. Mr. J. C. Warren, of Nottingham, has continued his father's subscription, an example which the managers would rejoice to see generally followed.

The Board sincerely congratulate the contributors on the good work which has been effected by the Fund at a very small annual expense, for now nearly a quarter of a century, during which a sum of almost £25,000 derived mainly from donations and bequests, has been invested, a subscription list of over £400 a year has been maintained, and grants been annually disbursed at an increasing rate till they exceed the sum of £1,300 in the current year.

MR. EDGAR CHATFIELD CLARKE, as treasurer, presented his statement of accounts. The balance of £163 16s. 3d. from 1904 was increased at the end of the year to £251 11s. 10d., but only as explained in the report, through a diminution, owing to vacant pulpits, in the number of grants. The year's income amounted to £1,405 7s. 1d., of which £855 5s. 9d. was from interest on investments. The grants amounted to £1,275. The investments stood at £24,494 4s. 3d., but the treasurer said that, if sold on the previous day they would have been worth £151 12s. 1d. more.

The report and accounts were adopted, on the motion of the president, seconded by Mr. John Dendy, and the further resolutions, as advertised in last week's INQUIRER, were passed. Messrs. E. J. Blake, W. Byng Kenrick, and J. C. Warren were elected, and Messrs. W. Long, D. Martineau, and F. Preston re-elected managers. The officers were re-elected, Mr. Worthington intimating that he should retire from the secretaryship at the close of the present year.

EAST CHESHIRE CHRISTIAN UNION.

THE annual meeting of the Union was held at Mossley on Saturday last. In the afternoon a religious service was held in the Free Christian Church, conducted by the Rev. G. A. Payne, of Knutsford. The sermon was preached by the Rev. B. C. Constable, of Stockport, the hon. secretary of the Union, based upon the text, "And Jesus went about all the cities and villages, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the Gospel of the kingdom." It was evident, he said, that Jesus was a missionary, and must have travelled many hundreds of miles during the period of his public ministry. He also sent out seventy disciples as missionaries, and when persecution scattered them abroad they continued to preach the Gospel in the very towns and villages to which they had been driven. The convert, Saul of Tarsus, also became the boldest and most energetic missionary the world has ever known. What was the secret of this missionary zeal? It was that Jesus and his disciples knew that they had something of incalculable value to make known, and being filled with enthusiasm for humanity, they desired that all the world should be sharers of the blessing. We meet to-day, said the preacher, under the auspices of a Union which is essentially a missionary association, its original name having been the East Cheshire Christian Mission, and its present name being the East Cheshire Christian Union for Missionary Purposes. Why did Jesus and his disciples labour as missionaries? It was not as though there was no religion already in existence, and no places of worship. The Jews had their own religion everywhere, and a synagogue in nearly every town and village. Why was Jesus not content with that? Why "upset" people with new teachings?

What need to go about and breed dissension and uproar? The reason was that he was overwhelmed with the conviction that he had a better Gospel to proclaim. He was also a believer in the royal supremacy of Truth, and its right to be proclaimed at all hazards. I hold, said the preacher, that we, as members of this Union, have a Gospel to proclaim no less precious, and for the best of all reasons, that it is the very Gospel which Jesus himself proclaimed. And, after all these years, it is still a new Gospel. It is a re-discovered Gospel—Gospel freed from the accretions of many centuries. It is like some of the glorious pictures of Turner lately rescued from the dust and grime of years. It has been hidden from men's view by the obscuring dogmas of the fall of man, original sin, total depravity, eternal torments, redemption by the shedding of blood, the Trinity, the deity of Christ, and Bible infallibility. Although many of those dogmas have begun to lose their hold, I am persuaded that we still have a tremendous work to do as a missionary Association in proclaiming the Gospel of Christ freed from these obscuring accretions. Thousands of people know nothing about it. There are thousands who only need to have that Gospel explained to them in order to become enthusiastic recipients of it. I speak from personal experience. When I was plunged in the agonies of doubt and despair, consequent upon the discovery that the things I, as a Congregationalist, had been taught from my youth to look upon as true and sacred, were being shaken to their very foundations, no one can realise, except those who have passed through a similar conflict, what a haven of refuge it was to find the Unitarian faith! I literally wept for joy! And scores of men have told me of similar experiences on coming to our Unitarian services. Converts are naturally often more enthusiastic for the faith than those who have been bred and born in it, for they can see better the contrast, and that was, no doubt, the case with the Apostle Paul. I am glad to belong to a missionary association, because I am a strong believer in the desirability of spreading the faith. I am glad to remember that four of our churches are the children of this Union; that three of them, Stalybridge, Glossop, and Denton, have grown to manhood's estate, and can now walk alone; that her youngest child at Ashton-under-Lyne is about to build a new home, and that her adopted child at Crewe is growing strong and healthy. I do not forget that we have always a double work to do—not only to spread the faith, but also to diligently feed the members of our regular congregations with the bread of life Sunday by Sunday. But that is quite compatible with spreading the faith. Both are equally necessary. The omission of either would be fatal. I trust that we shall all go back to our several spheres of labour filled with the missionary spirit, realising the inestimable value of the Gospel we have to proclaim, and determined to do our very utmost to make the glad tidings known.

"We are living, we are dwelling, in a grand and awful time,

In ages on ages telling, to be living is sublime.

O, let all the soul within you for the Truth's sake go abroad;

Strike! let every nerve and sinew tell on ages—tell for God!"

At the business meeting which immediately followed the service, presided over by the Rev. J. E. Stead, of Mossley, the annual report and treasurer's accounts were received and adopted.

The report was of a most encouraging nature. It showed that £2,578 19s. had been cleared by the Union's grand bazaar, of which sum one half had been invested for the benefit of the Union; that the Union's debt of £168 had been cleared off; that the Ashton congregation had received nearly £1,000 towards its new church, and that Denton had received £100, Glossop £30, Buxton £25, Mottram £10, Congleton £10. It referred to the Denton congregation becoming independent of the Union's financial aid, to Mottram's project of building a parsonage, to Ashton's new church in course of building, and to the great revival of work at Crewe, where the chapel had been closed for twelve months, but where there was now vigorous life and activity. The ministers of the aided churches at Ashton, Congleton, Denton, and Mottram each contributed an encouraging report of the work being carried on; and altogether the outlook of the Union seemed to be the brightest it had known for many years.

Mr. E. B. Broadrick, of Dukinfield, was elected president of the Union, Mr. Walter Hudson was re-elected treasurer, and the Rev. B. C. Constable, of Stockport, was re-elected hon. secretary. Vote of thanks were passed to the committee and officers and also to the preacher for the day.

In the evening a public meeting was held in the chapel, presided over by Mr. John Gledhill, of Mossley, and addresses were delivered by the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, representative from the Liverpool District Missionary Association; the Rev. Neander Anderton, representative from the Manchester District Unitarian Association; and the Revs. W. G. Price, of Stalybridge, and J. E. Stead, of Mossley.

Rev. J. C. ODGERS, after paying a tribute of respect to the memory of the late Rev. T. R. Elliott, until recently minister for many years of the Mossley congregation, said he was present there that day in three capacities, viz., as a former member of that Union, as president of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, and as a representative of the Liverpool District Missionary Association. He congratulated all present on the happy and prosperous condition of their churches as set forth in the printed report of the last year's work—the best report of that Union he had seen for a long time, and one which would inspire them with fresh enthusiasm and energy in all their efforts. He called attention to the excellent work that was being done at Crewe by Rev. H. Fisher Short, and at Mottram by Rev. Bodel Smith; he congratulated Denton on having reached an independent existence, and Ashton-under-Lyne on the prospect of soon having a permanent church of its own. The series of Cottage Services at Congleton, conducted by Rev. G. H. Smith, was a feature of most happy augury; the aim held in view was the building up of the devotional life of all who took part in them. Passing to the difficulties which always obstructed their missionary efforts, Mr. Odgers spoke of the gross ignorance still existing in the popular mind concerning their liberal views of religion, and the inveterate prejudices which they had to overcome, such as (1) the belief that their position was purely destructive and negative; (2) that they were coldly intellectual, and could never touch the heart or know the emotion of true worship; (3) that their creed was entirely unscriptural and anti-Christian; (4) that though they were a morally inoffensive people, they were essentially unspiritual in mind, thought, and language; (5) that if they were possessors of more enlightened truths, these were now the inheritance of all churches, and their particular missionary efforts were no longer needed. These prejudices showed them where their weakness as well as their strength lay. They had been entrusted with a certain divine light, which they were not at liberty to hide under a bushel.

About 212 were present at the service, 200 at tea, 245 at the evening meeting, and the general feeling seemed to be that the meetings had been helpful and encouraging. It ought to be noted that the neighbouring churches of Ashton, Mottram, Stalybridge, and Mossley are engaged in a united mission, and that last week-end being the time for Mossley to be the centre of the mission, that fact, no doubt, helped to increase the attendance.

BIRMINGHAM: HURST STREET DOMESTIC MISSION.

THE annual meeting of the subscribers and friends of this mission was held on Monday last under the chairmanship of the Lord Mayor, who is president of the mission. In spite of the very inclement weather the attendance was very large, the chapel being well filled. The report of the committee was read by the secretary, Mr. E. Ellis Townley, who also read the statement of accounts, owing to the absence of the treasurer from illness. It stated that the income from subscriptions had been decreased owing to deaths and other causes by a sum of £34 13s. 6d., that the total income had been £1,003 12s. 3d., and the expenditure £859 19s. 6d., and that the year commenced with a balance on the wrong side of £422 6s. 7d., which had been reduced to £278 7s. 10d. The committee, in their report, expressed their sincere appreciation of the devoted energy and self-sacrifice of Mr. W. J. Clarke in his conduct of the mission work, and their hope that he might long continue in health and strength the labours to which he had given his life.

The report read by the missionary, Mr. W. J. Clarke, was of an exceedingly voluminous character, particulars being given of the work accomplished by each of the 39 agencies (religious, social, educational, and philanthropic) connected with the mission. It stated that in the number of friends and workers connected with it, the activity of its various agencies, and the spirit of kindly fellowship and devotion to high ideals pervading it throughout, the mission was never stronger, never more prosperous in the best and worthiest sense than at the present time. With respect to the directly religious work, which Mr. Clarke affirmed that he regarded as the most important of all, the report stated that three services had been held every Sunday (morning, afternoon, and evening), the aggregate average attendance being about 800. The following is a brief summary of the leading features of the report:—

Thirty-nine agencies, all separately organised, having their own officers and committees, and doing their own work on their own lines, have been in active operation during the year as follows:—

Religious services, chapel and Sunday-school choirs, Sunday-schools, classes for Biblical study, vocal music and dress-making, recreation room, cricket club, pierrot troupe, gymnasium, social gatherings, dramatic society, magazine circulation, flower distribution, mothers' meetings, advice bureau, guild of sympathy, aged people's and poor children's summer and winter parties, rambling and cycling club, window gardening association, holiday home, sick, saving, and benevolent clubs numbering 14. These agencies have by their own efforts during the year raised nearly £700 for their own special purposes.

Upwards of 11,000 visits have been paid to and received from the poor, 3,587 medical notes, 170 parcels of clothing, and 126 miscellaneous gifts of various kinds have been received, and together with £1,220 contributed in response to personal or written appeals from the missionary, distributed on absolutely unsectarian lines in connection with the philanthropic department of the mission work. Although the Police Aided Association for Clothing Destitute Children, the Military Veterans' Association, the Court and Alley Concer's' Association, and the Walliker Society are independent associations, the administrative work of all four is mainly done by the mission staff; and by their instrumentality during the year 2,625 poor children received among them 2,445 pairs of boots, and 9,473 garments! Eight pensions were obtained for local military veterans, and £350 disbursed in relief among the neediest of them, and a considerable number of in and out-door social gatherings provided for them; 40 garden parties for poor old people have been organised, attended by 1,924 aged guests; and 28 open-air concerts, attended by upwards of 20,000 delighted and well-behaved listeners, have been held in some of the poorest, the most squalid and seemingly hopeless districts in the whole city, the aggregate income of the four associations amounting to about £1,350. From this brief and necessarily rough and imperfect summary it will be seen that the amount raised, directly or indirectly, for carrying on the various mission activities was £4,270. Received in response to missionary's applications for relief and other purposes, £1,220; received from annual subscribers and other sources by mission treasurer, £1,000; raised by mission workers for their own purposes, £700; raised by P.A.A., Veterans', Walliker and Court Concert Associations, £1,350; total, £4,270.

The report concluded thus:—

"And now I wish to make a brief reference to one consideration, with respect to which, the longer I live the stronger my convictions become. I wish to state my belief that, as things are, in our efforts to grapple with the terrible social problems which confront us at every turn, we are at the best simply administering palliatives, not applying remedies. And I believe this must continue to be the case until the national conscience is more fully aroused, as it very soon would be if only the majority of the people could be made to realise the positively appalling conditions under which so many of the submerged tenth drag on existence, not from choice, but from necessity, in all our great centres of population. I am not one of those who think we should look entirely to statesmen and legislation for the coming of God's kingdom on earth. For all that, labour as we may for the greater material comfort, the higher spiritual welfare of the poor, our efforts can never yield the blessed, the permanent results they should until, not only our legislators, but our churches, come to regard the questions which affect the lives and the lot of the poorest of the poor as among the most sacred and binding of the obligations which their trusts and their professions impose upon them.

"And nothing can shake my belief that many of the great questions involved, such as the housing of the poor, old age pensions, righteous temperance legislation, workhouse classification, &c., nothing can shake my conviction that these and similar burning questions, dealt with on broad, humane, and Christian lines, would do more than words can describe, not merely to promote cleanliness and comfort, but even virtue and religion in those dark corners of the land, those dens of vice and want, of dirt and infamy, the existence of which, in the nation which claims to be the greatest in the world, should fill the soul of every man who loves his country, or who claims for himself the name of Christian, with burning indignation and shame. Meanwhile, however, and while striving in all legitimate ways to foster the growth of that public opinion which may induce the State and the churches as such to deal with these questions, our individual duty plainly enough is to resolve, somewhat may, that the personal contribution we may be able to make, however trifling it may be, towards the solution of this awful problem shall not be wanting; remembering that there are three things the very humblest of us can always do, and for the doing of which I believe God Himself holds us responsible.

"(1) We can strive to come into contact with human life at every point where friendly counsel, kindly fellowship, and practical help may be needed.

"(2) In doing this, and in alleviating immediate privations and necessities sympathetically and ungrudgingly, as far as our means will allow, we can endeavour at the same time to reach the higher springs of character, and so cause those helped to realise the need and the duty of relying upon their own honest industry rather than upon the compassionate goodwill of others.

"(3) And, above all, we can take care that in whatever we may do, or attempt to do, or may think it right to decline doing, in these directions, we will strive always to act in the spirit breathed in the precepts, and set forth in the example of Him who declared that 'Visiting the sick, feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, was not only a blessing bestowed upon them, but a service rendered unto Him.'"

In moving the adoption of the reports the Lord Mayor spoke very highly of the work which was being carried on at the mission; and stated that he knew of no other institution in Birmingham having so many and such comprehensive and far-reaching ramifications. He thought that not only those immediately associated with the mission, but the city at large owed to it a deep debt of obligation. The proceedings throughout were of the most encouraging character.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

THE MIDLANDS.

WHEN I wrote to you two years ago my letter was mostly about Dr. Priestley, whose death had taken place exactly 100 years before. I also spoke of the problem our Midland churches had set themselves to solve of how to raise £5,000. Your readers have since been told that the larger portion of this sum had been obtained from donations and the Bazaar, and they will now be gratified to hear that the whole of the £5,000 and a little more has been secured. It seemed an impossible task when first proposed by the Rev. Joseph Wood in the admirable address he gave at the annual meeting of the Midland Christian Union nearly three years ago. As he then said: "What we want is not the means but the disposition. What we want is the enthusiasm, the passion of our cause." What we wanted has been found. Both "disposition" and "enthusiasm" have worked well together, and have ended in complete success, and I heartily congratulate the officers and committee and all those concerned in bringing it about. In round figures the Bazaar produced £1,068, the net result of the labours of the many, while the donations (including about £42 for interest) yielded the balance, viz., £3,950, being the gifts of the few—about 100 persons in all, making a total of £5,018. The committee held a meeting last week and approved a report giving an account of their proceedings, which will be presented at the annual meeting of the Union in March, and printed in their annual Report.

A striking reference was made to our success by the Rev. L. P. Jacks, a former president of the Union, in his sermon preached in the pulpit he used to occupy in the Church of the Messiah on March 13 of last year on the occasion of the annual meeting of the Midland Christian Union. "Here in Birmingham," he said, "you have recently proved something of what resolution can do. You have carried out a great scheme for the strengthening of your churches; you have raised a large sum of money; and you have done so in the teeth of very formidable difficulties. I was one of those who emphasised those difficulties. I thought they would prove insuperable; but I reckoned without counting the force of your determination—a mistake very commonly made. Now what we want is more of the spirit which carried you through that enterprise. Our laymen want it; our ministers want it; our churches want it; our colleges want it. Not schemes for the building of churches and the raising of money, though these have their claims; not forward movements, unless we have something noble to forward; not ostentatious propaganda; not self-advertisement of all things; but just that spirit of steady resolve; that pertinacious knocking at the gates which you have just displayed, and to which nothing can ultimately be denied. Pious wishes, laudable desires, lofty ideals will no longer serve the end for which our churches exist. Let us have less wishing and more willing, and then things will begin to move."

This is high praise, and should be highly valued by our friends in the Midlands, more especially as it comes from one who worked for us and laboured with us, and is fully alive to the difficulties we have had to contend with. Your readers will remember that the Yorkshire Unitarian Union raised a sum of £4,000 shortly before we held our Bazaar. An active member of that Union writing to me last autumn congratulated us on our success in this district. "I do not know," he said, "whether it is most difficult to raise these sums or to expend them satisfactorily. We are endeavouring to spend our £4,000 usefully, but I have fears at times that there will not remain much permanently to show for our labours. We expect to get through ours in five years."

I need not decide the question raised by my correspondent. The money we asked for has been raised, and it remains now to spend it, indeed, some of it has already been spent. Whether or not it will do permanent good depends upon the individual churches and the "spirit of steady resolve," which should animate the individuals of which those churches are composed.

Quoting once more from Mr. Jack's eloquent sermon, he said: "Purpose is the great wonder-worker of human life, whereby the things that are not become the things that are. . . . There is one purpose and one only, which can properly form the purpose of a church—that is, to manifest the love of God, and to make the light of it shine amid the darkness that comprehendeth it not. For this end were all churches born, and for this came they into the world. No doubt the difficulties are enormous. The material conditions, the intellectual conditions of our time bristle with difficulties for him who preaches the gospel of God's love. But it is not the difficulties that are hindering us; it is our want of determination to meet the difficulties. Give us a hundred wrestlers with God, and ere the light of another day has dawned, they will force every one of the difficulties to yield them a blessing. Trust to the alchemy of purpose to deal with the difficulties, and trust to nothing else!"

During the last two years there have been numerous changes in the ministry of our Midland congregations. The Rev. J. E. Stronge has come from London to Kidderminster, to succeed the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans; the Rev. G. L. Phelps has come from Devonport to Evesham, to succeed the Rev. Rulph Davis; the Rev. W. G. Topping has come to Oldbury, to succeed the late Rev. Henry McKean; and the Rev. William C. Hall has come from Ashton to Small Heath, in succession to the Rev. T. A. Gorton; and we have a fresh acquisition to Birmingham in the Rev. C. M. Wright, who is assisting the Rev. Joseph Wood at the Old Meeting Church. The pulpits at Walsall and Whitchurch are vacant, and Stourbridge and Wolverhampton will be vacant very shortly. From Stourbridge the Rev. A. Hermann Thomas will go to Leicester, and from Wolverhampton the Rev. J. B. Higham will go to Park Lane, near Wigan. So there is work to be done to fill the pulpits left vacant.

The church at Newhall Hill has been showing renewed life and energy under the leadership of the Rev. T. Paxton since he came there in 1904, so that the fears which were at one time entertained that the church would have to be closed are now happily dispelled. Work at the domestic missions continues with unabated energy. In July of last year Mr. W. J. Clarke completed 20 years of mission work at Hurst Street, and the occasion was marked by special services on Sunday, July 16, which were largely attended. I was present in the evening, and was much impressed with the whole service, and the very appropriate and touching address delivered by Mr. Clarke.

The problem that now presents itself to the committee of the Midland Christian Union as representing our congregations in this district is how to spend the money we have raised to the best advantage, and this is a problem of no small difficulty. Ruskin says: "To lose money ill is indeed often a crime; but to get it ill is a worse one, and to spend it ill, worst of all." How are those congregations who are working under difficulties to surmount them? Are new congregations to be started in populous places, and older ones which seem to be in a helpless condition to be left to their fate, or are both to be helped?

What are the secrets of success in religious organisations? Not necessarily fine buildings. I know some that are only partly filled. Not money alone, though little or nothing can be done without it. I know churches with plenty of money which still do not flourish like some poor ones. A good deal, I think, depends upon the minister. A good general makes a difference in an army. A good conductor makes a difference in an orchestra. But not the minister, nor the general, nor the conductor can succeed to the full if the material he has to deal with is not of the right sort. And the right sort are the "100 noble wrestlers with God." If difficulties are to be overcome, we must be fired with the "spirit of steady resolve." In Mr. Jack's inspiring words already quoted—"What we want. . . is that pertinacious knocking at the gates which you have just displayed, and to which nothing can ultimately be denied." There is still truth in the old proverb, "Where there's a will there's a way," or as one of our poets quaintly expresses it:—
"In idle wishes fools supinely stay,
Be there a will, and Wisdom finds a way."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Ansdel.—The first annual congregational meeting of the Unitarian Free Church was held at Lytham on Tuesday evening, February 13. The treasurer's report showed a balance in hand of over £5. The first three months of the year the expenses were borne by Mr. Cuthbert Grundy, so that the accounts were for three parts of the year only. During the whole time the interest has been well maintained, the attendances averaging over fifty at each service. Besides providing for current charges, the congregation have raised money to purchase chairs and other furniture, as well as a first-class organ. The Ladies' Society has shown great activity in raising, by means of whist-drives and parties, during the present winter, somewhere between £40 and £50, and they are at present working for a bazaar or sale of work which is to be held probably at Easter, in aid of funds for a new church. This is a necessity, as the temporary premises are only available until Easter, and so advantage has been taken of an opportunity to secure at a low chief rent a site in a very good position midway between St. Annes and Lytham. A brick or stone building has to be erected in course of about five years (as a condition of lease) and the entire scheme is expected to cost about £2,000. Meanwhile an iron church is in course of construction, and should be ready by the end of March. As an indication of vitality, it transpired from the reports that during the year, for special objects, the congregation had raised about £300. The members are eager and willing to work, but they can only hope to succeed with the help of friends, and as the movement has been started in the interests of Unitarians generally, it is earnestly hoped that they also will take up the cause. The district to be served is a growing one, and the nearest church is five miles away.

Atherton.—The District Guilds Union, comprising Atherton, Astley, Leigh, and Swinton Guilds, met in Chowbent Chapel and Schools on Saturday afternoon and evening, when the attendance was very good. Service was held at 3 o'clock, the preacher being the Rev. T. Bowen Evans, of Heywood. After tea the President, the Rev. J. J. Wright, took the chair, and a paper on "The Attaching of our Young People to the Congregation" was read by the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, of Bury. Miss Redfern (of Leigh), in an able and practical speech, opened the discussion, which was continued by Mr. E. Darlington (of Leigh), Mr. J. L. Davies (of Chowbent), Mr. T. Glover (of Chowbent), Mrs. Butterworth (of Chowbent), Messrs. W. Redfern and J. Ridyard (of Leigh), Mr. R. Robinson (of Swinton), and Mr. J. Barrow (of Hindley). The discussion, followed intently by a large audience, having occupied an hour and an half, was summed up by Mr. Wright.

Cardiff.—The annual meeting of the West Grove congregation was held on February 12 in the schoolroom, presided over by Mr. G. Carslake Thompson, there being about forty members present. The officers and committee were elected, Mr. Carslake Thompson being re-elected president. The Rev. W. Whitaker, in giving some useful suggestions for the working of the church, referred to the faithful services of Mr. W. A. Moore (who is now retiring through ill-health) as secretary. Mr. Moore's services are still to be retained on the committee.

Gateshead.—The congregation of Unity Church has suffered a severe loss through the death of Mr. Samuel Hulse at the early age of forty-four years. Since its commencement in 1898 he acted as secretary, a position which he relinquished quite recently, owing to the serious condition of his health. Prior to the establishment, largely through the efforts of the late Rev. Arthur Harvie, of the church at Gateshead, Mr. Hulse served with great acceptance as a lay preacher, and for several years was plan secretary, an office which made him well known and very highly respected by all the congregations on the roll of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association. Originally he was an active member in the Primitive Methodist Church, serving that body also as one of their lay preachers. He took a great interest in the local Peace and Arbitration Association, and in various other humanitarian movements.

Glasgow: St. Vincent-street.—On Monday evening the Rev. Dr. John Hunter, of Trinity Church, Glasgow, delivered a lecture in the church on "Frederick Denison Maurice," which was very much appreciated. The Rev. J. Forrest presided, and moved a very cordial vote of thanks at the close.

Glossop.—A very successful two days' bazaar was held on Thursday and Saturday, February 15 and 17, in connection with the Fitzalan-street Unitarian Church, notwithstanding that several similar events have been held in the town during the winter. The sum of £350 was realised, which is very satisfactory, and must be a source of satisfaction to the retiring minister, the Rev. A. C. Fox, during whose ministry, extending a little over seven years, the sum of £1,400 has been raised to clear off the Church building debt. He now leaves the Church in a good financial position to take up the work at Moss Side. The best wishes for his future success are shared by the members of the congregation and also by the public of the town generally, by whom he is held in the greatest respect.

Halstead.—On Sunday evening the annual business meeting was held in the Free Christian Church, after the usual service, presided over by the Rev. A. J. Marchant, of Deptford. The average attendance was about the same as the preceding year, and the treasurer had a small but rather better balance in hand than last year. The usual officers were all re-elected, and a very hearty vote of thanks given to the Provincial Assembly for providing the ministers.

Leeds: Holbeck.—An excellent orchestral concert was held in the school recently, promoted by the brothers H. and D. Reason and the Rev. W. R. Shanks, when about forty members of the pupils' orchestra of the Leeds College of Music, assisted by one lady and two gentlemen vocalists, performed a capital programme of classical music to the pleasure and satisfaction of a large audience. The proceeds of the concert are to be devoted to the purchase of 200 new hymn-books for the Sunday-school.

London: Deptford.—On Sunday morning last the Rev. A. J. Marchant was the recipient of a set of gold sleeve links, presented as a birthday gift by the poor of his congregation as a token of their "gratitude and love." These poor people have to subsist on three and sixpence to five shillings per week, and yet for a considerable period they have been saving a penny now and again for this object. Mr. Marchant, in acknowledging the gift, said no words of his could express his gratitude, for he knew that every coin contributed for this present represented an act of self-denial. He could only hope to prove worthy of their confidence and affection.

London: Peckham.—The 31st annual meeting of the Avondale-road congregation was held on Monday evening, the 12th inst., Mr. S. W. Davies in the chair. The Secretary, Mr. W. J. Cooley, reported on the good work done during the year, the increase of members and improved attendance at the Sunday services, of the bright hopes entertained for the future, and also the great disappointment experienced through the resignation of their newly appointed minister, the Rev. A. F. G. Fletcher, owing to the breakdown of his health.

Newport, Mon.—A most successful social gathering was held on Thursday evening, February 15, to welcome the Rev. Geo. Critchley, who is now stationed here to organise the movement. Members of the congregation were present in strong force, and a gratifying feature was the presence of a goodly contingent of Cardiff friends, led by the Rev. W. Whitaker. A musical programme was thoroughly enjoyed, and, after an interval for refreshments, Mr. W. Pritchard, in a felicitous speech, extended a hearty welcome to Mr. Critchley in the name of the Newport congregation. The Rev. W. Whitaker followed, as representing the S.E. Wales Unitarian Society, and expressed his pleasure at hearing of the progress which had been made since he conducted the first service in Newport last October. In replying, Mr. Critchley congratulated the congregation upon the success which had attended their early efforts, and gave some wholesome advice as to the best means of strengthening and extending the church's work. On Thursday last, the 22nd inst., Mr. Critchley lectured on "Balder the Beautiful," and made Robert Buchanan's poem a study in comparative religion of striking interest.

Nottage.—The first of a series of fellowship mission meetings which it is proposed to hold at various centres, under the auspices of the South-East Wales Unitarian Society, was held at Nottage on Tuesday evening last. The object of the meetings, as set forth in the syllabus, is "The spreading of our faith, and drawing our churches closer in fellowship." After a brief devotional service conducted by the Rev. W. T. Phillips, Mr. J. Grace, J.P., took the chair, and addresses illustrative of various aspects of Unitarianism were delivered by Mr. J. R. Evans (Merthyr Tydvil), and by the Revs. George Critchley and W. Whitaker. The speeches were interspersed with appropriate hymns, heartily sung by a good congregation. It is intended to hold meetings of a similar kind at Merthyr Tydvil and Clydach Vale.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held in Channing Hall on Monday evening last, Mr. Albert J. Hobson, J.P., presiding. There was a good attendance of the members. The chairman congratulated the minister and congregation on a successful year's work, and particularly referred to the strong support given to the building scheme for the daughter Mission Church at Attercliffe, and to the purchase of land by the Uppertorpe congregation with a view to early removal. Both these movements, and the excellent way in which they had been supported, showed that the Unitarian cause in Sheffield had taken a new lease of life. All the institutions of the chapel were in a healthy condition. The annual report and statement of accounts were unanimously adopted. Arrangements were made for the cost of publication of the new Service Book to be met. The chairman moved, and Mr. George H. Hunt seconded, a vote of thanks to the Rev. C. J. Street and to his assistant, Rev. H. Dawtrey, for their work during the year, expressing the conviction that the congregation was never more alive and united than at the present time. In response to the vote, which was warmly passed, Mr. Street testified to his pleasure in the work, and hoped for still better things in future. He rejoiced in the good feeling, not only among themselves, but in the relations of the three churches in Sheffield and their ministers. Mr. Dawtrey also replied, referring more particularly to the improved state of the Sunday school. A vote of thanks was passed to the trustees, committee, and officers, with the expression of sincere hope that the secretary, Mr. Edward Bramley, would soon be restored to health.

Southend-on-Sea.—The annual meeting (adjourned from February 4) was held on Wednesday evening, the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, minister of the Provincial Assembly, presiding. There was a good attendance. The report, which had been read and adopted at the previous meeting, showed signs of improvement in the attendances at the services during the past three months, the Sunday-school having more than trebled in number since November. The treasurer's account showed a deficit of £20. Mr. Sloman was unanimously re-elected as hon. treasurer; Mr. M. J. Frankland was unanimously elected hon. treasurer. The business over, a public welcome was given to Mr. Delta Evans, the recently appointed minister.

Sunderland (Resignation).—The Rev. Francis Wood has resigned the pastorate of this church to take effect at the end of June, 1906.

Todmorden.—The annual prize distribution at the Unitarian Sunday-school took place last Sunday and was of more than ordinary interest. After a short service, solo by Miss Florrie Wadsworth, one of the silver medallists, and an address by the junior superintendent, Mr. Graham, Mr. Benjamin Midgley, the senior teacher, gave a brief and appropriate address and distributed eleven silver medals to scholars, who had never missed for five years, 72 prizes for those who had never missed during the current year, and 46 to others. At the same time he presented prizes to fourteen teachers, who had never missed during the year. But the great event was a presentation to the two superintendents, Councillor Crabtree, who has been teacher and superintendent for nearly forty years, and Mr. Graham, who has filled similar offices for nearly twenty years. This had been kept as a complete surprise to them. This presentation also was made by Mr. Midgley, and consisted of an album for each, containing photographs of the teachers and officers of the school (numbering over seventy), in grateful recognition of the devoted services rendered by both superintendents for so many years. After Councillor Wadsworth had made a few remarks in which he exhorted the young people to follow the example of the two superintendents, Councillor Crabtree and Mr. Graham briefly replied. Both had been taken quite by surprise, and the former said that his connection with the school had been forty-seven years. The usual order of closing brought a most interesting ceremony to an end.

OPINIONS.

"Has many commendable features. A great many of the old fine tunes find places, and the new tunes are of a varied character. Both editions are produced in admirable style."

Birmingham Daily Post.

"The Musical Edition is well set out and printed. Many of the old favourites are to be found, and the selection of tunes is decidedly strong and judicious."—Manchester Guardian.

"There are aspects of devotion here brought to expression which have not hitherto been so clearly represented in our books. The Musical Edition has a special claim on our gratitude. We are confident that its merits will meet with growing appreciation both in our homes and churches."—The Inquirer.

"A good collection."—The Christian World.

"I congratulate the editors on the admirable way in which they have done their work. There is a breath of modern thought and life about the book which is most refreshing, while there is a real strain of poetic feeling from end to end."—H. Enfield Dowson.

"I am sincerely pleased with it. It has, as far as hymns will permit, kept the principle that some poetic feeling should exist in the hymns chosen. I also like the arrangement and the headings; and a spirit of care and wise emotion, and of attention to congregational needs, pervades the book. I hope it will be adopted far and wide. It deserves an extended circulation."—Stopford A. Brooke.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

In the discussion on the Land and the Unemployed we have been disappointed of more than one contribution, but we shall have a further contribution from Mr. G. F. Millin to publish next week.

A LECTURE on "Simplification and the Social Problem" will be given by Mr. Edward Carpenter, author of "Towards Democracy," under the auspices of the Humanitarian League, at Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, on Wednesday, March 7, at 8 p.m. The chair will be taken by the Rev. W. J. Jupp.

THE annual meeting of the London Sunday School Society is reported this week. Twenty-nine schools are represented in the society, and of these twenty have Bands of Hope. Blackfriars, Highgate, Limehouse, Newington Green, Stepney and Stratford have also Temperance Societies for older members. Most of the bands are affiliated with the National Unitarian Temperance Association which annually publishes statistics of membership, &c. The schools are always urged to observe Temperance Sunday, which is the last Sunday in November. The Organising Secretary reports :—Our sense of the great importance of work amongst the children is stronger than ever. To interest these in the cause that each may lead a pure and sober life has always been one of the Association's chief aims. All interested in the movement are invited to address one of the officers, who are anxious to render every assistance.

RECENTLY, in the columns of the British Weekly, Dr. John Watson made confession of some things he had learned in the course of his ministry as to the right methods of training and the things a minister should chiefly aim at. In the same paper, on February 15, Ian Maclaren wrote of the "Wisdom of Love," telling of an early experience of Carmichael at Drumtochty. It is a beautiful lesson in sympathy as it should exist between minister and congregation, which both would be the better for taking to heart.

SIR FREDERICK TREVES in his Rectorial Address at Aberdeen last week discussed the factors which make for success in life. He was, he said, no believer in luck, and the man who was content to wait for a stroke of good fortune would probably wait until he had a stroke of paralysis. Luck in any serious profession meant nothing more than this : that the man to whom it came was ready for an opportunity when it presented itself. The man of genius, he added, was said to be inventive, but there was little value in inventing for the sake of inventing. He was said to be original, yet it was possible for any man to be original, but unless the quality led to some profit it was as little use to be original as to be an albino. Briefly enumerated (we are quoting from the admirable report in the Tribune) the qualifications which made for a successful professional career were health, serviceable knowledge, sympathy and honesty. Industry was presupposed, just as one could not conceive of a moving mill-wheel without a stream. As to honesty, said Sir Frederick Treves, there was no possibility of sure success without it. He would not use the term "the strictest honesty," for there was only one degree of honesty.

THE proprietors of the Daily News have arranged to hold an exhibition in May of "sweated" goods, and the process of their manufacture. That time is chosen, at the height of the season and when many people are in London for the May Meetings, as best for reaching the largest number of those who can help to reduce the evil. The exhibition will be in the West-End, so that those least acquainted with the conditions under which the goods are produced may be induced to visit it. The Daily News will take the financial responsibility, and if there be any profit, it will be handed to societies likely to lessen the evils. It is hoped that legislation will be promoted as a result of the exhibition.

IN the February Magazine of Art there is an article by Mr. E. Alfred Jones on "Some Old English Communion Plate of English Nonconformity,"—with illustrations of plate ranging in date from the time of Charles I. to George III. Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead ; George's Meeting at Exeter ; Friargate Chapel, Derby ; the Great Meeting at Leicester ; Chowbent Chapel ; Platt Chapel, Manchester, and Matthew Henry's Chapel, Chester, all furnish interesting and often beautiful instances to the record.

A MEMORIAL service for Mr. Duncan S. Miller, founder of the Royal Handbell Ringers and a well-known temperance worker, was held in the Denmark-place Baptist Chapel, Brixton, on Saturday, February 24, conducted by the Rev. F. B. Meyer. The National Unitarian Temperance Association was represented at the service by its treasurer and secretary. The service was followed by cremation at Golder's Green.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.—It is proposed to have a vegetarian luncheon table at the Oxford meeting of the Conference. Ministers and delegates wishing to join it are requested to send their names to the local secretary (Mr. J. Walter Cock, 37, Beechcroft-road, Oxford). It will be a convenience if visitors who desire the vouchers, which are necessary to secure the reduced railway fares, will, as far as possible, apply for them, through the secretary of their congregation, to the secretary of the Conference (Rev. Jas. Harwood), who will forward them through the same medium at the beginning of April. These vouchers will only be available at stations from which tickets to Oxford are issued.

As regards accommodation at Oxford during the meeting of the Conference, from April 17 to 20, the local committee offers to secure rooms for from 4s. 6d. to 5s. a day (including breakfast and light supper), provided that notice is given not later than March 15. The following reduced terms are offered to visitors attending the Conference :—Randolph Hotel, 12s. 6d. per day ; Clarendon Hotel, 9s. 6d. per day ; Wilberforce (Temperance) Hotel, from 7s. per day ; and the following boarding houses, Oxenford Hall, Isis Boarding Establishment, and 5, Beaumont-street, 6s. per day.

BY A MINISTER.

XXXVII.

I SOMETIMES wonder by what right, and on what grounds, members of liberal churches, for the most part, hold liberal opinions. How have they come by them? Orthodox belief is held by orthodox believers as a special revelation, a faith once delivered, a tradition to be received. But liberal thought is not liberal unless it is free to think out its own conclusions independently. Does it always do this?

My friend Eudoxus often speaks of the faith of his fathers. Why of his fathers? Is belief, in his case also, traditional, ancestral? Is it simply an inheritance, a family possession? Where, then, is the liberty wherein he stands?

Eubulus, on the other hand, has no spiritual lineage—none that he cares to remember. His belief is founded, he believes, on modern criticism. Not that he has ever really studied its methods or tested its results. He is a child of hearsay. But if he appeals to that which is outside his own intelligence, takes his denials on trust, and does little or nothing on his own account to arrive at personal conviction, how does his position differ from that of the unquestioning believer? Eubulus, I may add, is a Sunday-school teacher, and I have sometimes observed that the schools in which the most advanced opinions are held are those in which religious questions are least studied.

That is one reason why I think the Lenten call to repentance every year a most wholesome reminder. Repentance, I take it, is reconsideration. It is a change, when necessary, of the point of view. In the region of belief it is revision of belief. That was what the preacher in the wilderness insisted on: "Begin not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father." There was to be no reliance on historical descent. If religion could really pass from father to son by a process so natural, then He who made man of the dust of the ground could as naturally make children out of the stones on Jordan's banks.

We all have some Abraham to our father. He may have been a Puritan Reformer, or the founder of a sect in a later generation, or a party leader within living memory. That his name should be held in honour is allowable enough, but an over-cultivated reverence may easily lead to a kind of atavism, a tendency to revert to antecedent type. This, I suppose, is what is meant by the "sacerdotalism of dissent," the undue influence of mind over mind. It was this warping action of transmitted thought that made the offence of Pharisaism, and "the tradition of the elders" was very much that which had already been denounced as heritage by descent: "We have Abraham to our father."

This power of past thought over present belief is a warning against the use of a theological term as a denominational name—it establishes at last a theological succession. There is no reason, of course, why intellectual reasonings leading to the same conclusions should not repeat themselves from age to age; but danger lies in the possible leaking in of sentimental consideration. There is nothing which confuses inquiry so much as pious memory.

This, perhaps, will partly explain the Baptist's insistence, not only on repentance, but also on baptism. It broke the entail. By a definite act and deed the penitent sank beneath the severing wave, and rose again, in token of newness of life and entire acceptance of personal responsibility. His life was now detached. Henceforth he would be, as an apostle afterwards put it, a Jew inwardly. And here, too, we may find a plea for the modern doctrine of conversion. Conversion is wholly within the bounds of personal experience. It has its own cramping limitations, but it has this in its favour, that it cuts away external suggestion, and leaves the individual soul to its own vision of things divine.

But is not education the giving of a bias, a predetermination of thought? That, for the time, it certainly is. It is thought to be better to do this than to leave the immature mind wholly without direction. But where discretion begins, provisional education ends. The mind ought now to begin to examine its first beliefs, and to feel its way to avowal or disavowal, but if it glides into passive acquiescence in that which is convenient and familiar, accepting it by hereditary right, no conscious act of personal choice and judgment will ever have been made. I do not myself see much difference between the evils of subscription blindly tendered and those of prescription blindly followed, and the point I put to myself is, whether each full-grown man ought not to work out his own mental conviction with something of that fear and trembling with which he works out his own moral salvation.

MANCHESTER SOCIAL CLUB.

ONE of the most valuable and interesting of the educational and recreative agencies of Manchester, is the well-known Social Club, an institution which grew up out of the manifold activities of the Lower Mosley-street Schools. Housed in ample and convenient premises—with large gymnasium, billiard room, drawing rooms, libraries, lecture rooms, and having its own well-managed restaurant—the club forms a delightful and healthy meeting place for its five hundred members. Here young people coming strangers to Manchester, with no resources of their own beyond, perhaps, a single cheerless room, may find at once beautiful rooms, cheerful companionship, and friendly help and counsel all suffused with a glow of homely feeling. Here there is both the freedom and the restraint of a cultured home if "restraint" is the proper word. Rather, perhaps, one should say here is the true equality of the true home—the equality of a common affection from which springs the true regard which is the best assurance of both self-esteem and mutual esteem, of good taste, and true loyalty. In some ways it is a daring experiment to bring young people of both sexes together in club life, but experience has amply justified it. Indeed, when one gets inside and feels the life of the club, everything is so beautiful and fitting—the tone everywhere rings so true that one forgets there is anything strange about it, so natural does it all seem. All the same, one is conscious of steady heads, clear eyes and generous hearts pervading every detail of the club life. In its secretary and lady superintendent the club is fortunate in securing leaders whose culture and kindness enable them to control by the force of example rather than by insistence on any code. And behind its officials the club has a committee which comprises many of the wisest and best people in Manchester. Nor does the committee show its wisdom in anything so much as in its comparative self-effacement. It never obtrudes itself. The club never has the air of an institution. As far as possible, it is managed by its own members, all mere "management" is minimised, and in its place, kindly homely life is substituted. And so these young people brighten the lives of one another and learn many useful lessons of good comradeship. Being so big a family there is room for the devotees of all hobbies and pursuits to sort themselves out. Here are groups of every conceivable fashion. Every taste finds its compeer. There are classes of various kinds—educational and musical; recreation in all its forms. Summer or winter no one need be dull or uninterested if he or she enters into the life of the Manchester Social Club.

The appreciation in which the philanthropic section of the Manchester public holds the club was testified by the large gathering at the annual meeting of its subscribers last week. The chair was taken by Sir James Hoy, and among those present were the Misses Gaskell, Mrs. Schuster, Miss Herford, Mrs. Burgon, Mrs. G. H. Behrens, Mrs. Davies, Principal Gordon, Principal Graham, Col. Pilcher, Col. Clapham, Mr. G. H. Leigh and Miss Leigh, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Worthington, Mr. Godfrey Worthington, Mr. T. A. Leonard, and others. The report was adopted on the motion of Sir James Hoy, and among subsequent speakers were Col. Clapham, Rev. C. Peach, Mrs. A. Schuster and Principal Graham. They all extolled the excellent work of the club. As one of them put it, the club enlarged the sphere of common interest and association for all its members; it initiated them into a common citizenship above sect or sex or social position, it extended to them the amenities of cultured social life, and enlisted them in the cause of right living and high feeling.

The only shadow on the gathering was a debt of £300. This was due to unusual expenditure, and to the keeping of the subscriptions low. These could not be raised, the chairman of committee, Mr. O. St. L. Davies, said without abandoning their cherished purpose of keeping membership within the reach of all respectable working girls and young men. And so the club has to appeal for outside subscriptions, and perhaps some readers of the INQUIRER may be ready to help. If so, the treasurer is Mr. J. R. Oliver, Social Club, Lower Mosley street, Manchester.

CHARLES PEACH.

"THE Life Superlative," by Stopford A. Brooke, is the title of a new volume of sermons announced for immediate publication by Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons, Ltd. Social problems and civic righteousness are dealt with somewhat fully.

BOOKS NEW AND OLD.

I ONCE spent an evening in the library of a busy merchant with whom I had a slight acquaintance. The walls were well-lined with books, and conspicuous among them was a large number of volumes of sermons; selected, evidently, with care, and reflecting a real interest on the part of the owner. The taste is sufficiently rare to be remarkable. Sermons, it is true, reach a very respectable figure in publishers' statistics, but the reading public is seldom stirred to enthusiasm by them; and, like some people of eminent respectability, they can boast of only a narrow circle of acquaintances. It is not, as the scoffer might suggest, that they are not worth print and paper, but they are generally unsuited for these cold dignities, having been called into existence for another purpose. And yet there are some sermons which are among the classics of the English tongue.

I was reminded of this fact the other day when I happened to drop in upon my friend Libellus. We fell to talking upon this very subject of printed sermons, and he compared them to fossils, many of them very rare and delicate to the eye, but with the colour and glow of life gone out of them. Inspired echoes he also called them, meaning, I suppose, to suggest by the phrase how dimly reminiscent they are of the human voice, and of the listening attitude of a great assembly. Sermons, he added, in his dogmatic way, should be heard, not read. He pointed, however, to his own small collection of books of this class, and it was clear that they were not the least treasured of his possessions. Perhaps, after all, his interest in them is partly professional, for Libellus can only indulge his bookish tastes in spare moments, and the best hours of his day are given to the happy work of the Christian pastor. It may be the humanising influence of his calling which has fashioned his taste in printed sermons, for I noted at once that they represented no particular school of thought or religious sentiment. "What matters most," he explained, "is that they should be a transcript of real life. I make no claim upon the books I need that they shall flatter me by keeping within the narrow compass of my own mind."

He related to me, with some glee, how he once received a visit from a pedant, who suspecting him, perhaps with reason, of some heresies, expressed his amazement at seeing a goodly row of Newman's sermons on his shelves. "He looked at me darkly," said Libellus, "as though he detected the taint of mediæval sorceries, and went gaily on his rationalistic way." We laughed at the reminiscence, and doubted whether our friend, who was known to both of us, was likely ever to make much of the preacher's calling; and then we forgot all about him as we discussed the fascinating literature of the Oxford Movement, and the extraordinary moral insight and spiritual passion which still confront us in the Parochial and Plain Sermons, in spite of their archaic setting and their mental aloofness from all that we call proudly, modern thought. Next to them my eye lighted on "Sermons on Subjects of the Day," and I could not refrain from opening the volume to read once more the noble close of the sermon on "The Parting of Friends," surely, in its exquisite tenderness and spiritual entreaty, one of the sublimest prose elegies in the language:—"And O, my brethren, O kind and affectionate hearts, O loving friends, should you know any one whose lot it has been, by writing or by word of mouth, in some degree to help you thus to act; if he has ever told you what you knew about yourselves, or what you did not know; has read to you your wants or feelings and comforted you by the very reading; has made you feel that there was a higher life than this daily one, and a brighter world than that you see; or encouraged you, or sobered you, or opened a way to the inquiring, or soothed the perplexed; if what he has said or done has ever made you take interest in him, and feel well inclined towards him; remember such a one in time to come, though you hear him not, and pray for him, that in all things he may know God's will, and at all times he may be ready to fulfil it."

Under the solemn spell of these words our thoughts travelled far away from books into the secret places of the spirit. There was silence for a little space and Libellus pointed out how fitting it was that Dean Church's "Gifts of Civilization," and "Human Life and its Conditions," and "The Discipline of the Christian Character," should be placed close to Newman; and, next to them, "The Spirit of Discipline" and "Studies in the Christian Character," by the present Bishop of Oxford. They are all the creation of the Oxford spirit and training, subtle in thought and analysis, perhaps a little too academic for popular taste, but full of spiritual sensitiveness, and reflecting the innate refinement of the Christian temper.

What a different world the next row of volumes suggested. Phillips Brooks' sermons are the best fruit of the American pulpit. They palpitate with his strong masculine personality, and the vital needs of an eager, pushing civilisation. Sympathy with the common life of men is their predominant note, and the reality of moral struggle and the soul's victory, through the grace of Christ in the ordinary ways of the world, their convincing message. We agreed that few better lesson-books could fall into the hands of the young preacher. If he is teachable he may learn from them how to be popular without triviality, and to avoid all the poor artifices of anecdote and familiarity, and still to be interesting to ordinary men and women. "It is part of human nature," said Libellus, "to receive the strongest and richest Gospel of the grace of God, if only men will have the courage to speak it. Modern preaching suffers from too much striving to be popular; but religion can only conquer in its own name; and the present fashion of slighting the value of a plain message to the soul is enthroning scepticism in the pulpit." He spoke strongly, and with evident conviction. My friend has no relish for a blunt point in an argument.

In addition to these modern classics of the pulpit there were various satellites, which Libellus had his own reasons for liking—the odd volumes found in every library, which reveal the private taste of the owner or preserve some memorable incident of his life. These preferences are not to be explained. They appeal to no community of interest. For the most part they die with the man who possesses them; but for himself the savour of distinctness adds to their charm. Without individuality in our liking for books we can hardly be said to love them at all. I noticed one or two of these unclassified volumes with an inward shrug of surprise; but I refrained from asking for any reasons. Probably I should not have understood them, for there are subtle affinities of soul which even close friends cannot share. Nor did Libellus seek to enlighten me. He seemed almost to be talking to himself and to have forgotten my presence, as he confessed that, though he was the possessor of these books he was no great reader of sermons. "I turn to them sometimes," he added, "just to see what splendid things have been done. Though I am a very poor preacher myself, they tell me that there have been great speakers for God. It is an encouragement to feel that I am of their company, and that they are too great to despise my lowly insufficiencies."

But already, while he mused, my eyes had wandered off to a row of dumpy volumes, which I had often seen Libellus handle with touching reverence. I knew something of their history. They had belonged, several of them, to a teacher of his youth, a man of grave and sweet spirituality of nature, a Puritan divine of the antique mould, who combined a dignified simplicity of life with a finely cultivated intelligence, and an unusual breadth of religious sympathy. Some of these books were the chosen companions of his quiet hours, and for those who knew in what gracious keeping they had been they would long retain the fragrance of a beautiful memory. Here was a small volume of Prayers by Jeremy Taylor, and a reprint, not often met with, of Donne's "Devotions," and the Pickering edition of Andrews' "Daily Devotions," and a collection of Latin hymns. Close beside them were other books of the same class, though not from the same source—"The Enchiridion of Erasmus," in a Leiden edition of 1641; Andrews' "Holy Devotions," the fourth edition printed in 1655; and a Latin copy of the "Imitatio," in a beautifully printed pocket edition, dated Paris, 1762, the last discovered, I was told, all soiled and neglected, in a box of sixpenny odds and ends. "Does anybody care for these things nowadays?" Libellus asked me, and I thought I could detect a note almost of hostility to some unseen foe in his voice. "Does anybody care enough about them to read them, and to meditate upon them, and to pray over them?" The abruptness of the question startled me, and gave rise to a whole train of disquieting thoughts. These books, which I had been turning over with some fondness, noting their date and style, were the symbol of a great human interest. Is that interest on the wane? Do we care, as men cared in times past, for the spiritual life? Do we believe, as they once believed, in the reality of prayer and the nearness of God? These very books which I hold in my hand have gone with men into their stern wrestlings with temptation, and their search for light from heaven. This volume, with its 250 years of life, has a religious history of its own, perhaps of a soul's agony; perhaps of its triumph if only the dead page could speak to me. But again the voice of Libellus chimes in, and it seems to echo my own thoughts. "It may be," he said, "that our taste in books of devotion has changed. The field of serious literature is far wider. Men foster the spiritual imagination and cultivate habits of meditation by reading Emerson and Browning, and all the other writers who suggest some interest in the problems of the soul, even when they do not grapple with them very closely. The Bible, and the 'Imitation' and the book of Devotions have many competitors." But I saw that while Libellus made these suggestions, and said what he could for them, they did not satisfy him. "Is it not that there is something wrong with ourselves?" he exclaimed. "Our ears are full of noise, and our hearts are distracted by excitement. We believe in saving our souls by fuss, and by running about the world to meetings. We have lost all sense of the value of discipline and steady habit in the religious life. 'In quietness and confidence shall be your strength' is the text of the sermon which our time needs most of all. The people who think that they are going to work a religious revolution by rational thought and argument, and organised demonstrations, are of all men most deluded. Religion is in the keeping of those who have the divine secret of love and prayer." Was Libellus right? I could see that he spoke with intense earnestness, out of some deep feeling of need in himself. He said no more about books that day, for everything else seemed to shrink into triviality in presence of these problems of the soul. But as I turned my steps homeward calm breadths of evening sky were above my head, and my feet moved to the music of the words, "In quietness and confidence shall be your strength."

WE must be content this quarter with the scantiest notice of the Hibbert Journal and almost in the eleventh hour. It is our own loss, for this number is full of good matter.

To Dr. Heber Newton's article we have called attention in another column, and have already noted the interesting correction by the Editorial Secretary of the China Inland Mission, as to the attitude of that Mission and the Bible Society after the Boxer outbreak of 1900. The first article is another of the most interesting "Impressions of Christianity from the Points of View of the Non-Christian Religions," this time by a Moslem, formerly a Judge in the High Court in Bengal, Ameer Ali, M.A., the subject being "Christianity from the Islamic Standpoint." In common with all Moslems, the writer confesses to the profoundest veneration for the Prophet of Nazareth, and clearly holds that he has a truer conception of the life and teaching of Jesus than that represented in the orthodox churches. "Moslems," he says, "do not recognise that modern Christianity, overlaid with Greek philosophy and Pauline mysticism, represents the religion Jesus, in fact, taught. They consider that Islam represents true Christianity." And the great defect noted in current Christianity is its failure to hold and direct the lives of ordinary people. These, it is urged, require definite law and regulation to be enforced for the direction of their lives. Lofty sentiment and spiritual ideals, as expressed in Christian pulpits, will not suffice. Thus it is that "Christian" practice falls so lamentably short of the gospel ideal. But is not the real reason for this failure of Christianity to be found, not in the absence of regulation, but in the unfaithfulness of those who have accepted the ideal and profess the spiritual faith, but are not really possessed by it, and so belie by their conduct the word of truth they take upon their lips?

The writer notes that Moslems, in common with the Docetic Christians (and for similar dogmatic reasons), do not believe that Jesus died on the Cross. Among them the orthodox belief is that he was translated to heaven; the rationalist, that he revived and subsequently journeyed to the East, where he died. In a footnote it is added, "A recent Moslem writer asserts that the tomb of a prophet called Nabi Isa is still pointed out in the country north of Cashmere." [That tomb, in a certain street in Srinagar, Cashmere, about 130 miles north of Lahore, is declared by Mirza Ghulam Ahmad, Chief of Qadian, Punjab, still to contain the sacred body of Jesus, while he himself, a Moslem reformer, claims to be the new "Promised Messiah." His followers hold that "the spiritual death of Christianity is important evidence of the death of its founder, for if Jesus is living, why does not his influence work?" This information we gather from a prospectus and some of the first numbers of a Review of Religions, published at Lahore, 1901-02, in the interests of the New Messiah. Whether he is still active, or whether the Review is still being published, we do not know. Our last information is dated 1903.]

Professor Henry Jones contributes the second of his articles on "The Working Faith of a Social Reformer," and there is the first part of an article on "Christianity and Science" by Sir Oliver Lodge, dealing with the material element in Christianity. The second part, on the Divine Element, is to appear in April. Mr. F. Storrs Turner, author of a valuable study of Quakerism, writes on the Resurrection, explaining how it is to be understood and believed, and Professor Armitage, of the Yorkshire Independent College, answers the question, "Who Makes our Theology?"

It would have been of greater interest and of practical service at the present moment if Miss A. S. Furnell, in her article on "Religious Knowledge as a School Subject," had given some particulars of the memorandum of the Bremen teachers, to which she refers, demanding the suppression of the teaching of "religion" in the schools. The movement, she says, is led by more than one Lutheran pastor. Are they, we wonder, the same Lutheran pastors who have joined the "Union of German Monists," recently established at Jena, of which Professor Haeckel is also a member? Miss Furnell's protest against the kind of religious teaching ordinarily given in schools appears to us perfectly sound. "Are we, then," she asks, "to substitute 'moral instruction' for 'religious,' as has been done in France? To do so would, indeed, be the escaping of Scylla by falling into Charybdis. Moral instruction at set hours would develop into as dry a mental pabulum for youth as catechism or collects. True religious and moral education can be better realised without dogmatic instruction." Whoever is interested in the position of Liberals in the Church of England should by no means overlook the article by the Rev. W. Manning, vicar of St. Andrews, Leytonstone, and hon. sec. of the Churchmen's Union, on "Are the Clergy Honest?"

SCHOOL OUT OF DOORS.*

OUR grandsires in their childhood knew no such thing. They would only have alluded to it as an indulgence incompatible with the theory of schooling which, by its first axiom, must itself be incompatible with the inclinations of childhood. The ancients we revere, and variation from their methods, greater even than what we have as yet arrived at, will not diminish, but rather increase our admiration for them and their ways. They were heroic, and the more so inasmuch as they were deliberately hostile to nature. They set themselves to fight nature, because they thought they saw in her the seat of all evil; and consistently with their theory they began the warfare on the persons of their own children before original sin had gained the strength to advance to their discomfiture like an army with banners. They sought to drive out—for it was a process of eviction rather than of education—whatsoever they found in the unsophisticated heart and disposition of a child, and to put something quite different in its place; something artificial, something unconnected with real life—exercises in a dead tongue about an antediluvian world that was still more so. And this instruction was imparted, wherever the system was thoroughly and consistently carried out, in a manner abhorrent to the child, to whom, in consequence, everything connected with school, from the smell of the ink on his fingers to the crack of the cane on his back, became an object hated and to be fled from as soon as fortune provided the wings. Now all this was because the ancients aforesaid sincerely believed that nature, whether inside or outside the pupil, was the devil. To us, on the other hand, that same nature standing not for devil at all, but for Deity, appeals to us, consistently with our faith, to set to work on the momentous business of education, trusting the child's own instincts and trying to enlarge its knowledge of the things it wants to know about, in the way it likes to learn. And thus we have some reasonable grounds for the hope that school and learning are even now coming into association in the minds of our boys and girls, with all that goes to make up the great, good, healthful world that lies between the unpaved floor of the earth and the untiled roof of the sky.

For, in our wisdom, we have at last arrived at the conclusion, which the child of man has been begging him with tears to believe these thousands of years, that he is an out-of-door animal, whose affinity is not with the few humble creatures of darkness which do belong indoors (rats, mice, and blackbeetles, to wit), but with the multitude of outdoor creatures of light—lambs that gambol in silly joy, birds that sing, and dogs that fight, and eagles that soar, and that it is a grievous sin, like caging a skylark, to cramp the limbs of a child into an indoor existence, and his mind, or hers, into an indoor schooling.

"A robin redbreast in a cage Sets all heaven in a rage," said one who knew. Be it so. The morning stars will sing together, and the sons of God will shout for joy, when all the little human Robins and Jennys have escaped from bondage, and learn their lessons daily in the face of the Father of Light.

The child an out-of-door animal! This is a revolutionary idea that has already begun to turn our lives considerably inside-out. The child of the revolution to-day goes innocent of socks or stockings, sees no more reason why he should wear a hat than the blackbirds and thrushes, and abjures boots until football makes them a necessity; sleeps at night with windows wide open in all weathers, and never remembers to shut the door in the daytime; he puts his faith in Dr. Sunshine, and has very little faith left for any other member of the faculty. He aspires to be an inhabitant of Garden City, by and by—that is, provided Garden City remains all garden and no city.

The few to-day, the many to-morrow. Such straws show which way the stream is beginning to flow. May it not be a stream of tendency that gives promise of reaching the land of health and happiness more speedily than some other streams of civilisation which we know too well?

The Hon. Cordelia Leigh's excellent little book, "Our School out of Doors," has provoked the preceding remarks. Unless a book that is meant to be placed in the hands of children can pass muster in the matter of its print and of its pictures, it were waste of time to consider it, however great its wisdom, for no child ever will. This volume however, is not wanting in these respects. It is about as well set up in type and picture as could be desired. Its morsels of science are dealt out in a manner calculated to excite young folks' appetites, while offering no serious obstacle to youthful digestion. It aims at providing something more and better than lessons to be swallowed—namely, a succession of guide-notes to actual observation of nature. In one respect we note that it is neither better nor worse than most books of to-day that are intended for use—that is, in the binding. Strongly-bound books, it is to be observed, are seldom seen much in use. They are kept in glass cases. Publishers have not yet realised that children especially require their books to be sewn with catgut or porpoise hide, or something equally tough, so that they may be used at times as clappers, and subjected to a back-strain of about two tons.

But this little book is one of the very best for its purpose that we have yet seen. If half of the old boys and girls of this land would assimilate one half of its contents, it would be well for the boys and girls who are still young. It combines what appears to us to be the three points of excellence of a children's guide-book to the world we live in. It provides, in the first place, a host of fascinating facts related in a simple and interesting style; next, a clear observation of the environment of all these details of life in the substance and forces of nature, and lastly, it points to the soul of everything, great and small, the mind that plans the myriad devices of sense and appetite—the beauty and the love and the goodness of it all.

Into many a book of interesting, and even first-hand observation, we have looked in vain for this triple basis of a true insight into nature. We have shelves—for which we are profoundly grateful—of curious and delightful detail, but we want more. The world is something more than an Old Curiosity Shop. We want a sense of the body and passions of Nature which account for the particulars of her features and the composition of her corpuscles. We want, finally, a sense of the soul of Nature which alone can account for the body and the passions thereof, for "soul is form and doth the body make."

Now things are found in this book in their places, not arranged and docketed in museum departments—here nothing but bones, and there nothing but butterflies; that is right for the museum, in a measure, but it is not the way of Creation. It is only an artificial stratagem of ours, a kind of military discipline of facts, by help of which we hope to extend our territory of knowledge. The weakness of many, if not most, elementary books of natural history is, that they are too much in the style of the advanced technical books, which are bound to be departmental. They tell us of things, but they omit the environment. They give us the peacock's eyes without the peacock, the peacock without the rainbow; the pearl without the oyster, and the oyster without the ocean. But the key to the peacock's "eyes" is the rainbow, and the secret of the pearl is the ocean. Here, true to the real order of illumination, the teacher takes us directly from the less to the greater, and we are bidden to look up from the golden splendour of the lichen to the glory of the Aurora. The heart does the rest, saying of the rainbow, the sea, and the Aurora, "The heavens declare the glory of God,"—"Thy path is in the great waters."

Here is a mushroom multiplying its spores faster than a child can count. Here the spider throwing its warp-line down the wind, and weaving its dangerous tapestry by the skill that God has given him. Here child and teacher go to the pond to catch waterfleas, and placing one of them under the microscope, watch its tiny heart. Think of it! When we are taught thus, there can be no conflict between science and religion, that is, between seeing and believing, and the word of faith follows inevitably in its place: "These wait all upon Thee; . . . Thou openest Thine hand, they are filled with good."

OBITUARY.

DAVID AINSWORTH.

THE death of Mr. David Ainsworth, which it was our sorrowful duty to announce last week, came as a great shock to the wide circle of his friends, many of whom had not even heard that he was ill. He had been working hard during the General Election, both in North Lonsdale and in his old Egremont Division, and after that exertion was far from well. He came up to London, however, for a family wedding, and having caught cold, was prostrated by an attack of asthma and bronchitis, to which he had for years been subject. Often before he had recovered from serious attacks, but now his strength was too far exhausted. He was only ill for a fortnight, at his house, 29, Pont-street, and on Wednesday, February 21, he passed peacefully away, being not quite 64 years age.

David Ainsworth was the eldest son of the late Thomas Ainsworth, of The Floss, Cleator, one of the pioneers of the commercial development of West Cumberland, of whom a very interesting account is given in the memoir of his youngest son, the late Rev. W. M. Ainsworth, by the Rev. James Harwood. David Ainsworth, who was born March 2, 1842, fully maintained the fine tradition of his father's influence, as a man of sterling character, a staunch Liberal, a generous and sympathetic employer of labour, a true friend; and, not least, as a loyal supporter of the principles of our free religious fellowship, of which Thomas Ainsworth, as a very earnest Unitarian, the friend of John James Tayler and James Martineau, was in his day one of the chief representatives.

The boys were sent to University College School, and in 1860 David and the second son, now the only remaining member of the family, Mr. John Stirling Ainsworth, M.P., were entered as lay students of Manchester New College, then in London. That was the year in which their father became President of the College. Subsequently David Ainsworth read law, and in 1870 was called to the bar in Lincoln's Inn, but never practised. He was devoted to a political career, and in 1874, the year of his marriage to Margaret, the younger daughter of the late Henry McConnel of Cressbrook, fought his first election in West Cumberland. In that year he was unsuccessful, but in 1880 he was returned as the first Liberal member for the county. Five years later and again in 1886 he contested the Egremont division unsuccessfully, but in 1892 was again returned. Two more defeats, in 1895 and 1900, concluded his direct connection with the constituency, which in victory and defeat alike he served with a rare and unselfish devotion. Latterly he had made a second home at Wray Castle, on Windermere, and at the recent election was to have been the Liberal candidate for North Lonsdale; but when Mr. Richard Cavendish declared for Free Trade and was prepared to stand as a Liberal, Mr. Ainsworth, with his accustomed generous self-effacement, gave way, and fought none the less earnestly to win the seat for another. So he gave himself to the last for the good cause, and sorrow for his death is blended with a deeper feeling of appreciation and honour for so true a man.

Mr. Ainsworth was a magistrate for his county and deputy lieutenant, vice-chairman of the Maryport and Carlisle Railway, a governor of St. Bees Grammar School, and closely connected with many public and beneficent institutions of his neighbourhood. He took a special interest in the Cleator District Nursing Association, of which he was president.

His interest in Manchester College was hereditary, and very warm to the end. For sixteen years he served as treasurer, and from 1896 to 1900 was President. In 1881 he was elected a Hibbert Trustee, his father having been one of the original trustees. In 1881, and again in the following year, he was President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and at the first meeting of the National Conference in 1882, at Liverpool, he presided at the soirée. To him Dr. Martineau's letter was addressed, which was one of the most notable contributions to the Conference.

Thus briefly we must record the services Mr. Ainsworth rendered. His was a life of transparent sincerity and earnestness. He was, as a friend writes of him, "a man of like spirit with his brother William, upright, genial, courteous, one whose high ideals never cut him off from his fellows, but rather were themselves a source of attraction. He was a man whom it was good to know." With greater physical vigour he would have accomplished much more in public life. He had a natural shrewdness and insight, which, combined with his kindness, would have made him a successful administrator. But, in spite of the burden of poor health he accomplished much good work, and his memory will be very precious to his many friends.

A memorial service was held at 29, Pont-street, at noon on Saturday, Feb. 24, and attended by a large gathering of friends. Among those present, besides Mr. and Mrs. J. S. Ainsworth, and their son, Mr. Thomas Ainsworth, of Trinity College, Cambridge, were Lord Selby (the late Speaker), Lord Muncaster, Lord Hardwicke, Admiral Dennistoun, Sir Francis Evans, the Right Hon. R. K. Causton, the Right Hon. T. Burt, Col. Greene Thomson, Mr. Marston Buszard, K.C., Mr. Jesse Herbert, Mr. Richard Cavendish, M.P., Mr. F. A. Channing, M.P., Mr. Phipson Beale, M.P., and Mrs. Beale, Mr. C. E. Schwann, M.P., and Mrs. Schwann, Mr. J. A. Duncan, Lady Roscoe, Lady Sinclair, Lady Milman, Mrs. Sidney Peel, Miss Mundella, Dr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C. (representing the Hibbert Trustees), Rev. V. D. Davis (representing Manchester College, Oxford), Mr. H. B. Lawford and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie (representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association), Mr. Richard Worsley, Mr. Rupert Potter, Mr. Basil Martineau, Mr. and Miss Keate, Mr. and Mrs. Wilfred E. Laurie, Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Hancock, Miss Mary Greg, Miss Maud Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Bryan H. Fell, Mr. and Miss Keate, Mr. and Mrs. E. G. Roscoe, Miss Macredie, Mr. T. S. Townsend, Mr. F. R. McConnel, Mr. W.

Macquhae, Mr. Godfrey Worthington, and Mr. J. R. McClean: Among those who sent wreaths were Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Sir Edwin and Lady Durning Lawrence, Sir Edward and Lady Busk. At Wray, among many others from friends and from public bodies, a beautiful wreath was sent by the employés at Cleator.

The service was conducted by the Rev. F. K. Freeston, of Essex Church, who in the course of it gave the following address:—

We have gathered here, from near and far, to pay our reverent regard to the memory of the dead. We have come to bid adieu to one who was not only honoured, but beloved, when living, and whose name shall long be remembered after him. We have come to pay to a public man a private tribute of high esteem, and to pay it in the house where he lived and the home which he made. We have come to stay our hearts with the olden, comforting words of faith so inseparably associated with the life after death.

And no further words are needed. It is not the words uttered at their decease, but the unspoken memories of their lives, which most truly hold our souls in reverence, when we face the solemn silence. Moreover, we feel especially that he, who though so devoted to public duty, desired no publicity, would have been the last to wish that we should indulge in too much sadness or use conventional terms of praise. May both be absent from this service.

But we also feel that we must say this at least. David Ainsworth will be remembered by all who knew him as a Christian and a gentleman; one who, as a public man, took a high view of his calling, whether as a Member of Parliament, or as a Chairman of the Hibbert Trust, or as a President of Manchester College, Oxford, or as a supporter of other institutions and societies who send their representatives to this service. By all these, his presence, knowledge, and advice were greatly valued, and will be sadly missed. For he was on all occasions a faithful witness to the sacredness of principle in national politics, to the supremacy of national righteousness, to true comprehension and charity in Christianity, to freedom, learning, and liberalism in all matters of religion.

In private life he was marked invariably by a cheerful, kindly, and most considerate courtesy, a courtesy which is in grave danger of loss in the press and rush of modern life. Although suffering in later years from continual attacks of ill-health and weakness, he never failed to meet both his public and private duties; in his illness he was brave and patient to the last; and his end was peace.

To have so lived is not to have lived in vain, but to have made life richer for those who come after, and death easier to bear for those most near—the members of his family who are especially in our hearts to-day.

The thought of his memory may often help us to pray, "Give us to go blithely on our duties all the day; bring us to our resting place weary and contented and undishonoured; and grant us in the end the gift of sleep." But sleep, from which shall come a wondrous awakening, for we believe that this mortal body is but the gateway to an immortal destiny, an unseen sanctuary where our life is hid with Christ in God.

Mrs. Ainsworth was obliged by the state of her health to remain in London. Mr. and Mrs. J. S. Ainsworth and other members of the family went down to Windermere on Saturday afternoon, when the body was taken to Wray Castle. The funeral was on Monday in Wray Church, the service being conducted by the Rev. B. Norton Thompson, of Bath, and the Rev. N. Kemble of Wray. A memorial service was also held in Cleator Parish Church.

GOOD COMPANY.

"TELL me what company you keep, and I'll tell you what you are," is one form of a very well known proverb; but, like many similar aphorisms, it is too sweeping an assertion to be actually true. A very common-minded man may, from some accident of birth or circumstance, find himself surrounded by superior associates of whom he is quite unworthy; or a fine poetic soul may be born into a prosaic circle from which there is no escape. Such persons judged by their company would be terribly misjudged. We cannot always choose our associates. Even the average man whose desires are moderate and whose field of choice is therefore wide, cannot always find the companions he would most like; while the man of high aspirations and capacities must often put up with the friendship of his inferiors or lead a solitary life. But there is one realm—a realm continuous with the whole civilised world—in which every man may choose his company without restraint, and according to his personal taste. It is the realm of books. If the proverb were put into the form, "Tell me what books you delight to read, and I'll tell you what you are," it would be almost universally applicable. And there is one province of this realm in which all grades of character, from the highest to the basest, may find suitable society.

It is the business of writers of fiction, or they assume it to be their business, to invent human characters of every conceivable type. And this business has been so long carried on that it is easy now for a man to put himself into any kind of society that he pleases in a few minutes by reading a book; much easier than by inviting his living friends to come and talk to him. To those who have any desire for self-development, who wish to cultivate their highest faculties, to draw nearer year by year to their ideals of noblest manhood, this opportunity of choosing their companions is of infinite value. No man can remain uninfluenced by his surroundings. Habits of mind and feeling, like habits of body, are fixed by frequent use. There is nothing more refining than frequent conversation with a friend who is himself refined in thought and speech. If I read in a book of some vile character who makes a coarse joke, or swears some brutal oath, it is very likely that those degrading words may stick in my memory and be an ugly sore there for many years, not to be got rid of by any effort of will. In the same way the grand inspiring words of a great soul, or the touching example of a very tender one, may be to me for ever after sources of strength and safety. The power exercised by books in providing companions for us is so great and so easily abused that it would not be surprising if some future House of Commons should recognise the risk and put restraint upon it. There are probably some 20,000 English novels in existence. If on an average each introduces its readers to only five distinct personalities, we shall have among them 100,000 men and women from whom to select such friends as we desire. Friends of this sort we may have always with us when once selected. We may commune with them as often as we like, and as we grow more and more familiar with them, the tendencies of our lives will be gradually moulded by their examples. In this wide field there are, thank heaven, a large number of the very noblest characters. Such men and such women as in the living world are thinly and distantly scattered, so that they could not by any possibility be brought together at one time. Yet in books you may have them all in your own room at once, and mix with them as an equal. What an inspiring prospect! In all your varying moods there will be some ready to befriend you; the bright, cheerful, optimistic spirits to share your joy, the tender and sympathetic for your comfort in distress; the man of masterly action to stir your energies, the deep religious thinker to rise with you into the loftiest regions of philosophy. To what mental elevation may not a man attain who spends some of his daily hours in such good company! Let us be thankful to those writers who provide us with these admirable friends. And we may well wonder why any writers should be excluded from that category. They all claim to be artists, but they differ as to the artist's duty to the world. Some think it sufficient to copy nature just as they see it with their un instructed eyes. Some believe that they can frighten the world into virtue by the horrible details of vice. And some care only to startle or amuse the public so that their books shall sell. The great name of Art is terribly degraded by these shallow and self-seeking followers. Properly understood, Art is the revealer of beauty and right, one of the greatest of all teachers, preachers, and prophets. The admiration of beauty and the reverence for right are among the loftiest emotions of the human mind. It is Art's mission to cultivate these emotions by all her manifold means and graces, to keep us familiar with the beautiful and the good, to baptize us into the worship of them, and to stir the deepest springs of that worship as she only can. The artists who give her their souls as well as their hands, who carry out her mission with earnest purpose, these are the men and women to whom we owe all honour and gratitude. Let us endeavour to judge all art work by this standard, to admire only such pictures as have in them something of the beautiful and the noble, to read only such novels as take us into good company.

THE MARTINEAU AND AVIEMORE.

To any friends within fifty miles of London, who want a quiet morning of pure pleasure, we would say, by all means go to the Modern Gallery, 61, New Bond-street, during this coming fortnight. There Miss Gertrude Martineau and Miss Edith Martineau, A.R.W.S., are showing a collection of their pictures, nearly 200 water-colours in all, and Saturday, March 17, is the last day.

That Dr. Martineau's two artist daughters should produce this collection of pictures, a very large proportion of them scenes about their highland home at Aviemore, will give to the exhibition a very special interest for many of our readers; but quite apart from the personal association, we venture to say that any lover of the Highlands, and of really beautiful work in water-colour, may have here a delightful time. There is variety enough. It is a pleasant little gallery, and there are comfortable seats. One can pass from scene to scene and enjoy the sense of space in the broad valley of the Spey, and the great sweep of the hills; one can look far over the Rothiemurchus forest, or linger among the woods, or in the hayfields by the Polchar, or by the shores of lovely Loch-an-Eilan. Here are masses of flowers, or rugged old firs on the mountain side; there one looks across to the snow-clad hills in early summer, or into a glory of autumn colour. One of Miss Gertrude Martineau's pictures is called "Midnight in June, Aviemore" (64). One sees the dark fir trees quite distinctly, and beyond them a distant hill. The sky is clear, and full of subdued light, and on the horizon is an unmistakable ruddy glow. So it is, just as in Norway. It is really not night at all, only a long twilight, and soon the sun will be up again.

The exact number of the pictures is 186, and of these 107 are the work of Miss Gertrude Martineau, 79 of her sister.

Miss Edith Martineau has painted less in the Highlands, if one may judge by this exhibition, although she also clearly delights in that glorious country. Among her pictures some of the most charming are in Surrey, Kent, or Herefordshire. There are one or two Italian scenes, a number of flowers, exquisitely painted, some figure pictures, and two beautiful portraits.

Miss Gertrude Martineau also has a few other pictures. Some of Norway, at Bergen, Molde and Tromsø, and on the Hardanger, and some glimpses of the sea and the splendid rocks of Sark. But of her pictures, at least eighty are of the country about Aviemore. From the dates, they cover a period of at least twenty years, and indeed from 1877, the Polchar was Dr. Martineau's summer home. In two of the pictures one gets a glimpse of the house, and in the whole series a rich feast of that beauty in which he so greatly delighted. One can understand how he and his children loved that summer home. Would that some enthusiast would make a book of it, using these pictures, after the manner of Mrs. Allingham's "Happy England," and so preserve for us the special interest, and some part, at least, of the delight of this exhibition!

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

You remember in the parable of the Prodigal Son how the young man, when he had wasted all that his father had given him in selfish and evil pleasures, was alone in a strange land, very miserable and ashamed.

Now think how it is with you, though you have not gone away from home, but are living there with the others, and yet have done something very like what that young man did. Suppose you have got into the way of being thoroughly selfish, caring only for your own pleasures, and have been betrayed into doing some mean or cruel thing, or, because you were not on your guard, have been carried away by some blind impulse of unworthy passion, and have disgraced yourself and those you love. Then you see what you have done, how shameful it is, how you have wronged the love that has given you all you have, how you have insulted that inward law of right, the Divine law, through which alone, through the obedience of father and mother and children all together, the home love is pure and strong.

Your disobedience has made you a stranger in your own home. It cuts you off from the others, from the happy confidence of home. The light of gladness is gone out of your life. You cannot look the others frankly in the face. You are bitterly ashamed and wretched.

For you, as for that young man in the parable, there is only one way, unless you are to go from bad to worse, and give yourself up altogether to that other strange world of evil and wretchedness. You must go back. Though it does not mean a journey for you, it means doing a difficult and painful thing; you must get back into your true place in the home life, in obedience to the inward law.

Does it seem too difficult, and are you too much ashamed? Go to your father, and tell him of your shame and penitence. Whatever you have done, you must not be afraid of him. Tell him about it, or tell Mother, for they are both together in this; it is one love, which, however grieved and hurt, is still perfect love, which will help you back into your true place. What they want is that you should grow up brave and true, with self-control, with generous thoughts and feelings, with your life unspoiled by anything hurtful and impure. You are learning with them what obedience means. Do not be afraid that love can change or give up caring for you, or helping you to overcome the evil with good. Perhaps, when you have gone to your father and told him, you will feel as if you could not bear to have him be so kind and gentle with you. That is part of the penalty. Let it be like a cleansing fire in your heart.

Then when you are once more at home, in the true sense, with no cloud of wilful wrong separating you from the perfect love which forgives and makes you strong for what is true and good, you will find that there is something more. The home love is one with the love of our Father in heaven. That is what Jesus meant in the parable. The happy trust of obedience and home, putting righteousness first in perfect love, is part of that obedience to the inward law, in which we learn to have our true life with God.

PROGRESSIVE THEOLOGY.

DR. HEBER NEWTON, lately rector of All Souls' Church, New York, who has long been known as one of the most broad-minded of Episcopal clergymen, contributes an article to the current number of the Hibbert Journal on "The Outcome of the Theological Movement of our Age." It is very frank in its recognition of the revolutionary changes effected by the widening experience and progressive thought of the past hundred years in the point of view occupied by many earnest religious thinkers—changes which must compel not merely a revision of the creed of the orthodox Christian Churches, but an entirely new conception of the place of dogma in religion. The permanent elements of religious experience are clearly distinguished from transient forms of thought, and from this broad survey of the field one can see what are the true foundations of faith, and along what lines one must look for the further progress of religious thought and life. In his estimate of the influences that have been at work, Dr. HEBER NEWTON sets Commerce and Travel and Democracy side by side with Physical Science, Biblical Criticism, and the Comparative Study of Religion, and the result is that the old distinction between one true religion and all other religions as false is completely broken down, the old conception of miracle is abandoned for a profounder view of the reign of Divine law, in which, amid the familiar order, one may have "glimpses into higher realms of law," and theology is seen to be of necessity progressive, because it is an expression of the growing thought and life of man in relation to the spiritual realities of the Universe. "Creeds that do not change, either in their letter or their spirit, can be no true creeds." So also we read, "Inspiration is coming to be seen not as the monopoly of a race or of a church, but as the experience of mankind; not as a something merely extra-natural, but as the inner secret of life itself."

The general direction of the theological movement of our age Dr. HEBER NEWTON describes in the following passage:—

"That movement is away from all that is partial and narrow and arbitrary and mechanical and exceptional and irrational and unethical in theology, toward that which is universal, necessary, natural, orderly, rational, free, progressive, ethical, and spiritual. It leads in a direction diametrically opposite to the conception of Christianity as the one true religion, miraculous in its birth, extra-natural in its institutions, infallible in its sacred books, fixed and final in its creeds, imposing an external authority from which no appeal can be taken to the courts of reason and conscience. It heads straight for the conception of Christianity which finds in it one among the religions of humanity, although the highest of them, the main stem of the religion which roots in the spiritual nature of man and of the cosmos, and which sucks up into itself the ethical forces of man and of the universe; the flowering forth of the one life of humanity, which takes on different forms in the varying types of ethnic religions. It is away from the conception of religion as a something separable from the rest of human life, growing out of other faculties than those which manifest themselves in the activities of earth, creating a sphere for itself other than that of the sacred secularities of society. It is moving towards a conception which finds in religion the burgeoning and blossoming of all the faculties of man; the life of the imagination, the reason, the affections and the conscience at their full; taking up into itself and expressing the secrets of poetry and art and science and philosophy and sociology, as knowledge grows transfigured into reverence, as beauty exhales in worship, and goodness becomes the sacrament of the indwelling Life of the cosmos."

The article then goes on to show how this new conception of religion must affect the central doctrines of the Christian Church. We have to look for what is universal in these doctrines. What is permanently human will endure. "The Church will remain—an institution of humanity, the highest institute of humanity and the most divine, since it is the institute of the spiritual life of mankind." And that life rests on the two fundamental doctrines of the Catholic creeds, the doctrine of God and the doctrine of immortality, to be recognised not as the exclusive possession of Christendom, but as the common possession of mankind. "It will be seen," says Dr. NEWTON, "that every great religion has issued in monotheism—the doctrine of the unity of God, His spirituality, His character as a just and beneficent being." And then follows a curious passage, which does not appear to us very lucid, in which it is claimed that the doctrine of the Trinity, which is "in no sense whatever a distinctively Christian doctrine," but "was evolved in almost every great religion of antiquity," is "the necessary thought-form in which the recognition of the variety in unity of the Divine Being must needs be cast by the human intellect." One would like to see that claim elaborated with special reference to the religion of Israel and of Islam. But what Dr. HEBER NEWTON is chiefly concerned to show is that there is a universal meaning at the heart of all the great Christian doctrines. ("The Trinity," we might be inclined to suggest, is not a vital doctrine at all, but an abortive attempt to unify several doctrines, which cannot be so compelled into an artificial form without the sacrifice of spiritual truth.) In the doctrine of the Incarnation, "the heart of the Christian creeds," he finds universal human truth and the key to the riddle of life. In all mankind, in varying degree, the Soul of the Universe is coming to expression, and in CHRIST Dr. HEBER NEWTON recognises "the Supreme Man, the man in whom the goodness which is the heart of the creation lived forth perfectly." "In him the human ideal will continue to be reverently seen embodied, that ideal after which our human lives are to pattern themselves in all loving loyalty. In His mirroring eyes coming generations will read the secret of the universe, and see in the Power in which 'we live and move and have our being'—'Our Father which art in Heaven.'"

This is what the experience of coming generations has to prove. The new outlook upon religion shows spiritual truth everywhere recognised in varying degree, not in Christian circles only, but among the Theists of India, the Hebrews and Moslems of many lands, the thoughtful people of Japan, and in "Christian" countries by those who take their stand apart from the special lines of Christian thought. What we have to do is to live out our own best life fearlessly and faithfully, with open mind and heart, and among the multitudinous voices of this modern time, in which all lands and races are brought so much nearer to one another than ever before, see to it that the voice of Christian truth shall speak with clearness, sincerity, and earnestness, to be judged whether it be indeed the highest truth of God, with fullest measure of help for all the needs and aspirations of mankind. That truth must be its own witness, in the lives of those who hold it and are possessed by it. It can no longer claim any external authority, or superior credentials (unless it be in the fuller measure of spiritual life), for those others also have the witness of the Spirit. The ideal of the true manhood in CHRIST, the most perfect fellowship of spirit with the Eternal, must be made a living power in the lives of the men and women of to-day, and in contact with all the facts of the world as it is. Then in the lives of faithful men Truth will prosper, and in the midst of all changing forms of thought, and the progress of knowledge, if there is at the same time the growth of a true humanity, there will be the quietness and confidence of those whose strength is in the living God.

ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING.

B.—MARCH 6, 1806. D.—JUNE 29, 1861.

SHE who knew so well how to declare the glory of the poets of Queen Elizabeth may well be entitled to bear, for all time, the royal honour of being known as the "Queen Elizabeth" of the poets. We may say of her as she said of Shakespeare: "Take faults, take excellences, it is impossible to characterise this Shakespeare by an epithet. Shakespeare! the name is the description." Elizabeth Barrett Browning! the name is the description. She was the glory of two countries, and linked, as no name before has ever been, to the glory of the foremost poet of the age; the full blaze of their glories no wise dimming each other's, but blending, and seeming to the common gaze of men indissolubly one. This seems to us the portion and the position of Elizabeth Barrett Browning amongst the poets of England. Milton had said that a poet's life should be a poem, and she added that a poet's poetry should be his life; and both truths are eminently true of her. Nor could she conceive of that high vocation without strenuous preparation. A poet she was of much Latin and more Greek, and we may say of her, as she valiantly said of Ben Jonson, "not the worse for her learning." For genius is at home anywhere, and neither doth much learning make it mad, nor is a little knowledge a dangerous thing. Elizabeth, like Robert Browning, was nothing if not a poet. She was a believer in the ancient dictum that "nobody can be a poet who is anything else." And, lest we should seem to be wilfully committing a paradox, we hasten to meet those who are inclined to think that either of the Brownings was metaphysical first and poetical afterwards, with the explicit disclaimer of Mrs. Browning herself. "We have said nothing," she said, speaking of Cowley, "of the metaphysical poet," because we disclaim the classification, and believe, with Leigh Hunt, that every poet, inasmuch as he is a poet, is a metaphysician." On a certain occasion when a number of people were expressing what they considered the new needs of the age, Tennyson is related to have said that what we wanted was a new definition of God. As we read and re-read Mrs. Browning's most illuminating and impressive essay on "The Book of the Poets," and always in conjunction read her grand and inspiring poem, "A Vision of Poets," we are led to feel with her that the grandeur and worth of the work of the poets of any given time are proportioned to their gaze upon some new vision of God; or to their grasp, metaphysically, of some new definition of God. What they see and comprehend gloriously "inhabits" henceforth the swelling notes of their praise. And they endure hardship as the fitting condition of their high calling. Hence the greatest of the singing race might fitly apply to themselves Ovid's words, though not quite in Ovid's sense—

"Inde genus durum sumus experientesque laborum, Et documenta damus qua simus origine nati,"

but rather in Milton's sense, enduring to scorn delights and live laborious days.

It is curious and significant that no one troubles much to try and account for historians, scientists, philosophers, theologians or critics; but poets and poetry, makers and their making, creators and their creations are for ever the subject of men's intensest interest and undying curiosity. The poet and his poetry have to be accounted for. Men are ceaselessly attempting new definitions, propounding new theories and hypotheses. Not least interesting is it that nearly all the greatest poets have attempted themselves to define their vocation. Passages will readily occur to each one's memory; words from Sir Philip Sidney, or Shakespeare, or Milton, or Coleridge, or Keats, or Robert Browning, and many another; but we question whether, in spite of Mrs. Browning's own eulogy of old Daniel in his "Muscophilus," a more exhaustive or a nobler attempt was ever made to define or outline the position and calling of the poet than is made in these two works of Mrs. Browning's, written with a flame of loving knowledge, in both her poetical "A Vision of Poets," and her prose essay, "The Book of the Poets," the strenuous note a little tempered occasionally in this latter work by a ripple of laughter. For Mrs. Browning has her own bright, particular kind of humour. What more magnificent definition of poetry was ever given than is outlined and suggested by these two verses from the "Vision":—

"So works this music on the earth,
God so admits it, sends it forth
To add another worth to worth—

A new creation-blossom that rounds
The old creation and expounds
His Beautiful in tuneful sounds."

Nor does the grand allusion a little earlier to Lucretius anyway detract from this position, or necessarily contradict it, for the strenuous failure of Lucretius was but a disguised success:—

"Lucretius, nobler than his mood,
Who dropped his plummet down the broad
Deep universe and said, 'No God—'

Finding no bottom; he denied
Divinely the divine, and died
Chief poet on the Tiber-side,

By Grace of God."

The reference to this poem by Mrs. Browning herself in the Preface is most interesting, and presents in brief its "argument," "in which I have endeavoured," she writes, "to indicate the necessary relations of genius to suffering and self-sacrifice. In the eyes of the living generation" (the Preface was written in 1844) "the poet is at once richer and poorer than he used to be; he wears better broadcloth; but speaks no more oracles: and the evil of this social incrustation over a great idea is eating deeper and more fatally into our literature than either readers or writers may apprehend fully. I have attempted to express in this poem my views of the mission of the poet, of the self-abnegation implied in it, of the great work involved in it, of the duty and glory of what Balzac has beautifully and truly called 'la patience angélique du génie,' and of the obvious truth, above all, that if knowledge is power, suffering should be acceptable as a part of knowledge."

Everybody, of course, reads or has read "Aurora Leigh," the "Cry of the Children," the "Casa Guidi Windows," and perhaps much else; but, lest anyone should not have read either the "Vision of Poets" or the "Book of the Poets," "we confess humbly, before gods and men, that we never read" anything in this kind finer or more inspiring and illuminating. In her masterly treatment of the five eras of English poetry—let the names Chaucer, Spenser, Cowley, Dryden, Cowper suffice to suggest the eras—we learn, through her insight and loving irony (for she is tender even with the worst, if only a gleam of poetry has played upon some dull, cold peak), we learn to discern between life and good in poetry and death and evil. We learn, incidentally, too (and it has its own interest in relation to peculiarities of her own rhymes), something of the source of her contempt for the idol-worship of rhyme. "Among the elder poets the rhyme was only a felicitous adjunct, a musical accompaniment, the tinkling of a cymbal through the choral harmonies. You heard it across the changes of the pause, as an undertone of the chant, marking the time with an audible indistinctness, and catching occasionally and reflecting the full light of the emphasis of the sense in mutual elucidation. But now, 'Away with all pauses'—said the reformers—'except the legitimate pause at the tenth rhyming syllable. O rhyme, live for ever! Rhyme alone take the incense from our altars, tinkling cymbal alone be our music!' And so arose, in dread significance, the Heart-and-impart men." Her judgments of the poets are always helpful. Sometimes they are portrayed with a few skilful strokes, but each stroke is a trail of light. And it cannot be said of this "Book," comparatively short though the essay is, as she said of Johnson's "Lives of the Poets," that he "wrote the lives of the poets and left out the poets." Speaking of Butler and his "Hudibras," she says, "Butler's business was the business of desecration, the exact reverse of a poet's; and by the admission of all the world his business is well done. He is the genius of his class, the natural enemy to poetry under the form of a poet; not a great man, but a powerful man." And, speaking of the unpopularity at first of Wordsworth, how much is made clear by such a luminous sentence as this: that "the opinion went that the daily heartbeat was more obnoxious in poetry than the incidental palpitation. Poor Byron (true miserable genius and soul-blind great poet) ministered to this singular need, identifying poetry and passion. . . . His poems discovered not a heart, but the wound of a heart; not humanity, but disease; not life, but a crisis." After alluding to Pope, and how afterwards "sick to faintness grew the poetry of England," mentioning humorously Anna Seward, "by'r lady," the "muse," and Mr. Hayley the "Bard," and Hannah More, and Helen Williams and Rosa Matilda and Lady Millar, she says, "the followers were not as the master," and whimsically laughs at the difference of dignity between "the Popes and the Pope Joans." But she points to it all as only a temporary declination—"Though ye have lien among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold." The "Book" concludes with a fine estimate and appreciation of Wordsworth. Quoting first that one line of Sir Philip Sidney which she elsewhere calls "the completest Ars Poetica extant"—

"Foole, sayde my Muse to mee, looke in thine heart, and write"— she continues, "and not only, we must repeat, at feast times, fast times, or curfew times, not only at times of crisis and emotion, but at all hours of the clock; for that which God thought good enough to write, or permit the writing of, on His book, the heart, is not too common, let us be sure, to write again in the best of our poems. William Wordsworth wrote these common things of nature, and by no means in a phraseology nor in a style." The sun arose, and England became again a nest of singing birds.

"Sola quam diligunt Di,

Uprose the sunne, and uprose Emilie."

E. L. H. THOMAS.

THE paper contributed by Dr. Tony André, of Florence, to the third International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, held at Geneva, entitled "Pourquoi le protestantisme a fait peu de progrès," met with criticism in the Italia Evangelica of January 6, 1906, at the hands of Signor P. Calvino. To this criticism Dr. Tony André replied in the two following numbers of the Italia Evangelica. These articles are now reproduced and published in pamphlet form with the Italian title, "Perché il protestantesimo fece pochi progressi in Italia." The pamphlet is an attempt to explain more fully certain points that seemed to challenge criticism in his paper before the International Congress. Perceiving that his critic had confused Liberal Christianity with Rationalism, Dr. Tony André institutes a comparison between the two in order to prevent, if possible, any further misconception. His main point is that the Rationalists are intellectualists, if we may so venture to render his "intellectuali," whilst the Liberals are Spiritualists, of course in no table-turning sense, except it be in the way he so turns the tables on his critic. Dr. André dwells on the distinction at some length, maintaining, amongst other things, that the Rationalists begin with a tabula rasa ignoring the religious heritage of the past, and building up a new system by the sole aid of syllogisms. The Spiritualists, on the other hand, owe a debt to the past, and with jealous care gather all the authentic testimonies of religious experience. They study them and examine them, accepting some and rejecting others, guided by the light of the moral and divine faculty within us. The Rationalist is a philosopher; the Spiritualist, a religious being, seeking after God without any human mediation. In Italy, the classic ground of the Renaissance, as in this country, misconception and misrepresentations, springing either out of wilfulness or ignorance, impede the progress of simpler conceptions of the life and teachings of Jesus.

THERE is no service like his who serves because he loves.—Sir Philip Sidney.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS AT THE BENARES THEISTIC CONFERENCE.

BY PUNDIT S. N. SASTRI.

III.

HAVING spoken of the further difficulties members of the Theistic church have to face through their disregard of the rules of caste, and other questions of local difficulty, Mr. Sastri continued:—

But while briefly noticing the criticisms of outside observers, I do at the same time feel that if the Theistic Church of India were internally strong no opposition from outside could defeat its objects. Even the crushing weight of the Roman power was not adequate for the purpose of extinguishing primitive Christianity, the persecuting energy of the Mogul Empire was of no avail in killing Sikhism; the fire and sword of modern Persia has not put a stop to Babism; the relentless and ever-awake energy of Russian persecution has not curbed the strength of the Stundists; and last of all American persecution has not been able to quite suppress Mormonism. Thus everywhere in the world force has proved itself to be an ineffectual remedy against human conviction. I repeat again, if the Theistic Church of India were internally strong no external opposition could defeat its objects. Let us confess that we are internally weak, that our theism has not yet taken firm hold of our domestic and social lives; that it is not such a thing to all of us for which we can lay down our lives; that our love for it is not so great that it can enable us to rise above petty quarrels, and to combine for the furtherance of its cause; that even our leading men, in critical moments have failed to hold aloft its banner; and lastly, that many of us have failed to maintain that high standard of moral excellence which a pure and spiritual faith like ours demands.

We have not to seek very far the cause of the misunderstanding against us. Our critics complain and justly complain, that we are exclusive. I can speak for Bengal Brahmoism, which remarks may not apply to other provinces. There was a time in our province when members of the Samaj took prominent lead in all public movements. Of female education they were the prominent supporters all over the country, of philanthropic movements they were the originators, but somehow or other, they have silently surrendered their prominent position in these matters, and are daily falling behind, exclusively confining themselves to the work directly connected with the Samaj. The process of this falling back has been slow but steady. Social exclusiveness as is instanced by the case of the Russian Jews is sure to engender popular prejudice, and much of the popular prejudice against the Theistic Church is, perhaps, due to this cause.

After having candidly confessed our weakness let me turn to the question of propagation. Here we are faced by the fundamental question—Is Theism to live as a pervasive influence or as a militant Church? Many ideas may live, germinate and spread without any organisation behind them to push them on. Darwin's theory of evolution, for instance, has spread itself far and wide, has entered into every region of thought, without any organisation behind it to propagate it, or without any body of missionaries to carry its light forward. Will Theism live and propagate itself like that, as the esoteric philosophies of ancient India, of ancient Greece and Rome did once propagate themselves? The plain answer to that question is that modern Theism, at least the Theism we profess and practice, is no mere theory, with which the intellect alone is concerned; it involves principles of action, which require personal contact and active combination of individuals similarly disposed to enforce them. Darwin's evolution may not have any special organisation behind it, but the principles of Temperance, or Vegetarianism, required strong and active organisations to push them on. Similarly the corn-laws could not be abolished, and the principle of Free Trade acknowledged without the Anti-Corn Law League behind them; slavery could not be done away with without a strong combination for its abolition. Let us remember, modern Theism is no mere philosophical theory, but has to fight against some corruptions and to strive for the adoption of some improved principles; consequently it must live as a militant Church. About this let there be no doubt, and let there be no shirking of responsibility. Add to this the consideration that every reformatory religion, in the history of the world, has also been a missionary religion. Buddhism arose out of non-missionary Hinduism as a reforming body, and it promptly became a missionary religion; Christianity arose out of non-progressive Judaism, and it tried to carry its banner far and wide. Mahomedanism rose out of non-missionary Arabian idolatry, and it tried to carry the fire of its new faith unto the remotest parts of the world. That has been a fact of history. Now the question is has modern Theism any reformatory mission? Who will say it has not? Then of necessity it must agree to live as a propagandist faith. It can live and prosper and be effective only through propagation. Lack of enthusiasm in this respect, means agreeing to die. I cannot too urgently press this question of propagation on your attention. But to pledge ourselves to propagation means to keep up an agency for the same purpose. One thing involves the other. Propagation may be carried on by various means; through the public press, through getting up lectures and discourses, through adoption of other traditional methods of popular instruction; but above all, the services of a devoted body of men, going about strengthening fellow-believers in their struggles, and securing new converts by their precepts and examples, are eminently useful for that purpose. To keep up a missionary body also involves the keeping up of an institution for their training.

I cannot attach too great importance to this part of our work. Men who are sent out to be instructors of the people, to be guiding lights to them, should previously undergo a training in their peculiar art—the art of preaching. They should be well-informed on the subject of theology, specially the theology of their own country. What a vast field does India offer to the student of the science of religion, what a precious lore of religious thoughts lies near at hand? How can a man be a successful teacher of religion without mastering them?

It is a pity that owing to the absence of a theological college of our own, we have to send our young men to foreign lands for liberal theological education. As one of their first acts, the Unitarians of England founded a college for the theological education of their would-be ministers, the present Manchester College. They have amply reaped the benefits of that institution. It has given to the world some of the most advanced leaders of religious thought, and has supplied a succession of able, and intelligent ministers who have raised the Unitarian body to a high level of culture, purity and spirituality. It is necessary therefore that you should seriously consider the question of establishing an institution for missionary training, that would combine the culture of the East and West.

Thus it will be seen, that if we once address ourselves earnestly to the question of propagation we are landed in great responsibilities. To shirk them is to give up the cause of Theism in India. My earnest request to you all is that you, brethren, should not part from this gathering without discussing, as earnest and responsible persons, this question of propagation.

But some one, perhaps, will tell me that if Theism lives as a propagandist faith it is sure to live as a sect, and cannot hope to unite the conflicting races of this land. When Rammohun Roy opened the first house of prayer, he did not aim at a militant Church, but wanted to raise a common meeting-ground for all sects where they may come together and worship the common Father. The idea, though original and glorious, is difficult of achievement, and has not been realised. It has been found from actual experience that the Theistic Prayer House, is a meeting ground for those alone who have shaken off their old beliefs and are secret sympathisers with its principles. If the disintegrating influences of modern education go on, increasing numbers will certainly want some platform where they may come together and worship the All-Father. The Theistic Church should organise services in every important centre, for such classes and popular methods should be used to take the light to the masses. As India shakes off her superstitions of the past, and marches towards a glorified future, she will surely find the home for her spiritual life in this spiritual worship of God. Let us all zealously strive towards this future.

Therefore let me conclude by urging upon you, brethren, the necessity for our combining to propagate our faith with renewed vigour. Time has come when you should all combine to rescue our cause from its condition of weakness and decline by infusing new spirit into the body itself, by combined and earnest prayer, by forgetting petty differences in the presence of great interests, by once more creating a spirit of self-sacrifice among our members, by taking active measures for increasing the present missionary body and by training new workers, by once more carrying the light far and wide, and by renewing your exertions in all directions in the spirit of the familiar saying—"a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull all together." We have arrived at a critical point of time when a new revival of the whole movement is needed. There are signs of awakening of the national mind in all directions. A Nation is rising; new aspirations are taking possession of the Indian mind. In spite of the rooted conservatism of our people, we are moving on, shaking off the old fetters. The awakened masses are like persons carried forward by a stream, trying to clutch at everything that offers a hope of deliverance. There is want of true leadership in the path of reform. If there ever was a time for a reforming body like ours the time is come now. Will you lag behind at such an important time, surrendering to others the work that God gave you to perform? No; let every heart present here look up to God and say—No. Let us not separate without a resolve in every individual breast to do everything that lies in his or her power to promote a revival of the cause. Yes, a revival is necessary. Take heart, never despair. Believe me, I once more repeat, we are in safe hands. An All-wise Providence is taking care of us, and always befriending our humble endeavours. Strengthened by that conviction let us join shoulder to shoulder, heart to heart, and press on to the goal that lies before us.

THE Sunday-school Association have just published a cheap edition of Dr. Drummond's Commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians, and have presented a copy to the senior students of the theological colleges of Great Britain. They accompanied the gift with an offer to send other copies to any college student applying for the book, with the result that 885 volumes have been applied for. Nearly all denominations are included in the list of the thirty colleges making applications—Church of England, Congregational, Wesleyan, Roman Catholic, Baptist, Calvinistic Methodist, Presbyterian. It would seem from this that the broadening tendencies noticeable among churches generally towards more liberal views in theology are alive and moving among the coming generation of ministers and teachers.

THE Scottish Wholesale Co-operative Society is considering a large scheme for securing a supply of wheat direct from Canada from its own land. It is proposed that 100,000 acres shall be bought from the Saskatchewan Land Company for the purpose. The recent developments of the two wholesale societies in the purchase of estates in the colonies and foreign countries, may be the means of a great increase in the forces of international co-operation. But the underlying principle of the movement requires that the workers on the various estates, and in the many factories owned by the wholesale societies, should experience the advantages of profit sharing. Otherwise, these large enterprises have little to distinguish them from the extensions of ordinary trading companies avowedly existing for the profit of their shareholders.

INWARD sanctity, pure love, disinterested attachment to God and man, obedience of heart and life, sincere excellence of character, this is the one thing needful, this the essential thing in religion.—Channing.

ORIGINS OF OLD TESTAMENT PROPHECY.

IN his second lecture, at Manchester, last week, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant took up the story of the history of Israel from the founding of the monarchy, and carried it forward through the period of the great literary prophets. And, first of all, as being essential to the understanding of the prophets, he inquired as to the sort of society which emerged under the monarchy. The inquiry showed that the Jews became an industrial people, that they erected large buildings which they would be required to furnish, and that if there was not much evidence of foreign trade, it was yet clear that the industrial arts of settled life flourished among them. And with this change from a nomadic to an industrial life there came to them the old, strange phenomenon of social progress. So soon as they settled down and wealth increased, so soon also did poverty and destitution begin to show themselves. The splendours of Solomon's reign was purchased at great cost. There was forced labour, heavy taxation, and harsh rule. Samaria, which later excelled the splendour of Solomon's time, showed the direst poverty by the side of its luxury. From Exodus it could be seen that there was slavery, kidnapping, usury, bribery; the poor, widows, destitute children, strangers, and all the destitute wreckage of a chaotic state abounded. The code of Hammurabi and the Tel el Amarna tablets, recently discovered, told the same tale of an older civilisation, many of the ideas and institutions of which lived on and were assimilated by the Hebrews. In all these matters the experience of the Hebrews was similar to that of their neighbours. The one peculiar feature in the Hebrew people was the rise of the prophetic voice, and the prophetic literature was their special contribution to the world's social studies. Prophetism was not absolutely peculiar to the Hebrew nation. There were diviners, soothsayers, seers, &c., in all the surrounding country. But among the Hebrews prophetism struck a new note of moral fervour and the passion of social righteousness unknown elsewhere. The prophets represented the growing life of the people; they declared the association of human affairs with the Divine purposes; they stood for a higher life and a purer worship. But they were not theologians; their real interest was humanitarian. They wanted to purify the people that they might be the better for it in their own lives. When, in the eighth century, Samaria seemed so strong and so full of promise, men like Hosea began to appear, men who could see beneath the outward show of prosperity, and were not to be deceived by outward splendour. They might think that all was well, but he saw that there was no truth in the land; "my people are destroyed for lack of knowledge"; the few were living in luxury, the mass in poverty, and this could not come to good. Then followed Amos, who came to the festival and denounced the king, declaring that God desired mercy and not sacrifices. Isaiah, the greatest of the literary prophets, a man of culture and high social position, laid down two principles which should govern Hebrew policy, viz., the isolation of its people from the interests of the world and the inviolability of Zion. But the prophets were not regarded with honour in their own time. Kings sometimes listened to them, sometimes defied them. Sometimes the people would hear, oftener they would deride, while the priests resented their intrusion. Prophecy continued, although the monarchy fell in the southern, as in the northern, kingdom. Yet it was not until long after that another great prophet arose fit to compare with those named. Then was born the greatest of all the line of Hebrew prophecy—Jesus of Nazareth.

REFERRING to the first of a series of articles on "Australian Education: An Object-lesson for England," by the Rev. W. H. Fitchett, B.A., LL.D., who is a Methodist, appearing in the Tribune, the following letter was published in Tuesday's issue:—

"SIR,—In Mr. Fitchett's article on 'Australian Education,' in your issue of Saturday last, there occurs a passage which seems to me to do a cruel injustice—no doubt unintentionally—to a not very numerous and sometimes much maligned religious body. In the section, 'Secularism Gone Mad,' we read: 'There are Jews and Unitarians in the community; so everything relating to Christianity must be turned out. The very name of Christ became in the schools a sound forbidden.'

"Now, to anyone with any acquaintance with Unitarianism this passage must be a puzzle. Unitarians do not object to Christianity, but, on the other hand, have always claimed the Christian name; maintaining, rightly or wrongly, that the teachings of Christ are Unitarian, and, as a consequence, theirs is the purest form of Christian doctrine. They do not object to Christ, but to certain doctrines which they think, again rightly or wrongly, to have no place in the Master's teaching.

"In every Unitarian hymnal there are hymns of which Christ is the subject. Some Unitarian liturgies are, so to speak, steeped in Christ. Unitarian preachers hold him up as, at the very least, the greatest of religious teachers and the highest example of manhood. There are, of course, many grades of thought in the community, but I cannot conceive even what are called the most 'advanced' carrying their opinions to the extreme indicated. To cap all, we are told of a verse in Longfellow's 'Wreck of the Hesperus,' which was 'solemnly cut out as infected,' and this, apparently, to satisfy the prejudices of the Jews and Unitarians. Yet the author of the poem was himself a Unitarian. Surely either Mr. Fitchett knows nothing whatever of Unitarians, or else the Australian Unitarian is a very different being from his English brethren.—I am, Sir, yours truly,
"A UNITARIAN LAYMAN."

February 26, 1906.

GOODNESS, purity, virtue, this is the only distinction in God's sight. This is intrinsically, essentially, everlastingly, and by its own nature, lovely, beautiful, glorious, divine. It owes nothing to time, to circumstance, to outward connections. It shines by its own light. It is the sun of the spiritual universe. It is God Himself dwelling in the human soul.—Channing.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

THE annual meeting was held at Essex Hall on Saturday evening, February 24. After tea and coffee and a social half-hour, the PRESIDENT, Mr. Alec. Barnes, took the chair, and welcomed the teachers present. He regretted that the attendance was not larger, and hoped that the teachers of the London schools would recognise the importance of that annual meeting.

Mr. ION PRITCHARD, the treasurer, presented his accounts, which showed an adverse balance of £7 17s. 3d., although the subscriptions, £18 10s., were rather more than last year. The cost of meetings, £13 2s. 10d., had not been met by the receipts (£9 11s. 8d.). The item for printing, £12 5s. 9d., was also heavier than before, a sign of greater activity in the work, which they could not regret. The accounts of the Southend Holiday Home showed the former adverse balance of £25 9s. 6d. reduced to £15 2s. Annual subscriptions had amounted to £83 10s., compared with £76 8s. in the previous year, but more was required.

Mr. R. A. WOODING, hon. secretary, read the annual report, which opened with an expression of gratitude to Mr. Barnes for his twenty years of service as secretary, and the satisfaction with which they had elected him president. During the year good work had been done in the various schools. In face of the growing tendency to remove religious teaching from the day schools, teachers were urged to be ready for new demands upon the Sunday schools, and seriously to consider their position in regard to school accommodation, the supply of teachers (of which there was a serious lack in many schools), and the methods and aims of teaching. During the year two Teachers' Conferences had been held, at Newton Green and Stamford-street, when several useful papers had been read and discussed, and four regular general meetings had been held, including the musical festival in April, when the banner had been awarded to the Brixton choir. The question of country holidays had been re-considered, and the committee had determined to take it up again so far as raising a central fund and making grants to schools. The actual arrangements in finding homes and sending the children would be left to the schools themselves. From past experience it was found that a fortnight's holiday cost 12s. per child. It was proposed to grant 7s. 6d. from the central fund, leaving 4s. 6d. to be found by the child's friends. Some 400 children from their schools had formerly been sent into the country, and they asked for a fund of £150. Miss Pearson had kindly undertaken to act as treasurer. At the Southend Home 140 guests had been received, the average length of stay being nine days, a considerable increase on the previous year. New subscriptions were urgently required to maintain the work. Mr. F. E. Allen had again organised the visiting of schools by members of the committee, with excellent results. One point noted was a need for improvement in the singing, and to this end the value of the musical festival was emphasised. The great advantage of oral teaching over the use of reading books was strongly insisted on. They had in their schools 3,647 scholars on the books, an increase of 94, but only 295 over sixteen, a decrease of 43. The teachers numbered 352, an increase of 5. It was noted with regret that only 9 of the 24 schools had morning as well as afternoon school. A new school at Plumstead had been added to the roll during the year. Mr. J. Murrow had furnished a very satisfactory report of the Southend Home.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the reports, regretted that they had only nine morning schools, for he thought the morning the best time for teaching, when the children were freshest. One cause of this defect was doubtless the lack of teachers. He suggested that they might form a register of occasional teachers willing to fill temporary gaps. He was addressing a body of devoted teachers, and had no intention of lecturing them, and would only beg them to use their influence with others and induce them to join in the good work. Their experience as teachers was that they themselves benefitted from the work quite as much as the children. Such teaching was an admirable discipline both for thought and character.

Mr. HOWARD YOUNG, in seconding the motion, hoped means would be found to make all their teachers read the report, that they might secure the help it would give them. In his own school one of the younger teachers had recently asked for some help in her teaching, and as a result six or eight of their teachers were now receiving regular training in the work from an experienced teacher. That was an example which might be followed in other schools.

Miss MARIAN PRITCHARD supported the motion, and expressed her pleasure at such a good report. She wished that in all the schools at their teachers' meetings "report of the delegate to the Sunday School Society" might be regularly put upon the agenda, and more attention paid to their work. As to the country holiday work, she was one of those who felt it was a pity for them to separate, when it was no longer necessary, from the larger movement, but experience had shown that their mission schools had been unable to secure help for all the children they wished to send, and that, more than anything, had induced them to take up again their separate effort. She referred to the holiday provided last year by the Bell-street Mission, in which children and teachers all went together, and thought it an example which other schools might follow. As to the Southend Holiday Home, it was not sufficiently known that it was open all the year round, and the quiet times away from the crowded season were best. Their meetings of "Teachers in Council" had led to a great improvement in the preparation of lessons. What was now required was increased knowledge of child nature. To this special attention would be drawn at the Oxford summer session, which was again to be held at Manchester College this year, from Thursday, June 28, to July 7, the following Saturday week. She strongly urged that at least one teacher from each of the London schools should be sent to Oxford. All who had been in previous years knew how delightful and helpful those meetings were.

Mr. JOHN HARRISON, on behalf of the London Domestic Mission Society, thanked them for taking up the Country Holiday work again.

Mr. F. W. TURNER, referring to the lack of teachers, thought that ministers did not do what they might in their preaching to create an individual sense of responsibility in their hearers, to induce young people to become teachers and engage in other church work. Teachers also in their own meetings should stimulate one another, and deepen the sense of the importance of this work, as being service not only of man but of God.

Miss TESCHEMACHER suggested that a drawing-room meeting might usefully be held, to call attention to this need.

The resolution having been unanimously passed, the officers and committee were then elected, the Rev. John Toye being elected president, and the treasurer and secretary re-appointed.

At the conclusion of the business the President gave a lantern lecture on a Visit to the Holy Land, showing the admirable slides provided by the Sunday School Association and using notes from Mr. Sunderland's lecture. Mr. F. E. Allen worked the lantern, and both gentlemen were cordially thanked.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

WALES.

It is not easy to give a satisfactory description of the present outlook of Unitarianism in Wales. The light and shade are unequally distributed—the shade, perhaps predominating. As was reported in our former letter, the revival has not blessed us with many recruits, and it seems to have produced such a recrudescence of orthodoxy in some neighbourhoods as not only to cause surprise, but also to bring no little trouble to our people. These recruits, who have been very much in evidence at the revival meetings, glory, many of them, in a blood and fire theology, and find their feelings best expressed in the Welsh hymns of a century and a half ago, which they sing with much fervour, carrying in them as they do that promise of a fire-escape policy which they cannot hope to get elsewhere, least of all in our Unitarian churches.

In some districts where such feelings are strong we cannot be surprised that there is a tendency to boycott Unitarians. Not to mention the common action taken by the Free Church Council—prevailing elsewhere—in reference to them, what will your readers think of such petty incidents as the following:—A certain deacon confessed that before the revival he reckoned Unitarians as Christians, but since he has ceased to do so, now considering them no better than atheists; a chapel, readily lent on a former occasion for a Unitarian musical festival, has been now refused. Young people who have dared to attend special Unitarian services, because they have been asking inconvenient questions at Sunday-schools, are warned of the great danger they incur of contracting heretical opinions. We have heard of one instance of the editor of a popular newspaper giving way to public opinion, and closing his columns to a regular gratuitous correspondent of six years' standing because he occasionally included extracts from Channing, Parker, Martineau, Stopford Brooke, &c. Wales, though very Radical in its politics, as will be recognised everywhere to-day, is extremely conservative in its theology; its language still forming a more effectual barrier against the spread of free religious thought than ever did Offa's Dyke against the inroads of the Saxon invader. As genuine Unitarians, however, we cannot brook its theology, which we look upon as a mere travesty of Paul's "things hard to be understood" (2 Pet. iii. 16), and therefore feel there is all the more reason why, even though but a small and insignificant band, we should stand firmly together at our little outposts, and there help to spread the light, ever on our guard against that spirit of dividing and hair-splitting which has been hitherto, perhaps, too much our use and wont.

Among the hopeful signs for the future, I think we may reckon the fact that so many of our congregations have felt encouraged to have their chapels rebuilt. At Lampeter, Ciliau, Merthyr, they have been completed, and beautiful and suitable structures they are in every respect; at Bwlchyladfa, Sychbant, and Pontypridd, the chapels are still in course of erection.

Sychbant, I may explain, is an outpost to the two churches under the pastorate of our venerable friend John Davies. It was started in the first instance as a Sunday-school for the convenience of the children of members living at a distance, and was held in a carpenter's shop, which had to be emptied of its contents every Saturday night to make room for the Sunday's convenience. This was done for some years. After a time a band of zealous workers were brought together, then came Sunday services, and ultimately the necessity for a religious home. There is no other place of worship within a radius of two miles. Through the generosity of a neighbouring landholder, Mr. Frank Morgan, of Blaenbleu, a churchman and a tutor at Keble College, Oxford, a site was secured for £10, large enough for a small cathedral, and on this it is intended to erect a chapel to accommodate two hundred, with vestry and keeper's house, at an estimated cost of £540. The congregation will do all the haulage, and they hope to collect £180 locally. The Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, who takes a great interest in the movement, has collected £200; for the remainder an appeal is being made to the generosity of the Unitarian public.

Our Pontypridd friends have not been so fortunate. To secure their site they had to purchase two houses, and the whole transaction has cost them £500. The estimated cost of the building is £800, towards which they have collected £200 among themselves; for the remainder they also must look for public help. From 1892 when this movement was first started by three young men (one of whom has since made some mark in the Unitarian ministry) the little band of workers, which has never been numerous and belongs mostly to the working class, has laboured under many difficulties, and led a wandering, homeless, kind of life, meeting sometimes in theatres, sometimes in halls, large or small, as they could get them, and now meet in a small upper room, which is at times so unconfortably crowded that they feel it has become a matter of life or death for them to seek a permanent home. The building is now under roof, and there is a strong desire to see it opened free of debt early in the autumn, so that they may start on their new life free from encumbrance.

Dr. Wm. Griffiths, whose power of initiative is great, did good work at Pontypridd, as well as at Pentre and Clydach Vale in the Rhondda Valley. To him the last two owe their existence. Pontypridd is now under the active management of Mr. Simon Jones. The Pentre pulpit (opened February 3, 1896) is vacant; Clydach Vale alone, with Tylorstown, a new and promising centre, being now under the pastoral oversight of Mr. Rhoslyn Davies. Bridgend, which is one of our oldest churches in Wales, and had Mr. Rees Price, father of Dr. Richard Price, as its minister (1697-1739), had been at a very low ebb, and practically dead for some time before Mr. David Rees undertook its charge, is now looking up under his fostering care. If the old dry bones show little sign of life Mr. Rees manages to dump fresh imports from north, east, west, and south. He has an approximate average of 100, and an attendance that runs sometimes to nearly 150. At Cardiff prospects are brighter, the various institutions are in a fairly vigorous condition. Mr. Whitaker gave a series of week-night lectures recently, in one of the elementary schools on Unitarianism, and finds they excited considerable interest. He is looking forward to having them repeated shortly in a different part of the city.

At Cwmbach, Dowlais, Pontypridd, Llwyn and Bwlch there are active young ministers from whom we may expect good work in the next few years. The rest of us, to the best of our ability, are trying to hold the fort, sometimes in the face of great odds. It is encouraging to learn that the attempt made in 1890 to establish a Unitarian congregation at Newport (Mon.) is now being renewed with much hope of success.

We have but little space left for the shady side of our picture: (1) The question of our vacant pulpits is a serious one. Besides Pentre, already mentioned, those at Gellionen, Aberdare (H.P.), Merthyr are vacant, and now Swansea must be added. This is, to my mind, a question of infinitely more importance than that of our "name," which is so often under discussion, and to so little purpose. (2) What will the new Government do with the Education Bill? Some of us fear that we, as Unitarians, will receive just as scant consideration from our Nonconformist brethren as they did from the Episcopal brethren; if so, then it is safe to prophesy the new Bill will not put an end to Passive Resistance. The dogma of the one is just as hateful and unjust to the Unitarian as the dogma of the other.

R. J. JONES.

TAKE care of the truth, and the errors will take care of themselves. You may destroy a hundred heresies, and yet not establish a single truth. But you may, by establishing a single truth, put to flight with one blow a hundred heresies.—Dean Stanley.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Atherton.—In Chowbent Chapel, on Sunday evenings, Rev. J. J. Wright has just concluded a series of timely lectures on (1) "Education as it was"; (2) "Education as it is"; (3) "Education as it may be." Mr. Wright is also giving on Sunday afternoons, to united gatherings of young people, a series of lectures on (1) "Why we are Christians"; (2) "Why we are Protestants"; (3) "Why we are Nonconformists"; (4) "Why we are Unitarians"; (5) "In what sense we may all be catholic."

Blackburn.—The Rev. Charles Travers, of Preston, presided over a meeting held in the Exchange Assembly Rooms on Thursday evening, February 22, when the establishment of a permanent church was considered. He explained that arrangements had already been made to continue the services until the end of September, with aid from the B. and F.U.A. In the autumn the appointment of a minister would be considered.

Bradford (New Mission).—On Sunday evening last the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones inaugurated a mission in connection with Chapel-lane Chapel, in the West Bowling Co-operative Hall. There was a large congregation, which consisted mainly of those who have recently seceded with the Rev. W. Rosling from the Ryan-street Congregational Church. At the close of the service a meeting was held to discuss the future of the mission, and earnest addresses were given by the four deacons—Messrs. Rigg, Mitchell, Hadfield, and Bolt.

Canterbury.—Friends will be sorry to hear that the Rev. C. A. Greaves is confined to his room with a rather severe attack of bronchitis, and will not be able to attend to any correspondence for the next month.

Congleton (Presentation).—On Thursday evening, Feb. 22, a "Social" was held in the school, at which occasion was taken to bid farewell to Miss Minnie A. Smith, eldest daughter of the minister, on the eve of her departure to her future home in Colombo, in the island of Ceylon. To mark their appreciation of her worth and work, in connection with the church and school, extending over more than eight years, her friends presented her with a diamond brooch and gold bracelet. The presentation was made by Mrs. W. Machin. Both Miss Smith and her father made feeling responses. The remainder of the evening passed away very enjoyably, with song, game, and dance. Other gifts have borne witness to the high regard in which Miss Smith is held by those among whom she has so long been an active worker.—Last Sunday the Rev. James Harwood visited the congregation on behalf of the B.F.U.A., and preached two inspiring sermons in the afternoon and evening. At the close of the latter service the annual congregational meeting was held, when the work of the past year was reported on, and the various officers were appointed. On the conclusion of the business, Mr. Harwood spoke helpful words, expressing the goodwill of the Association.

Dover.—The annual congregational meeting of Adrian-street Church was held on Feb. 20, the Rev. C. A. Ginever presiding. The treasurer's account showed a very satisfactory balance, and the secretary reported on the work done during the year. There was an increase in the Sunday-school and juvenile clubs, and the ladies' sewing guild was doing good work.

Dundee.—Services to celebrate the fortieth anniversary of the reinauguration of the Unitarian Christian Church were held on Feb. 18 and 25. On the former date a united service was held of the Sunday-school and congregation. On the 25th the Rev. W. G. Cadman, of Macclesfield, was the preacher, and also gave an address in the Sunday-school. On Monday evening the annual soiree was held, addresses being delivered by the minister, Rev. H. Williamson, Mr. J. Smeaton and Mr. Cadman. Mr. Cadman and Mr. Williamson were fellow-students at the Unitarian Missionary Board.

Horwich.—The annual business meeting was held on Saturday afternoon, Feb. 17, when a very successful year was reported, showing an increase in membership of 31 and in financial support. The bazaar held at the end of November and beginning of December, on behalf of the Independence and Guarantee Funds, showed substantial results. After tea an evening meeting was held, the Chairman of the Church Committee, Mr. C. J. P. Fuller, presided. Short congratulatory speeches were delivered by the Revs. E. E. Jenkins, of Walmesley; W. T. Bushrod, of Chorley; and Mr. Thomas Harwood, of Bolton; the last-named urged the desirability of a greater reading of the denominational literature. The minister, Rev. R. C. Moore, spoke of the work of the past, and the present, and for the future. Vocal and instrumental music was rendered during the speeches by one or two members of the choir. Hymn and prayer closed an encouraging meeting. On Sunday last, the 24th, the tenth anniversary of the opening of the present church building was held. The preacher at the morning service was the minister. The evening service was conducted by the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, of Bury, and there was a large congregation.

London: Stratford.—On Monday, Feb. 26, the children of the Walthamstow Band of Hope gave an admirable performance of the cantata, "A Happy Family." The room was full, over 200 persons being present, chiefly children.

Newchurch (Centenary Bazaar).—A bazaar to celebrate the centenary of the establishment of Bethlehem Church was opened on Wednesday, Feb. 28, by Mr. G. H. Leigh, of Monton, Mr. R. D. Darbishire presiding. The aim of the bazaar was to raise £1,000 to renovate the church, build a vestry, and liquidate a debt. The receipts on the first day amounted to £770. We must reserve a fuller report for next week.

Portsmouth: St. Thomas street.—On Wednesday evening, February 21, a lecture was given in connection with the newly-formed Young People's Social Union, by Mrs. Timmins, widow of the late Rev. T. Timmins, formerly of Portsmouth, and one of the founders of the Universal Mercy Band. Mr. T. Bond presided. The lecture, which was descriptive of visits to America, and of the work of the Bands of Mercy, was much appreciated.

Sheffield: Upperthorpe.—Mr. John Harwood, of Manchester, gave a grand recital of Charles Dickens' "Cricket on the Hearth" to a large audience in the Channing Hall (which had been kindly lent for the occasion) on Saturday evening last. The recital was in aid of Upperthorpe Chapel, and was very much enjoyed by those present. Rev. A. H. Dolphin presided, and at the close of the proceedings a very hearty vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Harwood, on the proposal of Rev. C. J. Street, seconded by Mr. W. R. Stevenson. This is the third recital Mr. Harwood has given at Sheffield, and each time the audience has been larger than the preceding one.

Southampton (Welcome Meeting).—In connection with the quarterly meeting of the Southern Unitarian Association held in the Church of the Saviour on 15th ult., a social meeting was held to welcome the Rev. T. R. Skemp, the newly-appointed minister. The meeting was held in the Kell Memorial Schools, and a goodly number of friends attended, amongst them being representatives of most of the congregations in the district. The chair was taken by Mr. T. Isted, who, in addition to his many acts of kindness to the church, has made himself responsible for the pulpit services for the last twelvemonths, and who on the part of the congregation expressed a very hearty welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Skemp on their coming to Southampton. Mrs. Spencer having also spoken on behalf of the members of the church, the Rev. C. C. Coe, president of the Southern Association, welcomed Mr. Skemp as a new worker in the district. Rev. H. M. Livens, Mrs. Cogan Conway, and other friends having added their words of encouragement, the Rev. T. R. Skemp replied and expressed his gratitude for the kindly welcome given. He would not promise great things, but he would do his best. In town matters he should try and take his part with others, and endeavour to make Unitarian Christianity a living power in the community.

Southend-on-Sea (Welcome Meeting).—We referred last week to the welcome accorded to Mr. Delta Evans, as minister at the annual congregational meeting of February 21. Among those who took part in the meeting were the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, who presided; Revs. F. Allen and F. Summers; Dr. B. C. Ghosh, Mr. H. G. Chancellor, Mr. Reveirs (printer of the Christian Life), and Professor B. Nathssen, who remarked that as his first public appearance in this country had been at Southend, so he appeared that evening for the last time before his return to India. He spoke warmly of Mr. and Mrs. Evans, and wished them all prosperity in the work. Mr. T. Sloman and C. W. Oldland spoke on behalf of the congregation, and Mr. Evans made suitable response. A good report of the proceedings appeared in the local Standard.

South Shields.—The annual meeting of the congregation of Unity Church was held on Sunday evening, the 18th ult., when there was a good attendance. The report showed a satisfactory record of work, considering the disadvantage of being without a resident minister. The most notable feature of the year was a course of week-night lectures, by the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, president of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association; G. A. Ferguson, Gateshead; and Frank Walters, of Newcastle, on doctrinal subjects. The attendances at public services, though not large, have been regular. The Sunday-school is the most flourishing institution of the Church, thanks to a devoted band of teachers.

I THINK that the first condition of any permanent hold on truth is this: that the truth itself should be live enough and large enough to open constantly and bring to every new condition through which we pass some new experience of itself. The truth that is narrow and partial we outgrow; only the truth that is broad and complete grows up into us and can be kept. The one is like the clothes of childhood that are cast aside; the other is like the live body that grows up with the growing soul, and at each stage offers it a fit instrument for its work and a fit medium through which to receive its education.—Phillips Brooks.

It is one of the saddest things in the history of Christendom that the communion of the Holy Spirit was violated for the sake of daring speculations which lie far beyond the reach of human understanding, and that religious faith was sacrificed to intellectual definitions. When the Holy Spirit is really a power in their hearts men are drawn to one another in brotherly love, and cannot be divided, because their imperfect thoughts see with varying clearness and range into the mysteries of eternal being. All our bigotry is simply a proof of our spiritual emptiness.—James Drummond.

In the eternal love of God in Christ find your refuge from hopelessness. Let the child-like depth of sorrow bring about the child-like depth of trust in Him. Your pain is His. He is sacrificing Himself for the world in your agony. Realise that your sorrow is His love working in you for the blessing of the race. Throw yourself into that thought, and trust in Him. And there will be with you then the peace which believes, the peace which makes you content to sacrifice yourself as the instrument of love, the peace of being loved, and of loving. You shall lie down in tender pastures of God's calm, and be led beside the quietness of his waters of refreshment.—Stopford A. Brooke.

Thoughts and Aspirations of the Ages

Edited by WILLIAM CHATTERTON COUPLAND.

"We are really much indebted to Dr. W. C. Coupland for his fine volume, which has been issued in Messrs. Sonnenschein's 'International Library' at the price of half-a-guinea. Many of our readers are familiar with Mr. Moncreux Conway's 'Sacred Anthology,' to which the present volume bears some resemblance. But, as was to be expected, the learned and devout compiler has profited by the increased resources placed by modern scholarship at the service of catholic-minded searchers for the best utterances of mankind; and we have here a most valuable and representative collection of passages illustrative of the unity amid diversity in the spiritual experience and religious imagination of men in many ages and climes. It is a welcome feature of the work that it is not confined to brief extracts, but that selections are given which afford an adequate notion of the general character of the religious thought of the various types taken in turn. These include the Egyptian, Chinese, Brahmanic, Buddhist, Mazdaist, Hellenic, and Stoic, among the ancient forms, the Islamic and Sufistic; and three types of modern Oriental thought—viz., Sikhism, Brahmo-Samaj, and Babiism. A considerable number of passages are given from modern unclassed authors, living writers being excluded. By far the greater number of selections, however, represent religious thought as it has arisen among Jews and Christians, the latter especially, about two-thirds of the work being thus occupied. The author apologises to his humanitarian friends for the predominance of 'mores of thought and feeling familiarly known as 'Christian,' and emphatically says it is 'simply due to the fact that of religious world-literature the Christian is the richest. His endeavour has been' to exhibit the fruits of positive religious thought and aspiration, not to appeal to the discursive understanding or satisfy intellectual curiosity'; and he hopes that the volume may prove useful as a Lectionary in broader-minded ethico-religious communities.' There is no doubt that Dr. Coupland has done great service by bringing together this collection. All the great phases of Christian thought are represented, and while some differences of opinion are inevitable as to pieces included or omitted, we are struck with the broad sympathy that has evidently guided the editor in his work. It is a compendious library in itself."—INQUIRER.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE number of the Messiah Pulpit, New York, contains a sermon by Robert Collyer on "The Folly of Solomon." It is the last of the series to be issued for the present, as Dr. M. J. Savage has, unfortunately, been obliged by the state of his health (as Mr. Wendte tells us in his American Notes) to take a long rest. The regular issue of his sermons is therefore suspended for a time. Under sunny skies may he find perfect rest and a renewal of his strength!

THE article on "Some Old Silver Communion Plate of English Nonconformity," to which we referred last week, is not in the Magazine of Art, but in the Magazine of Fine Arts, a new publication, of which the February number is the fourth to be issued. (G. Newnes, Ltd. 1s. net). In the March number, to be issued on the 15th inst., there will be more illustrations of the pieces of plate referred to in the February article.

THE centenary of the birth of Elizabeth Barrett Browning was celebrated on Tuesday, March 6, in London, at the Pioneer Club, where Mrs. Meynell gave an address, and some flowers were received from Swinburne and Theodore Watts-Dunton, and at the Robert Browning Hall, Walworth-road. At Florence the Syndic was to place a wreath of flowers over the tablet marking the Casa Guidi, where the Brownings lived. We published last week Mr. Thomas's memorial article, and this week have devoted some columns to Mrs. Browning's poetry.

To a letter on "Fundamental or Biblical Christianity" in the Spectator of February 24, urging that in the teaching of religion a Churchman, a Unitarian, a Baptist, and a Wesleyan could by no means agree as to what was fundamental, and that Unitarians ought not to be ignored, the Editor added a note making light of the difficulty. On this the following letter appeared in last Saturday's Spectator.

"SIR,—In a note which you append to the letter of Mr. C. A. Brodribb appearing in your issue of February 24, you state that "the number of Unitarian parents who send their children to elementary schools is by no means large." Permit me to point out that over three thousand five hundred children attend Unitarian Sunday-schools in London, over thirteen thousand five hundred in Manchester, two thousand in Liverpool, three thousand five hundred in Birmingham and its district, and some thirteen thousand five hundred in other parts of the country, and that nearly all these children attend the elementary day-schools. Surely, therefore, Unitarians have the right to ask that their views may be heard when the question of religious training in the day schools comes up for decision. As far as I am aware, Unitarians were perfectly satisfied with such religious teaching as was given by the London School Board and the Boards of other large centres. The children were well-grounded in fundamental religious truths and obtained a good knowledge of the Bible: They thus acquired in the day-school a grounding in religion upon which Sunday-school and other teachers could base the definite theological instruction of their particular denomination. Personally, I very much hope that fundamental religious teaching will be retained in our elementary day-schools, and that such instruction will be imparted to the children as a whole, and not in groups determined by their parents' particular denomination.—I am, Sir, &c.,

R. ASQUITH WOODING,
Hon. Sec., London (Unitarian)
Sunday-School Society,

21, Douglas Road, Canonbury, N.

The Editor of the Spectator adds a note of satisfaction, that his correspondent "is opposed to the secularisation of the schools." We cannot think, however, that the majority of Unitarians would agree with Mr. Wooding in being "perfectly satisfied" with the religious teaching that was given in London and other Board Schools. Certainly it was not, as a rule, such teaching as we ourselves would wish to give to our own children.

IN the spring of last year the clergy of the Church of England at home, in the colonies and abroad, numbering some 32,000, were invited to sign a Declaration on Biblical Criticism. The results have been gathered into a book, which is to be published immediately by Messrs. A. & C. Black under the title "A Declaration on Bible Criticism. By 1,725 Clergy of the Anglican Communion." Edited by Hubert Handley, M.A. The book will contain, among other things, a copy of the Declaration and the letter of invitation to sign which accompanied it, a list of the inviting clergy, a public explanatory letter from the Dean of Winchester, and a list of the names and addresses of all the signatories.

THE position of Europeans in China is again very critical, and it seems quite impossible to forecast what tragic events may occur there in the near future. But obviously the strong feeling against the white man does not die away. It always smoulders, and from time to time breaks out in actions of violence and cruelty. And there is nothing to surprise us in this when we hear from independent travellers of the way in which the European daily treats the Chinaman in the treaty ports and the places where the different races mingle. The missionaries have again borne the brunt of the disturbance. They seem to be regarded by the yellow man as representative of the objectionable white races. Not all or always, for some of them do succeed in a measure in establishing human relations which are not destroyed by thoughts of colour. In other cases, as again we learn from travellers in the country, they are regarded as upholders of a social and race antagonism rather than missionaries of a faith and life.

THE missionaries generally are fearless men, constant at their post of duty, as are the civil servants who represent us in the lands far from our own civilisation. They accept the risks of their calling, and now they pay the penalty of their venture of religion in a strange land. Our sympathy is evoked, and especially for the women and children who have died. Such events as these send a thrill of pride and emotion through Christendom. And the churches are quickened by the news of their peril to fresh enthusiasm for the mission work. The life of the religious communities at home is often prosaic enough, and they seem to need this consciousness of being in touch with a world crusade.

THE fresh evidence of the peril of the work lends more than common pathos to a recent meeting in London of the London Missionary Society. None of the agents of this Society are among the recent victims, but this, like other societies, stands prepared for such losses in a cause which compels their faith, and the missionaries themselves take the risks without hesitation. The meeting, however, to which we refer, was not to deal with heroisms, but with bald questions of finance. For some years past the L.M.S. has overspent its income. A strong appeal for fresh funds to make up the deficit has not been entirely a failure. But it has seemed to some of the members that the position of constant deficits and frequent appeals was not satisfactory, and a resolution was submitted to secure the bringing of expenditure within the limits of the income. This was met by an amendment from Mr. Wardlaw Thompson, foreign secretary of the Society, which said in effect, Do the work and trust for the money. That is the familiar policy of philanthropic societies, and the resolution is one of many indications of growing dissatisfaction. In the result a compromise was arrived at, viz., "That while in the judgment of the directors it is not possible to limit the expenditure strictly to any financial estimate of the probable income from ordinary sources, they are deeply impressed with the necessity for bringing income and expenditure more nearly into accord." And it was agreed that in future a budget of estimated revenue and expenditure should be drawn up, and that, if the income was to be exceeded, it should only be by deliberate decision. We believe this determination represents a new departure in philanthropic work. It is a means of learning the true relation between the work that should be done and the means available for doing it.

YET another of the remaining beautiful districts of England is threatened by works of practical utility. The section of the Broads between the ruins of St. Benet's Abbey and Wroxham Bridge, described by Mr. Robert J. Price, M.P., as "one of the most beautiful bits of the Broads," is wanted by the Yarmouth Waterworks Co., to increase their water supply, and they hope to obtain powers from Parliament for their purpose. Mr. Price considers that this is by no means the only possible scheme for improving the water supply of Yarmouth. He says that it is not far down to the chalk in which is abundant water, and that artesian wells have shown that there is plenty of water obtainable without sacrificing one of the delights of England, and doing great damage to the farmers who depend upon the river Bure for irrigation of their fields. He hopes Parliamentary sanction may be withheld.

WHILE one Waterworks undertaking is thus threatening the beauty of the country, another may be instrumental in obtaining a more beautiful development than hitherto of one of the dirtiest of towns. The Water Committee of the Sheffield Corporation proposes to lay out a new road along the Rivelin Valley and open up connection with the city by a tree-lined avenue. The Sheffield Daily Telegraph wisely comments on the scheme, and points out that the municipality ought to acquire as much land as possible near the new road, and before any building is permitted, should plan the whole of the new town that will grow up, so as to retain the beauty of the valley, and on a systematic plan provide for the healthy housing and opportunity of pleasant and happy life for its residents. Such a scheme might receive intelligent and sympathetic consideration and approval from the present Parliament.

THE fiftieth anniversary of the death of Heinrich Heine has been celebrated by many memorial tributes. Writing in last week's Athenæum, Mr. J. S. Henderson shows that it was not Heine of whom Goethe spoke as a poet wanting in love, but his contemporary Platen. In Matthew Arnold's lines on "Heine's Grave" we read:—

"But was it thou?—I think
Surely it was! that bard
Unnamed, who, Goethe said,
Had every other gift but wanted love;
Love, without which the tongue
Even of angels sounds amiss."

And it appears that in the 1836 edition of Eckermann the reported conversation with Goethe on this subject gives no name, but only refers to "one of our most recent German poets." This was erroneously supposed to be Heine, and hence the currency of the saying as applied to him. But in later editions of Eckermann the name of Platen is inserted in the text, while even in the 1836 edition, if people had looked in the index they would have found it there: "v. Platen, Graf Aug. . . . Ihm fehle die Liebe, 234 . . ."

THE "Free Age Press," edited by V. Tchertkoff, is publishing two new articles by Leo Tolstoy, entitled, "A Great Iniquity," 48 pages, with new portrait, price 4d. net; and "The One Thing Needful," 64 pages, with new portrait, price 4d. net, both of which have first appeared in The Times. Postage, 1d. each. 13, Paternoster-row, London.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.—Among the foreign visitors to the forthcoming meetings of the National Conference will be Prof. Jean Réville, of Paris, who will, it is expected, explain the result to the Liberal Protestant Churches in France of the recent law separating Church and State in that country. From the number of names already received it is evident that there will be a large and representative gathering at Oxford. Intending visitors, who desire the Local Committee to secure rooms for them will do well to note that their names should be sent to the secretary of the conference (Rev. Jas. Harwood, 105, Palace-road, Tulse Hill Park, London, S.W.), not later than Thursday next, the 15th inst.

A VOICE of confidence has been known to rally a retreating army and to lead it back to victory; and this spirit-stirring tone belongs to the leaders of the Christian host. The minister, indeed, ought to see and feel, more painfully than other men, the extent and power of moral evil in individuals, in the church, and in the world. Let him weep over the ravages of sin. But let him feel, too, that the mightiest power of the universe is on the side of truth and virtue; and with sorrow and fear let him join an unfaltering trust in the cause of human nature.—Channing.

THE REV. W. ROSLING.

To a correspondent of the Cleckheaton Guardian, as reported in its issue of March 2, the Rev. W. Rosling, of Bradford, whose secession from the Congregational Church we have already reported, spoke the other day as follows:—

He said his change from Congregationalism to Unitarianism implied no new discovery in truth, nor any change of views or attitude towards any Christian doctrine.

What he had seen and taught within the realm of religious truth for twenty years had constantly grown upon him, and more firmly gripped his heart and mind; his vision had grown clearer, his convictions deeper; but there had come no fundamental, radical change. The truths he had lived by in the past he lived by now; the ambition to propagate those truths was his supreme ambition still. His convictions had been, and were still, with what is called Broad Churchism, but he was no denominationalist and never could be.

He longed for the day when churches of all names would break clear away from every dead or burdensome dogma and creed-fetter, and become simply Christian, and exist for the sole purpose of making the love of Christ, and the life of simple goodness and helpfulness which he lived, real and vital again—when churches should hold no creed narrower than the Lord's Prayer, and should maintain that love, which is the ruling principle of the Universe, must become the ruling principle of the churches and of society. In his early days his teachers were Beecher, Bushnell, Baldwin Brown, Robertson of Brighton, Maurice, Channing, and Kingsley. He could never forget the day when he read for the first time Theodore Parker's "Matters of Religion." When he had finished the book he went out to walk among the hills, and think of the revelation that the book had brought to him. The world looked different, and God seemed strangely near and wondrously real. After twenty-eight years the impressions of that day were vital in his life. Along the new way that opened before him he had been led by Martineau, Freeman Clarke, Hedge, Momerie, and kindred spirits, and by the helpful friendship of David Macrae, John Hunter, and Rhondda Williams.

He loved all people, irrespective of creed, and wished well to every good work. He left Congregationalism, which had associations very precious to him, and multitudes of people he tenderly loved, because it had no doors wide enough for him, and he entered Unitarianism because he was in hearty agreement with its spirit and aims, and because assent to no creed is asked or expected of its ministers or its people.

For the sake of being free to speak the message which he believed God put into his heart and mind, in common with all faithful souls, he was willing to forego all dear associations and friendships that stood between himself and the freedom he felt to be essential to honesty and progress. In Congregationalism, he believes there are churches abreast of the age, and alive to its demands, and whose pulpits are as free as any to be found anywhere; but these are exceptions.

ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING.
MARCH 6, 1806—JUNE 29, 1861.

The woman singeth at her spinning-wheel
A pleasant chant, ballad or barcarole;
She thinketh of her song, upon the whole,
Far more than of her flax; and yet the reel
Is full, and artfully her fingers feel
With quick adjustment, provident control,
The lines—too subtly twisted to unroll—
Out to a perfect thread. I hence appeal To the dear Christian Church—that we may do
Our Father's business in these temples
mirk,
Thus swift and steadfast, thus intent and strong;
While thus, apart from toil, our souls pursue
Some high calm spheric tune, and prove our work
The better for the sweetness of our song.

What are we set on earth for? Say, to toil;
Nor seek to leave thy tending of the vines
For all the heat o' the day, till it declines,
And Death's mild curfew shall from work assail.
God did anoint thee with His odorous oil,
To wrestle, not to reign; and He assigns
All thy tears over, like pure crystallines,
For younger fellow-workers of the soil
To wear for amulets. So others shall Take patience, labour, to their heart and hand,
From thy hand and thy heart and thy brave cheer,
And God's grace fructify through thee to all.
The least flower with a brimming cup may stand,
And share its dew-drop with another near.

From "Aurora Leigh."

'There's nothing great
Nor small,' has said a poet of our day, (Whose voice will ring beyond the curfew of eve
And not to be thrown out by the matin's bell)
And truly, I reiterate, . . . nothing's small!
No lily-muffled hum of a summer bee,
But finds some coupling with the spinning stars;
No pebble at your foot, but proves a sphere;
No chaffinch, but implies the cherubim:
And,—glancing on my own thin, veined wrist,—
In such a little tremor of the blood
The whole strong clamour of a vehement soul
Doth utter itself distinct. Earth's crammed with heaven,
And every common bush afire with God:
But only he who sees, takes off his shoes;
The rest sit round it, and pluck blackberries,
And daub their natural faces unaware
More and more, from the first similitude.

Art's the witness of what Is Behind this show. If this world's show were all,
Then imitation would be all in Art;
There Jove's hand gripes us!—For we stand here, we,
If genuine artists, witnessing for God's

Complete, consummate, undivided work:
—That not a natural flower can grow on earth,
Without a flower upon the spiritual side,
Substantial archetypal, all a-glow
With blossoming causes,—not so far away,
That we, whose spirit-sense is somewhat cleared,
May not catch something of the bloom and breath,—
Too vaguely apprehended, though indeed
Still apprehended, consciously or not,
And still transferred to picture, music,
verse,
For thrilling audient and beholding souls
By signs and touches which are known to souls,—
How known, they know not,—why, they cannot find,
So straight call out on genius, say, 'A man
Produced this,'—when much rather they should say,
'Tis insight, and he saw this.'

I count that Heaven itself is only work
To a surer issue. Let us work, indeed,—
But, no more, work as Adam . . . nor as Leigh
Erewhile, as if the only man on earth,
Responsible for all the thistles blown
And tigers couchant,—struggling in amaze
Against disease and winter,—snarling on
For ever, that the world's not paradise.
Oh cousin, let us be content, in work,
To do the thing we can, and not presume
To fret because it's little.

'We must be here to work;
And men who work, can only work for men,
And, not to work in vain, must comprehend
Humanity, and, so, work humanly,
And raise men's bodies still by raising souls,
As God did, first.'

'But stand upon the earth,'
I said, 'to raise them,—(this is human too;
There's nothing high which has not first been low;
My humbleness, said One, has made me great!)
As God did, last.'

'And work all silently,
And simply,' he returned, 'as God does
all;
Distort our nature never, for our work,
Nor count our right hands stronger for being hoofs.
The man most man, with tenderest human hands,
Works best for men,—as God in Nazareth.'

* * * * *
Subsists no law of life outside of life;
No perfect manners, without Christian
souls:
The Christ himself had been no Lawgiver,
Unless he had taken the life, too, with the law.'

I echoed thoughtfully—'The man, most
man,
Works best for men: and, if most man
indeed,
He gets his manhood plainest from his soul:
While, obviously, this stringent soul itself
Obeys our old rules of development;
The Spirit ever witnessing in ours,
And Love, the soul of soul, within the soul,'

Evolving it sublimely. First, God's love.'

'And next,' he smiled, 'the love of wedded
souls,
Which still presents that mystery's counterpart.

Beloved, let us love so well,
Our work shall still be better for our love,
And still our love be sweeter for our work,
And both, commended, for the sake of each,
By all true workers and true lovers born.

Sonnets from the Portuguese.

The face of all the world is changed, I think,
Since first I heard the footsteps of thy soul
Move still, oh, still, beside me, as they stole Betwixt me and the dreadful outer brink
Of obvious death, where I, who thought to sink,
Was caught up into love, and taught the whole
Of life in a new rhythm. The cup of dole
God gave for baptism, I am fain to drink,
And praise its sweetness, Sweet, with thee anear.
The names of country, heaven, are changed away
For where thou art or shalt be, there or here;
And this . . . this lute and song . . .
loved yesterday,
(The singing angels know) are only dear Because thy name moves right in what they say.

I thank all who have loved me in their hearts,
With thanks and love for mine. Deep thanks to all
Who paused a little near the prison-wall
To hear my music in its louder parts Ere they went onward, each one to the mart's
Or temple's occupation, beyond call.
But thou, who, in my voice's sink and fall
When the sob took it, thy divinest Art's Own instrument didst drop down at thy foot
To hearken what I said between my tears, Instruct me how to thank thee! Oh, to shoot
My soul's full meaning into future years,
That they should lend it utterance, and salute
Love that endures, from Life that disappears!

How do I love thee? Let me count the ways.
I love thee to the depth and breadth and height
My soul can reach, when feeling out of sight
For the ends of Being and ideal Grace.
I love thee to the level of every day's
Most quiet need, by sun and candle-light.
I love thee freely, as men strive for Right;
I love thee purely, as they turn from Praise.
I love thee with the passion put to use
In my old griefs, and with my childhood's faith.

I love thee with a love I seemed to lose
With my lost saints,—I love thee with the breath,
Smiles, tears, of all my life!—and, if God choose,
I shall but love thee better after death.

LITERATURE.

"TOWARDS THE HEIGHTS" is the new title of an old book. The first translated form with which we are acquainted is that which under the title of "Youth" was published in New York so long ago as 1893. In the present edition the translation is the same, and though some slight attempt has been made, in the "analysis" prefixed to the book, to obliterate the fin de siècle marks of the original, the author's pages remain as they were written, and refer to the "closing century" where we might have looked for a different phrasing. To the New York edition a preface was supplied addressed "To the Youth of America"; similarly the present edition is prefaced with an address "To the Young Men of Britain," and noting its freshness, vigour, and directness, we can but regret that the whole work has not been revised and brought up-to-date for the new circle of readers which the publishers hope, and we hope, may be reached.

One very welcome new thing enriches the present volume. It is the portrait of the author, presenting him as his friends delight to remember him—a strong, kindly, shrewd, exuberant nature, capable of satirical incision and cordial scorn, yet most himself in winsome grace and genial sympathy. The "Young Men of Britain" who look with trust upon the face of this friend from across the Channel will not find their trust misplaced as they accompany him along the fruitful paths which he has marked out. They will, indeed, very soon discern that he is speaking first of all to a French audience; but as he now raises his voice for them to hear, they will find that his subject is as universal as human nature, and his method and allusions are none the less attractive for being unfamiliar.

As there are many who have yet to make close acquaintance with the now celebrated preacher of "The Simple Life," we may usefully indicate in brief the scope of the work. It is divided into three parts, the first being but short and introductory. "The Inheritance" is here described, a heritage of gain and loss, and one rendering necessary a cool head and a wise heart if "the heirs" are to make the most of the life they are called to share. In the second part these "heirs" are described, as with a keenly observing eye the author glances over the different types of youthful temperament, and notes the problems that confront the beginner in the race of life. The third part is entitled, "Towards the Sources and the Heights," and here is supplied a generous stimulus to all that is worthiest in a young man's character. The whole round of the youth's experience is considered—work, enjoyment, love and friendship, patriotism, and religion. Pastor Wagner speaks out straight on the sins of the flesh, and calls with inspiring tones to the nobler elements in man's nature. There must be many who, if they could but be brought to read these pages, would be guarded and guided in invaluable ways.

"Have faith in your youth," says the author in his special word to our young countrymen. "The bird must have faith in the spring-time, the labourer in the soil, and the young in their youth."

"And what is having faith in your youth? It is having faith in life, and to have faith in life is to have faith in the Master of life. . . ."

"Youth is as a garden, the Gardener whereof is God. The flowers and the young trees must have faith in their gardener, who, tender yet austere, sends the dew and uses the pruning knife—of Him Christ hath said, 'My Father is the Gardener.'"

"Young men, have faith in your youth, that your joy may be as unclouded, pure and true as the smile of the flowers; that your words may be frank, and your heart like a clear spring. Grow upwards, like strong upright trees which no wind can bend. . . ."

"You are the scions of an ancient and glorious nation, heirs of a wonderful past. Have faith in your nation, and the steadfast purpose of God made manifest through its agency, and in your part in helping humanity and making England a benefactor of all nations."

It is characteristic of the gentle and mindful temper of the author that the last paragraph of his address speaks to him who, though young, is suffering and feeble. He too is "a branch of the great Tree whose roots reach into the Infinite Life." There, for the strong and the weak, is the source of strength, and joy, and peace.

THE ANNOTATED "IN MEMORIAM."

TENNYSON'S "In Memoriam," "annotated by the Author," coming as a New Year's gift, must have been eagerly welcomed into countless English homes, where for two generations the book has been wrought into the affections and the deeper life of our people. And, if there was some natural disappointment at the slightness of the notes, it would yet be recognised that this new edition* is thoroughly justified, and a gift for which one can be sincerely grateful.

The book is issued in form exactly similar to the original editions, bound in the familiar green cloth of the later Tennyson volumes, and then at the end one finds the fifty-one pages of new matter, in small type. There is more than the actual notes by the poet himself. These are edited by the present Lord Tennyson, who has added some further notes of his own, and nine notes by his mother, and as an introduction has reprinted nearly the whole of the chapter on "In Memoriam" from the Memoir of his father. This is a most welcome addition to the notes, for, though the memoir is now available in a one-volume popular six-shilling edition, it is very convenient having all the matter together with the poem, and this little book will still find its way to many whom the Memoir may not reach. Lovers of "In Memoriam" may find plenty of help in their study of the poem, and notably, among recent books, in Professor Bradley's Commentary (Macmillan, 4s. 6d. net.)

Tennyson himself frankly acknowledged that he did not like the task of furnishing notes to his poems, and he did not go very far in the effort. His saying has been often quoted: "Poetry is like shot-silk with many glancing colours," and "every reader must find his own interpretation according to his ability and according to his sympathy with the poet."

At the same time there are things which only the poet himself can say with authority about his work. He can put an end, once for all, to endless speculations about obscure passages, he can give helpful guidance in matters of place and time, and add touches of personal interest, which add a great deal to our feeling for his poems. One is grateful also for explanations of curious expressions, which might have remained an endless puzzle. Thus, in the last verse of CXVII. we are told that "every span of shade that steals" is the sun-dial, and "every kiss of toothed wheels" is the clock; and under CXXI., which the editor notes was written at Shiplake, where his father and mother were married, the poet explains: "sweet Hesper-Phosphor, double name. The evening star is also the morning star, death and sorrow brighten into death and hope." On XCIV., iii., They haunt the silence of the breast, the poet's note is "This was what I felt." On LVIII. he says: "Ulysses was written soon after Arthur Hallam's death, and gave my feelings about the need of going forward and braving the struggle of life perhaps more simply than anything in In Memoriam." Lady Tennyson's notes one may trust entirely as furnishing a true reflex of her husband's mind. Thus, on CIII., telling of the poet's dream on the night before they left Somersby, she interprets: "I have a dream which comforts me on leaving the old home and brings me content. The departure suggests the departure of death, and my reunion with him. I have grown in spiritual grace as he has. The gorgeous sky at the end of the section typifies the glory of the hope in that which is to be."

Perhaps the most surprising of Tennyson's notes is on CXXXI., "O living will." Professor Bradley tells of it as first made distinctly in correction of Gatty's interpretation, "the Deity," and it is also referred to in the Memoir. "That which we know as Free Will in man," is Tennyson's note; but if that is his meaning for that which is to "flow through our deeds and make them pure," one must remember that other confession of his, "our wills are ours, to make them Thine," and also bear in mind the close union in these closing stanzas of his thought of the human and the divine. In an earlier passage, XCV., ix., there is a note which shows how the poet might even be in some doubt himself:—

"So word by word, and line by line,

The dead man touch'd me from the past,
And all at once it seem'd at last

The living soul was flashed on mine,"

Tennyson's note is: "The living soul. The Deity, maybe. The first reading, 'his living soul,' troubled me, as, perhaps giving a wrong impression." The son adds: "with reference to the later reading, my father would say: 'of course, the greater Soul may include the less.'" In this connection we remember also CXXX. "Thy voice is on the rolling air." "Thou mix'd with God and Nature, thou, I seem to love thee more and more."

With one other quotation we must conclude this brief notice. It is by the editor, introducing the notes on the last section of the poem.

"The following words were uttered by my father in January, 1869, and bear upon this section:—'Yes, it is true that there are moments when the flesh is nothing to me, when I feel and know the flesh to be the vision, God and the Spiritual the only real and true. Depend upon it, the Spiritual is the real: it belongs to one more than the hand and the foot. You may tell me that my hand and my foot are only imaginary symbols of my existence. I could believe you; but you never, never can convince me that the I is not an eternal Reality, and that the Spiritual is not the true and real part of me.' These words he spoke with such passionate earnestness that a solemn silence fell on us as he left the room."

SHORT NOTICES.

Bread and Salt from the Word of God is a volume containing translations of sixteen sermons by Professor Zahn, of Erlangen, who has been well-known as a representative of the conservative school of theology in Germany. The discourses have been delivered at various dates during the last forty years, chiefly to congregations of a more or less academic character. They contain many indications that the preacher is a devoted Lutheran, observant of the times and seasons of the church's year; and their affinity with the typical "church" sermon in this country is very striking. They are obviously the utterances of an earnest and deeply spiritual mind. As our knowledge of Professor Zahn would lead us to expect, they show little sympathy with the distinctively modern developments of religious thought. Their theology is of the kind that recognises "our natural corruption" and the existence of a personal devil. But though the "bread" here offered us has a somewhat unpalatable dogmatic crust, and the "salt" has lost a little of its savour through admixture with other things, there is much wholesome nourishment to be found in the volume. (T. & T. Clark. 4s. 6d. net.)

THE second volume of the fine Cambridge Edition of Beaumont & Fletcher, to be completed in ten volumes, contains six of the plays, of which the first, "The Elder Brother," which is in prose, is given also in the appendix in the version from the First Quarto in verse. The third volume of the text, Mr. A. R. Waller says in the preface, will be ready immediately. (Cambridge University Press. 4s. 6d. net.)

THE March number of the Mill Hill Pulpit contains a sermon by the Rev. Charles Hargrove in memory of the late George Jacob Holyoake. He had, said the preacher, "the passion for truth, freedom, service, and persuaded of the old maxim—designed as a scourge to drive lazy monks from their cells to the fields—Laborare est orare, labour is prayer, he gave his whole life to labour for the good of his fellow-men." Having spoken of his Secularism, something very different from dogmatic Atheism, and the great services he rendered to the cause of co-operation, Mr. Hargrove added: "He lived to be a very old man and to enjoy the rest and honour which should accompany age. Mr. Gladstone—than whom none could more widely dissent from his religious views—offered him a pension 'for public service'; he declined it on the ground that 'having spent many years in teaching working men the lesson of self-help, he would not himself be dependent on the State.' Later, when disabled by infirmity, he accepted the unsolicited offering of friends and admirers, many of them personally unknown to him, and wholly out of sympathy with his opinions. Dr. Parker, of the City Temple, Stopford Brooke, Francis Newman, were on the committee which undertook to raise the necessary funds. With such names as these on his behalf we need not fear lest we be untrue to our faith if we join in praise of the man and of the work he accomplished, and in thankfulness to God that in every nation and church and class are found such men acceptable to Him whatever others may say of them."

Sixty Years of an Agitator's Life, George Jacob Holyoake's deeply interesting autobiography, is just issued in a one volume popular edition, with portrait. (Fisher Unwin. 2s. 6d. net.)

SOME MORE PICTURES.

FRIENDS who may be going into New Bond-street next week to see the Exhibition at the Modern Gallery (No. 61), of which we wrote last week, of the Martineaus' Aviemore pictures and other water-colours, should take the opportunity of looking in at Walker's Gallery also, 118, New Bond-street, where, from noon on Monday Miss Minna Tayler will be showing her collection of pastels and a few water-colours. This is a smaller collection, of about forty pictures, well worth a visit. Both exhibitions close on Saturday, March 17.

There is great power for effects in pastel, both in portraiture and in landscape, and of both Miss Tayler has some fine examples. What will be of special interest to many of our readers is the series of sketches made in Switzerland last summer after the International Meetings at Geneva. She was of the party which stayed in the following week at Les Praz in the Chamonix valley, and afterwards in the Riffelalp above Zermatt, and she saw and preserved the vision of things which many of the party did not see, but may now go and enjoy and realise in the quietness of this exhibition. There they may see the early dawn upon Mont Blanc at 4.30 a.m., and other pictures of the increasing light upon the great slopes of snow, and then one of the evening light on the same day of which one sees the sunrise; and there are several pictures showing the wonderful effect of the dawn upon the Matterhorn, as seen from the Riffelalp, as the shadow sinks before the rising sun upon that marvellous mass of rock. Monte Rosa, as seen from the Gorner Grat, is also there. And there are two pictures which recall the earlier meeting of the International at Amsterdam, one of Zaandam, the other of a fisherman's cottage at Volendam.

Then one returns to England, and finds beauty close at home, in a patch of common flowers, even in the back garden of a London house, with the bare trees and gooseberry bushes under snow. And look at that long path through the corn-field in Worcestershire, with the hill beyond; and among the water colours, at the quiet woodland scene, with a bit of pond, circled by the trees.

There are, perhaps, some of our readers who do not know much about pastel work. We strongly advise them to go and see in this little exhibition what it can accomplish.

THE PROPHETIC LITERATURE.

WITH a view to discovering how the Prophets addressed themselves to the problems of their times and what remained in their literature as a permanent contribution to our knowledge, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant opened his third lecture in Manchester with an examination of the composite character of the books of the Old Testament. He showed how the books were made up and the various processes of editing which they had probably passed through. By means of some volumes of the Polychrome Bible he was able to make this quite clear to a popular audience, the various strata of deposit and subsequent editing being especially clear in Isaiah and Jeremiah. As a result of this analysis of recent critical results, Mr. Tarrant showed that we find ourselves in the presence of poetry, symbolism, rhapsody, exhortation, speculation, and dreams. The mystic element was, however, subordinated to philosophical interests and, more often, to questions of practical importance. The Prophets were often impracticable according to the current standards, while their opponents were the opportunists of their time who wished to do and be the best that was easily possible. The Prophets led the people from the thoughts of their day to the wider vista of the doings of the Eternal, and thus they were the true founders of Philosophy and of the ultimate Monotheism to which the Hebrews attained. The Prophets were often pessimistic; they did not preach peace when there was no peace. Coming direct from their communings with the Eternal they knew there was an invincible Righteousness in the universe; but the people were not holy but shallow, not possessed with the sense of the divine. All this so filled the Prophets with pessimism about their race, that they thought things were so bad everything must be destroyed before the world could be put right again. This idea of theirs had lingered in some minds down to our own time, but we were learning that expiation is slowly worked out and that the price of sin is ever being paid. Still the Prophets had a hope that the Eternal would for His own righteousness sake some day justify the order of the universe, and this was the basis of the Messianic hope. Originally a social hope, this becomes individual in Christianity so as to be all embracing, fitting all to be built into the holy temple that is to be. But early Christianity was carried off and away from the prophetic attitude in its simple faith in the Eternal into speculations about Christ's nature. How different the world might have been if it had been given to early Christianity to have had men like Micah, Amos, and Jeremiah instead of those who became absorbed in discussions on the nature of Christ. But there was no idea of a great social reconstruction in the minds of the early Christians. At the most they hoped to get together a few groups of believers who would be saved from the coming disaster. To this end they worked, and to this end Christianity had always worked more or less. But if Christians were ever going to set up the true Christianity, Mr. Tarrant said in conclusion, they must get back to the spirit of him who continued the great tradition of the older Prophets, the witnesses of the divine righteousness, and the exhorters to social reformation.

A VISIT TO THE UNITARIANS OF HUNGARY.

THE Rev. Charles E. St. John, secretary of the American Unitarian Association, after attending the International Meetings at Geneva, last August, with Mrs. St. John, paid a visit to our Unitarian brethren in Hungary. In successive December numbers of the Christian Register, he gave a record of this visit, reproducing his journal of those eventful days. The closing days of the visit were of special interest, and we take the liberty of giving Mr. St. John's account of them here.

It is at Kolozsvár that we take up the story.

September 13, Wednesday.—After breakfast (which we could order for ourselves, as it never consisted of anything more than coffee, or chocolate, rolls and butter) we went into the square in front of the hotel to examine the great Catholic cathedral standing in its centre—one of those which in the great days of Unitarianism in Hungary had belonged to the Unitarians. A little later Professors Boros and Csifó called for us, and took us first to see an industrial and historic museum contained in the house in which Hungary's greatest early king, Matthias, was born. From there we went to the college to witness the ceremonies of the opening of the theological school. The stately hall in the college building was well filled with students of lower grades in addition to some forty theological students. The exercises opened with a prayer in Hungarian. Then the Bishop (presiding) made a brief address, which was followed by the opening address for the school year by Professor Boros, Dean of the theological faculty. After this the Bishop introduced me to the assembly, and Professor Boros translated to me what the bishop had said. Then I rose, and made a brief address, which was immediately put into Hungarian by Professor Boros. Both renderings of it were received with "Elyén!" A reply on behalf of the students was made to me in English by a student who has studied in England, and is soon to go to Meadville to study. There was some very good chorus singing by the divinity students, who sang "America" for us at the end, though with Hungarian words.

Professor Boros again lunched with us, and then we had another brief time for rest. At 4 p.m. Professor Boros met us at the door of the Unitarian church, and showed us over it. This is the largest of our Hungarian churches, very simple in its lines, plain white within and without (as is the case with all these churches), and was built when our people were driven out of the cathedral. Just outside the church is the large stone on which Francis David stood to make the address that converted all Kolozsvár from Calvinism to Unitarianism;

At five o'clock we were formally ushered into the meeting of the Consistory of the Hungarian Church. The Consistory is an elected body of some thirty leading laymen who, presided over by the bishop, control the affairs of the denomination. Here, again, the bishop made me a formal address of welcome, which Professor Boros translated for me. And I made a reply on behalf of American Unitarians which the professor put into Hungarian. All along I found that the knowledge that not a word you say is understood is very conducive to brevity. After this was over, we withdrew, leaving the Consistory to proceed with its business. There was the usual general hand-shaking.

In the evening (nominally at eight, but actually later) we were tendered an elaborate banquet at the New York. About thirty-two persons attended it, and after a prolonged feast there were toasts and speeches. The first one was in the form of an address from the bishop to Mrs. St. John. He said that her turn had come to rank ahead of her husband, now that we sat around the white table. Her reply, translated by Miss Fanz, a young lady who has studied in England, was greeted with a loud "Elyén!" Then I was called upon, Professor Boros acting as interpreter of my remarks.

September 14, Thursday.—With Professor Csifó as companion, guide, and interpreter, we started at 8 a.m. in a carriage with three horses abreast for a two days' trip among the country churches. We passed through Kolozsvár at a rattling pace, and were soon in the open country on a very dusty road. The country was rather flat for the first half-day, and we met no special incident till we reached the town of Alsó-Farás. There we called at the door of the Unitarian minister, only to find that he was very ill. So we found a guide in the person of a young chemist, who took us into the simple but very ancient church. Here (as was the case at Polgárdy) the front of the gallery was adorned with artificial funeral wreaths, hung there after the funerals of members of the church, and allowed to accumulate indefinitely.

Then the chemist took us into two of the humble village houses. One had only two rooms, with a kitchen in a little shed outside. In the other a man was making little mugs out of clay. His wheel revolved through his shoving with his bare foot a parallel wheel below. These mugs, when completed and baked, he sold for about two cents each.

After this we went to call upon an American lady living in this Hungarian village, who had been notified by telephone that we were coming. She married a young baron, who was Hungarian consul at Pittsburg, where she lived. He had died and she went to Hungary to live with his father, Baron de K.

We drove up to a high closed board gate in a narrow street,—a gate between what looked like very small white houses standing on the sidewalk. But, as the great gates swung open, we drove into a spacious court in the midst of a beautiful garden, and on our left found a most attractive country mansion. Great are the contrasts of life in Hungary. Here was an estate of hundreds of acres reaching back from the surprising entrance, and the house contained every comfort that wealth can provide in the country. We received a very hospitable welcome, not only from the American lady, who was overjoyed to see fellow-countrymen, but also from the baron and his two daughters. These two ladies could speak a little English, but the Baron could not, and had to devote himself to Professor Csifó.

After dinner we took a long walk through stately avenues of trees and over rustic bridges, all in the estate, and finally with difficulty tore ourselves away, in order to complete our day's journey before dark. The afternoon drive was pleasanter than the morning. The weather of course grew cooler, and the country was more beautiful. We were getting into the mountains, and had many a pretty stretch of wood along rushing brooks and under high hillsides. At last, shortly before dusk, we drove into Toroczko, a picturesque town in a narrow valley between two lofty peaks. Along the street groups of people were gathered to greet us. A large company stood in the village square, and lifted their hats and shouted, "Elyén!" As we passed toward the minister's house, everybody fell in behind us; and, as we left the carriage to be greeted by Rev. Stephen Németh, the minister, we were at once surrounded by a large company of men, women, and children. The minister made a little address of welcome, which Professor Csifó translated, and then we shook hands with a few of the leading people, and passed into the minister's comfortable house. Here the presbyters of the church gathered to meet us, about a dozen of them. Presently we all went to the church to hold a little service, which was but their usual afternoon service delayed until we came. These Unitarian churches in Hungary hold services twice a day every day in the week. All the people filed in, and the minister entered the pulpit in his robe. There was singing by a male choir, and a prayer by the minister. Then all passed out to the street, where I made an address of greeting to the presbyters and the people, which Professor Csifó made plain to them. Then we were shown the school connected with the church, and inspected the church itself. It is very large, being the only church in a village of 1,200 inhabitants, all Unitarians. Congregations average as much as 700 in winter. The church is surrounded by a high outer wall like a walled city, and indeed this wall was actually built in old times for the defence of the church and its people.

After a stroll through the village we returned to the house for supper, in which we were joined by two or three officers of the church. Soon after supper—that is, about nine o'clock, as we were very tired—we withdrew from the company. But the day was not ended yet, for presently a brass band struck up playing in front of the house. It seemed, as we learned next day, that a great many of the people had been out in the fields at work when we arrived, and so had not been able to greet us. So they got together in a second large crowd, brought out the village band of fourteen men, and came to serenade us. They played three selections of a very novel character, and then withdrew.

I omitted to say that before supper two young girls came in dressed up for our benefit in the native costume of the Szék-lars of that region. It was a very brilliant and extraordinary costume. Toroczko is famed for the costumes of its people. Both men and women have strange and brilliantly coloured garments, many of which are worn only at church. The people are practically all farmers. Some few keep shops and carry on trades of course, but most are farmers. Many of the women, too, work in the fields with the men. In Hungary it is proved that Unitarianism can reach all grades of society and all sorts of people.

September 15, Friday.—Up betimes, we took a walk to another part of the village, and called on a very old lady, whose simple house was full of old heirlooms. We had admired certain old jugs we saw in the better houses, and had asked the minister to try to find some for us; but he said it was impossible, money could not buy them. But this old lady, Widow Borbely Martoune, heard of our desire, and was so much interested that she actually gave us two of the precious mugs that had come down from her great-grandmother. She said she did it for "love of Unitarianism." Next we called at the local judge's house, and at another, where we were shown many of the interesting and costly articles of clothing peculiar to that town.

Then, taking leave of pastor and town, we resumed our carriage. As we started, several girls ran up and gave us flowers. In the open square a large fountain gave opportunity for women to do their washing, and also for ducks, pigs, and water buffalo to wallow. Three of the latter were luxuriating there as we started. After driving through fine scenery, we reached, at about eleven o'clock, a quiet little village strung along the road—all the houses thatched, and very queer and small, and a little old white church dominating all. It was the Unitarian village of Sinfalva. We stopped at the minister's house, and were received by him, his wife, and daughter and father, and three or four chief men of the society. The pastor, Rev. Dornalos Letay, a man of sixty or more, took us into his quaint little home, and there, with the company standing, made us a speech of welcome. As translated by Professor Csifó, it was very poetic and pathetic. I made a speech in reply, and then we sat down to lunch.

Driving on, we soon came to another Unitarian village. Here a delegation greeted us by the roadside as we entered the town (Stentmihaly-falva). The group consisted of about fifteen presbyters of the church, a soldier in uniform, and holding a flag, the pastor, and onlookers. We got out into the deep dust in the broiling sun, and listened to a speech of welcome from the pastor, Rev. Gabriel Adamosy. After my reply the pastor entered the carriage with us, and, followed by the rest, we proceeded to his house, fully half a mile through the village. Several girls threw bouquets into the carriage, and one old woman ran up with a large one. At the parsonage the minister's young wife greeted us, and insisted upon our taking refreshments. Then we visited the church, another queer little structure, and moved on. We drove into the large town of Torda at about one o'clock, and were received (this time without a speech) by the minister and his wife. There we dined in company with the principal of the Unitarian college and his wife. The minister was Rev. Denis Lorinozy, and the teacher, Mr. Denis Varga. The latter spoke English. After dinner we visited the old church and the college before resuming our drive. In the town hall we saw the fine painting of Francis David addressing the representatives of the civil government. We looked into the cathedral, which was formerly Unitarian.

It grew cold as the sun sank, and we were glad when about eight, we reached Hotel New York again. We had supper, a last talk with the bishop, a little rest, and then went to a sleeper on the 11 p.m. train westward. Our Hungarian experience was ended.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

In a very narrow dirty little street some little boys were playing cricket. They were very ragged and dirty, and wore wretched old boots. The street was wet and muddy, but what cared they? For they had their game and were as merry and as noisy as could be. A bit of an old box lid was their bat, a very battered turnip was their ball, and the wicket was one of their jackets doubled up. When a cart or cab came by they had to clear off the ground, and then set up their jacket-wicket again. The little boy who was bowling had run far up the street after the ball, and as he came back with it he suddenly stopped before a puddle in the street. He cried out "Oh! oh! look!" and the other boys came running to see what he had found. His eyes travelled to and fro between the puddle and the glowing sunset sky, where the planet Venus shone gloriously and was reflected in the puddle below.

"What is it?" cried the other boys, as they gathered round him.

"The evening star," said he, pointing to the reflection in the puddle.

"T'aint," said one.

"Tis," said he.

"T'aint, I tell yer! Bill, you are a silly! Come 'long," and with his bat he stirred up the mud in the puddle, and put out the reflection of the star.

"Get 'long—you've put out my star," said Bill, angrily, shoving his companion away. He looked rather sadly at the puddle, and then looked up at the real star.

The boy with the bat ran back to the wicket, and cried, "Look sharp, Bill, bowl us a ball!" And Bill came forward to bowl, and as he came near the pool a look of pleasure crossed his face as he saw his star again in the water.

That is one little story, and here is another.

Walter was only a little boy when he was sent to a large school. His mother had died not long before, and the heart of this youngest little boy was still very sore for want of her; and even amongst all his schoolfellows he sadly missed his father and his dear sisters and brothers. But he was a brave little lad, and he tried not to think about being home-sick, and to keep a brave heart. But often when he lay in bed in the big room with other boys, and they thought he was asleep, he lay quietly thinking of home, and of the dear mother in heaven, and often he cried till he fell asleep. One night a boy in the next bed found out that he was crying, and began to laugh rudely, and shouted out loud, "That kid's crying; oh, you baby! What's up?" A loud laugh followed from the other boys. Walter hardened his heart in a moment, and rubbed his eyes, and sat up; he called out, "I'm not crying; I'm all right." But they continued to tease him till they were tired; and though he felt angry and resentful he laid down again and said no more to them.

Another night, when they thought him asleep, some of the boys were talking together, and Walter heard them planning to do something very naughty. He listened for a time, and grew more and more indignant that they could be so naughty; and then he remembered that they thought him asleep, and that he ought not to deceive them. So he sat bolt upright in his bed, and called out, "Halloa! I'm not asleep." Silence fell in the dormitory for a minute, and then some whispering began; and then, just as Walter was dropping asleep, someone pulled him, and he found two of the boys beside his bed.

"I say, young'un," said one of them, "did you hear our jolly plan?"

"I heard what you were planning," said Walter.

"Well, look here; we want you to join and help us."

Walter jerked the boy's hand off his shoulder, and said, "Not I; I wouldn't do it for worlds."

"And why not, in the name of wonder?"

"You know quite well," said Walter.

"What do you mean, youngster?"

"You know it's naughty, as well as I do."

"Naughty, indeed! What a prig you are to stick at a bit of fun! You young piety! And I suppose your piety will make you sneak and tell of us. Mind, it'll be the worse for you."

Walter did not deign to answer; he pushed the two boys away, and settled himself to go to sleep.

After this Walter had to endure all sorts of persecution and bullying; but he kept steady, and bore it bravely; and by degrees the better boys found out that he was a first-rate little fellow, and he was happy in their companionship and friendship.

The first story is a parable; and the second is an illustration of the first, and bids us see that we have it in our power (like the boy with the bat) so to stir up the pool of each other's hearts by wicked thoughts and unkind words as to put out the reflection of the light from heaven which shines in them; and, if they have higher and better thoughts than we, so to ridicule and despise these better things that we "put out his star" in our companion's heart.

Let it never be so with you, dear children. As St. Paul says, "Quench not the Spirit."

THOMAS HORNBLOWER GILL.

ON Sunday last, March 4, at the great age of eighty-seven, the summons came to the ardent spirit of THOMAS HORNBLOWER GILL, to lay down the burdens of mortal infirmity, and to enter into that new liberty and the richer life of more perfect communion, to which he had looked forward with such intense desire and eager expectation. More than fifty years ago, in one of his well-known hymns, he sang:—

"O Time! ne'er resteth thy swift wing;
Thy minutes make no stay:
Yet what vast treasure do they bring,
What treasure bear away!

Yes, Lord, our days may be divine:
Our hours may golden be;
The brightness of their light may shin
Through all eternity.

We mourn not Hours, the wings ye take,
If your best dower be given:
Fly on, bright Minutes, if ye make
Our souls more meet for Heaven!

Yes, parted Years, still sweetly breathe!
Still blessedly appear!
And glory and delight bequeath
To the Eternal Year!"

Now the sum of his earthly years is completed, and he passes to the Unseen, bearing with him a rich harvest of the spiritual life, and to us leaving a very precious inheritance. We cannot mourn for him, but only rejoice; nor must we say his voice is silent now, for it has been for many years a living voice, and must remain, one of the richest of these latter days, for English-speaking people, in the great chorus of devout thanksgiving and aspiration in the Church. Mr. GILL certainly holds a foremost place among the hymn-writers of the nineteenth century.

A native of Birmingham, where he was born Feb. 10, 1819, THOMAS HORNBLOWER GILL was nurtured in the earnest piety of the old English Presbyterians, who in the eighteenth century had become Unitarians. His family belonged to the congregation of the New Meeting, to which Dr. PRIESTLEY had ministered. He thus inherited the memories of suffering and determined faithfulness which belonged to the period of the Birmingham riots, when the old meeting-house and PRIESTLEY'S house were destroyed; and he had other older memories in which he gloried to the end, for he was a Puritan of Puritans, with a passionate love of spiritual freedom. He was descended from JOHN SPICER, one of the martyrs of MARY'S reign, who was burnt with two others at Wilton, near Salisbury, in 1556, and on his mother's side from RICHARD SERGEANT, an ejected minister of 1662, a friend of RICHARD BAXTER. In early manhood, Mr. GILL was repelled by the dry rationalism prevalent at that time in Unitarian circles, and like his friend, FRANKLIN HOWORTH, of Bury, whose biographer he afterwards became, was drawn to a broad type of evangelical faith, and felt most at home in the fellowship of Congregational Churches. GEORGE DAWSON and Dr. DALE, of Birmingham, were among his warm friends in the transition period and in later life, but to the end his closest personal friends, after his brother (who survives him) and FRANKLIN HOWORTH, were Unitarians. To Dr. MARTINEAU he was united by ties of admiration and friendship, which were a great delight, and the charming birthday verses which he repeatedly addressed to his venerated friend will be remembered. They had shared the same feeling with regard to the early forms of Unitarian thought and piety, and while MARTINEAU, as a master of religious philosophy, found a different way of deliverance, and became to his Unitarian brethren the prophet of a deeper spiritual faith, they two were very near together in the sympathies and affections of their religious life.

The old Universities were closed to Mr. GILL when he was a young man, by reason of his Nonconformity, and his life was to the end that of a retired student, a poet, and historian. In 1841 he published his first volume, a poem on "The Fortunes of Faith; or Church and State," and in 1848 some ardent "Songs of the Revolution"; ten years later, "The Anniversaries, Poems in Commemoration of Great Men and Great Events," in 1866 his prose work, "The Papal Drama: an Historical Essay," and in 1883 the biography of his friend, "The Triumph of Christ: Memorials of Franklin Howorth." But it is as a writer of hymns that he will be chiefly remembered. The first he published were in GEORGE DAWSON'S hymn-books of 1846 and 1853, and then at the beginning of 1869 he published the first edition of his collected hymns, "The Golden Chain of Praise." A second enlarged edition, containing 250 hymns, appeared in 1894. Many of these hymns are very widely used, the best known of all being, perhaps, "We come unto our fathers' God." From another we have already quoted, and a few others may be here recalled:

"Everlasting! Changing never!"

"Lord, Thou hast been our dwelling-place."

"Spirit of Truth! who makest bright!"

"Our God! Our God! Thou shinest here."

"Lord! when I all things would possess."

"Young souls, so strong the race to run."

"Break, new-born year, on glad eyes break!"

"An early lover and an early writer of hymns," Mr. GILL wrote in the preface to the first edition of his Golden Chain, "I have, in putting forth these divine songs, fulfilled the aspiration and accomplished the endeavour of a life. The exceeding delight of their production is, of course, an incommunicable joy. May they be made of some avail for the strengthening and gladdening of other souls, through the grace of the Divine Quickener and Gladdener." And in the preface to the final edition, he said:—"I have sought to combine the depth of the seventeenth century with the width of the nineteenth century, to blend the spirit of the ancestral Puritans with the loftiest aspirations of our own time," and he concluded with the earnest hope and prayer that his hymns, "the outcome of the aspiration and inspiration of half a century," might minister "to the maintenance and furtherance of that deep, broad, pure spiritual Christianity, the unfolding and upholding whereof are the loftiest business of the Teutonic race, the utterance whereof is a glorious office of the English tongue."

We must not dwell further here upon the beauty and abiding worth of his hymns. They are well known; many of the best are in all our books, both in this country and in America. It is to us a happy memory that Mr. GILL was to the last a loyal and warm-hearted friend of THE INQUIRER, as, indeed, he more than once publicly testified in our columns. What he chiefly desired is now granted him. With reverent thankfulness we shall cherish his gifts to the Church Universal, and offer, with few words, this heartfelt tribute to his memory.

THE article on Thomas Hornblower Gill in Julian's Dictionary of Hymnology, written by Mr. Garrett Horder, contains a long list of his hymns in most general use, with interesting notes as to their origin, by the author. On the hymn, "We come unto our Father's God" there is the following note:—

"The birthday of this hymn, Nov. 22, 1868, was almost the most delightful day of my life. Its production employed the whole day, and was a prolonged rapture.

... It was produced while the Golden Chain was being printed, just in time to be a link therein, and was the latest, as 'How, Lord, shall vows of ours be sweet?' was the earliest song included therein."

Here are the first and two concluding verses of the hymn:—

We come unto our fathers' God :

Their Rock is our Salvation :

The Eternal Arms, their dear abode,

We make our habitation :

We bring Thee, Lord, the praise they brought ;

We seek Thee as Thy saints have sought
In every generation.

Their joy unto their Lord we bring ;

Their song to us descendeth :

The Spirit who in them did sing

To us His music lendeth.

His song in them, in us, is one ;

We raise it high, we send it on—

The song that never endeth !

Ye saints to come take up the strain—

The same sweet theme endeavour ;

Unbroken be the golden chain !

Keep on the song for ever !

Safe in the same dear dwelling-place,

Rich with the same eternal grace,

Bless the same boundless giver !

Of this hymn Mr. Gill also spoke to a friend, who wrote of it in the British Weekly of July 14, 1894:—

"It was written in 1868, and I well remember the occasion. One of my most precious heirlooms is a staff, bearing the date 1692, which belonged to a Puritan ancestor. While handling the staff one Sunday I became filled with the thought which forthwith took shape in the hymn ; with a lively sense of fellowship with our fathers, in their aspiration and endeavours, their sorrows and their joys."

Later, to the same friend, he said:—

"I fully believe in those tides of song which we cannot command, in seasons which come and go not at our bidding, wherein the soul, whilst in the fullest possession and happiest exercise of all its powers, is yet borne on by a power beyond itself. I have known such seasons, and have vainly sought to prolong them. Hymns have flowed forth day after day and week after week with the unforced and gladsome co-operation of all my faculties. After a while I have set myself to write hymns, and have with effort accomplished the task. But the task was not worth accomplishing ; the song had no life, no glow, no power. I never shall forget the birthday of the hymn of which we have spoken, or that of the poem entitled "Mirrored Glory," the last hymn in the new edition. Both days were steeped with inspiration. From morning till night the rapture of production glowed on. The year 1881 was a very happy year of my life, and in it I composed an unusual number of hymns. On the other hand, after I lost a dearly loved brother in 1873, I wrote no hymns for seven years.

THE only heroism, fitted for the last extremity of circumstance, is that of disinterested duty.—Martineau.

TOWARDS SOCIAL REFORM.

THE LAND AND THE UNEMPLOYED.

IN an article published under this heading on January 13, readers of THE INQUIRER may remember that I expressed my belief that in establishing administrative councils empowered to buy land for labour colonies, the late Government, when they carried the Unemployed Workmen Act, had taken the right initial steps, though the measure was altogether inadequate. I suggested that these mere temporary labour colonies should be made training grounds for such of the unemployed as seemed specially qualified to become farm workers and were desirous of doing so. It was suggested also, that there should be established higher grade colonies to which these trained men should be drafted and permanently settled with their families ; and that a market for their surplus food produce should be created by adding to the agricultural colony miscellaneous workers who would take the surplus food and, in return, would supply the agriculturists with clothing, furniture, and so on. Thus, I contended, it would be possible on the land to create at once a new supply and a new market, and to get over what is always found to be the crucial difficulty of agricultural colonies—the difficulty of profitably disposing of surplus food produce.

Mr. Richard Robinson, in his friendly and appreciative comments published on January 20, thought that I exaggerated the difficulty of disposing of surplus. He contended that any well-organised scheme of municipal or national land cultivation should include an organisation of transport and distribution as a necessary part of it.

It was not so much the difficulty of finding a market that I wished to emphasise, but of finding a market so regularly and permanently profitable as to permit of a home colony enterprise being safely built upon it. Establish a really efficient farm and agricultural colony, and no doubt it would be easy enough to establish in connection with it a dépôt in the nearest populous centre for the sale of surplus produce. But what would be the advantage of incurring transit and dépôt expenses ? Why go running about the country with your produce if it is possible to establish on the spot an industrial colony which will take practically all that can be produced, while this new colony will itself afford new work for unemployed people in supplying all the secondary needs of the food-raisers ? One great advantage of home-colonisation of the land would be that it would afford immediate work for the unemployed and relieve the community of all the burden of them, without necessarily interfering at all with the established order of things. I entirely agree with Mr. Robinson in anticipating the time when public organisation and control shall be extended to all the necessities of life, just as it is now being applied to the supply of gas and water and travelling facilities. But this land colonising would be one way of bringing it about, and one large measure of reform is enough at a time. If you pour large quantities of surplus produce into town dépôts you will certainly be tending to bring down prices, and thus you will be benefiting the whole community. But it is not an altogether unqualified benefit. Your central dépôt will be taking away the trade of small shopkeepers and costermongers and house-to-house greengrocers who may not unreasonably complain that they are being ruined by trading enterprise supported by public capital. As Mr. H. Shaen Solly, in his admirable article of February 3, warns us we should be careful not to benefit one class of those who are needing help by dragging down another class. And besides, although it is true that by bringing down prices you are benefiting the community, you are also at the same time bringing down the profits on which your colony depends, and that dwindling of profits will go steadily on just in proportion as your colonial enterprise develops, and it is quite conceivable that in course of time you may have farm colonies competing against each other to their mutual ruin.

The fact is that to set up farm colonies on a large scale, and to base them on a system of profit making in the open market, would be to proceed on the old false principle of competitive rivalry. The principle on which I am anxious to see this work established is not competitive at all, but what I take to be the essentially Christian principle of co-operation for the general good ; and it is because I think I see that it is possible to solve all our social problems—employments and homes and feeding, transit, and healthy physique—on this principle that I appeal to the Christian churches to throw in the whole weight of their influence and the whole strength of the best organised efforts they can make to get this better principle recognised and acted on in the interests not only of the poor and unemployed, but of the whole community. What a different country this would be in ten years' time if all the Christian churches would drop their unchristian rivalries and their argumentative bickerings and wranglings over matters about which we none of us know or can know much, and the best and ablest of men are bound to differ—if they would just agree to a great armistice, and join in one united effort to solve the problem of destitution and unemployment, not by cut-throat competition in any form, but by a great public scheme of harmonious and beneficent co-operation !

Mr. Robinson points out that I do not include the cultivation of timber in my recommendations. It is true that I said nothing about it, but I assume that what is sometimes called afforestation would constitute a part of any adequate scheme of an agricultural and industrial home colony, and it might be advantageously adopted as a means of permitting of that extensive acquisition of land in the neighbourhood of a colony which would practically secure to the community all the benefits created by its development. An agricultural and industrial colony should have its own woods that in the summer time would afford a delightful pleasure resort, and in the winter would give employment to a good many frozen-out farming and gardening hands, besides, of course, yielding firewood, and timber for building and for workshops and factories. Afforestation on a scale adequate to the requirements of a considerable colony would be an important feature of such a scheme.

One does not want, in dealing with a practical subject of this kind, to indulge in anything like sentimental gush; else it would be easy to conjure up a fascinating picture of a new model community with its own shady woods and shining waters, its waving cornfields and green pastures, its cottage homes and well-stocked gardens and laden orchards, its model dairies and factories and workshops, its schools and libraries and reading rooms, its public halls and institutions and recreation grounds—absolutely all of it the new creation of England's surplus capital and her waste land, and her unemployed manhood.

All Utopian, you say—merely visionary and impracticable. It is nothing of the kind. It is all sober feasibility. Look at it carefully, and say what single item in it would be beyond the power of a reasonable amount of capital expenditure and good organising ability to achieve. The real truth is, that entirely out of the wealth of well-tilled land we can conjure up a new Utopia such as I have depicted whenever we choose to do it and just as often as we find it necessary for the healing of all our social diseases that are humanly curable. Mr. Herbert Mills, who has for years been intimately associated with an actual experiment of the kind, does not regard it as at all impracticable. He feels, as everybody else does, that it is a complicated problem we have to solve, and that it is no simple measure that can do it. It is only in a colony that the necessarily complicated remedy can be attempted, he says, and he believes that colonies are efforts in the right direction. But Mr. Mills, in his article of February 10, indicates the conditions of success pretty much as I did in my last article. A large experiment is needed in his opinion; it must, of course, have the very best of management, and the importance of abundant capital is emphasised by the experience of Mr. Mills himself, who would have commenced his bold and interesting scheme with 400 acres of land, but failed to secure sufficient financial support, and had therefore to be content with 128 acres. Given all the necessary conditions—a good bold scale, good business management and unstinted capital, and this perfectly natural and most complete of all possible remedies for the sorrows and sufferings and all the social evils of unemployment could be taken in hand with absolute certainty of success, socially and financially.

But Mr. Richard Simon, in his article of January 27, regards the alleged existence of a large body of deserving and capable people out of work, and, from no fault of their own, unable to get in again, as a fallacy and mere assumption. Most people, of course, believe it to be nothing of the kind. It is a fact demonstrated by all sorts of evidence, that not only in hard times but at all times, even when things are at their best, we have in our midst a very large aggregate of such people. And it is not merely a question of unemployment either. There are always the unemployed and the insufficiently employed, but there are also the over-employed, the sweated and the cruelly under-paid. It is not even a question of the "working classes" only.

The wretched struggle for a bare living in homes accounted above the class of the "unemployed" is one of the most pathetic aspects of our social problem. What we require is, in some measure at least, to get back to first principles and to make a fresh start. I am very well aware that a large proportion of the workless are idle and vicious, and do not really want work. With this section of them I have not proposed directly to deal. The suggestion I made started with "2,000 family men of good physique and respectable character." Mr. Simon apparently does not believe that there are such men in any considerable numbers, and if there are, he thinks it a fallacy to assume that any material and permanent improvement could be effected by moving this "supposed surplus" to the land. If they were thus removed, it is a mere gratuitous assumption on my part that they would stay there.

Well, if, when the community has done its best for them—when it has given them good homes and assured work and abundant living and all sorts of social opportunities and advantages, all secured to them on the simple conditions that they work and conduct themselves like honest men and respectable citizens—if then they refuse to work, and come back to cadging and processioning in towns, we shall at least be under no mistake about their characters or their deserts, and we shall know better how to deal with them. With the utmost confidence and a perfectly clear conscience we may then resolve that we will stand no nonsense. Mr. Robinson makes a strong point when he urges that "we cannot deal trenchantly and satisfactorily with the shirker and the beggar until we have placed it beyond the possibility of doubt that a man can earn a living for himself and those dependent on him if he will." A great agricultural and industrial colony giving scope for all sorts of working power would afford the means of subjecting every man professing to want employment to an infallible test, and so all-important is it to have such a test that it would be well worth the nation's while to set up at least one such colony if only as an unfailing means of distinguishing between the genuine unemployed and the mere idle loafer. It is, of course, not to be disputed that "the unemployed" include a lamentable proportion of the most hopelessly demoralised of human waifs and wastrels, the most difficult and troublesome people it is possible to have to do with. But one of the strongest arguments for a thorough reform in the social and industrial conditions of the poorer of our people is that existing conditions tend to breed such people as inevitably as filthy personal conditions tend to breed parasites. They are the vermin of the social body, and if we want to be rid of them we must somehow get rid of the conditions which produce them. It is of no use merely scratching and rubbing our backs. We must, as a community, become clean and wholesome in our lives and our surroundings. We want moral soap and water for our masses, and we must rout out all the foul nooks and corners in which children have, some of them, the misfortune not to be killed outright by an atmosphere of moral pestilence in which habits of vice and idleness and self-indulgence develop as naturally as mildew grows on damp walls.

A ready and infallible test of the genuineness of a man's demand for work is the very first thing required in any process of reform. At the same time let us not fall into the grievous mistake of assuming that all the "unemployed" may be sharply divided into two classes. The unemployed for the most part are very much like the rest of us—neither altogether good nor entirely bad. Loafing and tramping after a certain time no doubt become in a good many men practically ineradicable, but we ought never to assume that any man's case is hopeless till we have given him a fair chance of reform and have done the best that a civilised society can do to give him a real motive. A casual job of stone-breaking or a spell of hard labour on some desolate expanse of unreclaimed land for mere food and shelter cannot be said to afford such a motive to a man who has, perhaps, been embittered by misfortune and demoralised by long inability to get fairly remunerative work. But put such a man down upon a new model colony, give him a man's place in it and a man's share in its success and development, open to him a prospect of permanently comfortable and prosperous and progressive life, not only for himself, but for all who may be dependent on him, and you give the man altogether a new start. You put a new mainspring of hope and interest in him. A man must be foregone indeed on his way to the devil if he does not respond in some degree to the appeal that the new order of things would be calculated to make to all that was best within him. To many a poor mortal such a colony would be a new world and a new life. It would be a rescue from perdition, a revival and a conversion in a very real sense, and thousands of unfortunate people, steeped in poverty and buried alive in our slums, would thank God for the churches if they would only take the lead in a great movement towards the realisation of such an ideal. I repeat, that the true remedy for unemployment is in principle extremely simple, and in practice would be perfectly safe and effective if we would only adopt it with faith and resolution. We want faith in the productive possibilities of God's broad acres and in the wonder-working power of human brotherhood, and when from one end of the land to the other the Christian pulpits are preaching this new gospel of old principles, the churches will enter on a new phase of their existence.

I have received, among other communications, a letter from a much-respected clergyman of the West-End, in which he says some very kind things about the article which opened this discussion, and in which he expresses a desire to join others in taking some definite action—not by way of starting a colony, but in disseminating practical ideas on the subject as widely and influentially as possible. If there are among the readers of THE INQUIRER any who are similarly moved, I shall be glad if they will communicate with me.

AMERICAN NOTES.

THE item of news that I take most pleasure in communicating to your readers is one sure to be of interest to religious liberals the world over. Mr. John C. Haynes, a prominent and wealthy citizen of Boston, in former days a parishioner of Theodore Parker and always a staunch supporter of the Memorial Church in this city which perpetuates his name, has authorised the American Unitarian Association to prepare and issue, at his expense, a new and complete edition of Theodore Parker's writings. A publication committee has been appointed, consisting of Mr. Frank B. Sanborn, of Concord, Parker's literary executor, from whose collection of thousands of unprinted MSS. of Mr. Parker it is hoped to glean new and valuable material; Col. T. Wentworth Higginson, Edwin D. Mead, Revs. S. A. Eliot, Paul R. Frothingham, Chas. W. Wendte, and T. Haynes Holmes, the last-named a grandson of the generous donor and a gifted young minister of our church. The editor is yet to be chosen. The edition will consist of some sixteen or more volumes, and follow in general the lines of that issued by Miss Frances Power Cobbe. As is generally known, the last-named edition, like the American one, is out of print, even the plates are no longer in existence. The promise, therefore, of a new, handsome, and enlarged set of Theodore Parker's works, with perhaps additional biographical material, will be welcomed by the admirers of the great American teacher and reformer the world over.

A new edition of the two volumes of addresses, lectures, and sermons by the late Rev. Thomas Starr King, will also be published by the American Unitarian Association at an early day. They are among the classics of the American liberal pulpit, and richly deserve to be treasured by our fellowship.

Rev. Minot J. Savage, D.D., the eminent Unitarian divine, has been compelled through stress of ill-health, to surrender his pulpit in New York to his senior colleague, the Rev. Robert Collyer, while he seeks greatly needed recuperation in Southern California for a few months. While his absence for even this short space of time from his important post is a distinct loss to our cause, we are gratified to hear that Dr. Savage's ailment is not organic, but a temporary nervous prostration, curable by rest and sunshine. It is a blessing to all concerned that Mr. Collyer, despite his four-score years, is able to resume his active duties in pulpit and pastoral work. Dr. Savage's son is minister of a flourishing society in Redlands, Southern California, whither the father has turned his footsteps. A member of Dr. Savage's New York Church has just given $200,000 towards the erection of a new and commodious children's hospital, to replace an inadequate one now chiefly conducted by the ladies of this church.

Rev. S. A. Eliot, D.D., president of the American Unitarian Association, has also gone westward to California on a tour of missionary work and inspection. One purpose of his visit is to dedicate a handsome edifice at Berkeley, California, the site of the California State University, with its 3,000 students, which a member of the Unitarian Church in the adjoining town of Oakland, has recently given as a home for the Pacific Coast Unitarian Divinity School. The latter is as yet a modest undertaking, with four students and half a dozen listeners. It is closely affiliated with the University, all of whose courses are opened to it without cost, and with the Congregational Theological Seminary of Berkeley, which has shown a very hospitable spirit. The dean, Rev. E. M. Wilbur, is not unknown in England, and has proven an admirable selection for the initiation of this work, which, it is understood, certain men of wealth in San Francisco and Oakland are prepared to endow with the necessary funds.

Rev. John Cuckson is making arrangements for an imposing observance, next August, of the 300th anniversary at Plymouth, Mass., of the founding of the Pilgrim Church in 1606, at Scrooby, England. Transplanted to Holland, and thence to the shores of the New World (in 1620), this church became the mother of a mighty host of Christian congregations, and, in the gradual evolution of religious thought in New England, became itself Unitarian in doctrine and fellowship.

The preparations for the next Congress, of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal religious thinkers and workers, to be held in Boston in the week beginning September 22, 1907, are already begun. The local executive committee consists of Rev. S. A. Eliot, D.D., chairman; Rev. Chas. W. Wendte, secretary; Rev. P. R. Frothingham, Rev. M. J. Savage, D.D., Rev. Dr. Bisbee (representing the Universalist body), Mr. Edwin D. Mead (president of the Free Religious Association) and Mr. Geo. Wigglesworth, treasurer. It is hoped that Rev. Geo. E. Gordon, D.D. the distinguished Congregational (Trinitarian) pastor of Boston, may accept an invitation tendered him to become a member of this committee. The list of honorary vice-presidents of the Congress will be impressive, including two Unitarian members of President Roosevelt's Cabinet, United States Senators and Congressmen, Supreme Court judges, Governors of States, presidents of colleges, authors, lawyers and professional men, merchants, &c. No pains or expense will be spared to make this a notable gathering, uniting all the liberal religious elements of the United States and Europe. The recreative side of the meeting will not be overlooked, and excursions to other American places of interest will be facilitated. The local committee is delighted to learn of the encouraging prospect of a large delegation from Great Britain at this Congress, and claiming its hospitalities.

Rev. Dr. S. M. Crothers, who visits England in April for a few months' stay, will bear our greetings and invitations. Professors Christy and Gilman, of the Meadville Theological School, will soon be in England also, it being their purpose to spend their Sabbatical year abroad. We, for our part, shall be very much pleased to welcome the Rev. Joseph Wood and others from England. So let interchanges of thought and goodwill, expressed by personal visits and communications, increase among us, and international peace and amity and united endeavours for the enlightenment and religious emancipation of the world be their happy fruit.—CHAS. W. WENDTE.

NEWCHURCH CENTENARY BAZAAR.

THE centenary of Bethlehem Church, Newchurch-in-Rossendale, to which we briefly alluded last week, has been marked by a splendidly successful effort on the part of the congregation to strengthen their position.

The church had its origin in the ejection of the Rev. Joseph Cooke, on account of heresy, from the Wesleyan Methodist body. Mr. Cooke, who had been stationed at Rochdale, and after his ejection became the minister of an independent congregation there, had made his influence deeply felt at Newchurch, and this led to a secession there also, under the leadership of John Ashworth; he and Cooke making a monthly exchange, until the lamented illness and early death of the latter in 1811 deprived the new congregations of his leadership. How they fared and were brought very soon into fellowship with neighbouring Unitarian congregations is told in an interesting historical sketch published by the Rev. J. J. Shaw, M.A., the present minister, in connection with the centenary. The history of the congregation is traced down to the present time.

The object of the Centenary Bazaar, now brought to so successful an issue, is described in the following statement:—"To raise £1,000 in order to worthily celebrate the 100th year of the Church's existence, and thus commemorate in a practical way the many labours in connection with Bethlehem Church, begun by Joseph Cooke, splendidly carried on for forty years by John Ashworth and his friends, and afterwards by their successors, who continued to manifest the spirit of zeal and devotion. Specifically the objects of the bazaar are:—(1) To thoroughly renovate the church and make good any external defects; (2) to build a new church vestry; (3) to liquidate the debt of £500 incurred by recent purchase of house property adjacent to school; (4) in any other practical way, yet to be decided by the congregation and officials, to equip ourselves for what we trust will be a future of increased usefulness."

On February 27 the Bazaar was opened by Mr. G. H. Leigh, of Monton, and in the unavoidable absence of the Rev. J. J. Wright (an old scholar) Mr. R. D. Darbishire kindly consented to take the chair. The Rev. Jenkyn Thomas opened with prayer. As Mr. Darbishire read that grand hymn, "Before Jehovah's awful throne," it became evident that the crowded audience was feeling already something of that power and inspiration which marked the entire proceedings. Mr. Darbishire recalled his early memories of Newchurch, when more than fifty years ago he was a member of the Manchester Village Missionary Society. That occasion, he added, was no ordinary one, when people connected with different churches, each pursuing his own path, were joining hand in hand in stepping the narrow way. That was their cause—brotherhood and sisterhood—and it rested with both young and old to follow it. Faith, hope, and love were their mottoes, and there they saw open brotherhood and a real Christianity, and the freedom of God within them. He could say no more, except to welcome them there that day, and trust they would exert themselves in helping on everything connected with the bazaar.

Mr. Leigh, in declaring the Bazaar open, wished them every success, and said that he had never come across a company where both young and old were so eager for doing good work. From the bottom of his heart he hoped, under the providence of God, they might continue their noble work.

On Wednesday, Feb. 28, the proceedings were opened by Ald. Thos. Holt, of Bury, who gave a very interesting account of the relations between the Newchurch and Bury congregations in the old days. He spoke in terms of high admiration of the Revs. Joseph Cooke and John Ashworth, the founders of Bethlehem Church. Councillor David Healey, of Heywood, presided, and gave a stirring address. Among others on the platform were the Rev. T. P. Spedding and the Rev. A. D. Garrow, of the Bethel Baptist Church, who offered the prayer. Thursday, March 1, had been looked forward to for the reason that Mr. H. W. Trickett, J.P., a leading local manufacturer, had accepted the invitation to open. Mr. Trickett, who is a member of the Baptist Church, paid a warm tribute to the important work which had been and was being carried on at Bethlehem Church, and went on to say that he would give an additional 10 per cent. to the day's takings (close upon £200). On this day Councillor Robert Ashworth presided, and the Rev. M. E. Farwell (Wesleyan) offered prayer. The Rev. J. J. Wright was also present, and spoke very highly of the Bazaar book and historical sketch. After a day's rest the effort was resumed on Saturday, March 3, when the Mayor of Rawtenstall, Councillor H. Coupe, also a Baptist, opened the proceedings, and Mr. Alfred Ashworth, of Cloughfold, presided. The Rev. F. S. Foster (U.M.F.C.) offered prayer. Neither in connection with the opening ceremonies nor the day's sales was there any sign of abatement of interest or enthusiasm. From first to last there had not been a slack hour. The schoolroom, decorated by the members of the Church to represent an old English village, called forth many expressions of admiration. After all, the financial result, fine though it is, is the least part of the success; of far more value is the goodwill and sympathy which have been shown by members of other churches, and the fervent enthusiasm of the members themselves. Money is only a sign and an index.

The proceedings were continued on Monday and Tuesday, with the result of a total of £1,331 2s. 10½d. received. To this must be added £375 16s. 3d. previously raised by the members as an "Alterations Fund," making £1,706 19s. 1½d. in all. On this the minister and members of Bethlehem Church are to be warmly congratulated.

Trust and hope breathe animation and force. He who despairs of great effects never accomplishes them. All great works have been the results of a strong confidence inspiring and sustaining strong exertion.—Channing.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

SCOTLAND.

INTEREST in the processional results of the cleavage of the "Free Church" from the "United Free Church" is for a time suspended. The Commission to whom the settlement of claims was remitted is travelling in the Highlands, amid snow and jealousy, and has had to ask for an extension of time. An extension till September next has been granted, and there is much Celtic irritation over the protracted inquiries and consideration. The high heat of the sectarian friction has subsided, but much fervent indignation remains, which may yet rise to burning point.

During the truce the Free Church has endeavoured to consolidate and extend its organisation, but the latter part of the work has been made almost impossible by scarcity of ministers. In Aberdeen it has tried to form a congregation, and claimed a church from the United Free. It is hardly likely that its trial or its claim will succeed, for the thirty-three congregations of the U. F. Church in Aberdeen are solid.

The United Free Church, conscious of its own strength, and more open to progressive influences, holds its place with freshened determination, though the decrease in its Sustentation Fund gives it much concern. Till the Commission announces its decision neither body will know how it stands legally or have peace to work.

The Established Church is expecting an act of freedom from the next General Assembly as a result of the Churches (Scotland) Act anent the formula of adhesion to the Confession of Faith. Professors of even the conservative and ritualistic sort join in the hope of a "liberal formula." Professor Cooper, of Glasgow, who combines ritualism with conservatism, expressed, at a recent Presbyterial meeting, a desire for "a liberal, but not a vague or vapid formula." In this hope representative men in the U. F. Church join. The Rev. Dr. McCrie, in his concluding Chalmers Lecture in the U. F. Church College, Glasgow, at the end of last month, said he favoured the idea of "a reconstructed Church of Scotland, with a reconstructed Confession, being of opinion that there is a clear call for a new, much briefer and simpler creed to be declared by some twentieth century Assembly of a National United Church of Scotland."

In Scottish religious journals the tendency towards a simpler creed is manifest. The Scottish Review, for example (which, though evangelical in the conventional sense, is liberal in tone), in its scholarly reviews of theological publications expresses very decided advanced ideas. In the number for March 1 it declares that "English theology has suffered from a too rigid insistence upon the actuality, and even the probable actuality, of the resurrection apart from all considerations as to who he is of whom so singular a thing is asserted, as though here was a fact which was in itself as certain as anything in history, and from which the true nature of the Risen One was to be thereafter inferred." That is going where the fire is!

In the same number the Rev. Professor Orr, D.D., in answering some criticisms passed on his book on the Old Testament, said: "Sooner or later, if things go on as they are doing, there is bound to come a cleavage in Biblical and theological matters, in which—just as is happening in politics—all parties will be shaken out of their apathy and compelled to take sides." These are evidences of the state of the theological mind in Scotland at present. Divine cleavage, come quickly!

While the orthodox churches are thus in the hands of the civil and the critical forces, our heterodox (?) churches are continuing "the upward look," and endeavouring more fully to "Catch the voice that wanders earth

With spiritual summons."

The Kirkcaldy congregation, after long and almost hopeless waiting for a minister, has invited the Rev. Charles Sneddon, late assistant minister in the parish of Thurmaster, Wick, to take office over it, and he has the call under consideration. He won golden opinions in his northern sphere as an earnest preacher, and distinguished himself in the promotion of literary studies and elocutionary art among the young. But his thought had so changed that he could no longer profess belief in the creed of the church, and felt it to be his duty to resign office in it. He is averse to notoriety, and the cutting of his connection with orthodoxy was quietly done. He preached on two Sundays to our congregation here, in its temporary home, and was heartily welcomed. He is desirous of seeing more of our life as a denomination ere he settles anywhere, but he may be prevailed upon to remain in Kirkcaldy. There is a general desire to see the congregation there furnished with an efficient minister.

The Kilmarnock congregation has rallied heartily round the Rev. W. Wilson, and though it is but a remnant, it is active and hopeful. There are many obstacles to its progress, but by careful and patient work they may be overcome.

There is nothing, so far as I know, in the condition of the churches in Dundee, Edinburgh, and Glasgow calling for special notice.

In Aberdeen we are impatient to occupy our new building. It is rapidly approaching completion, and we hoped to enter upon the church in June next. But with all the speed we could set the tradesmen to, it seemed impossible that it would be properly finished by that time. We have, therefore, fixed the opening for September. We have been fortunate in securing an array of famous men for the series of dedicatory services, as well be seen by the programme of opening:—

September 16.—The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., Manchester College, Oxford.

September 19 or 26.—Rev. John Hunter, D.D., of Glasgow.

September 23.—Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, London.

September 30.—Rev. John Glasse, D.D., Old Greyfriars, Edinburgh.

In completing our arrangements thus we think we have effected a feat of ecclesiastical comprehension! The erection of our new building, central, commodious, and beautiful, is to us a great event, and we are desirous that it should be marked in a worthy way. The week of its opening will be a royal one in Aberdeen, for on some day in it the King will come to open the new Marischal University. We do not expect him to take any part in our ceremonies, but we thought it desirable to have ours simultaneous with the others. Most of the week will be given up to academic functions, and there will be a great stir in the city. We are looking forward to our jubilation with high hope.

The praise of the appearance of our new building is universal. It has a unique, solid, and handsome front, and promises to be highly suitable internally. Everything in the erection and fittings of it has been carefully considered, and economy and utility have been well combined. The cost has considerably exceeded our estimates, and we shall require more money ere we can meet all our debts. This doubtless will come in course of time. We rejoice that we have been able to erect a structure so worthy of our cause, and to have it so nearly free of debt.

Next month we shall hold anniversary services in the Union Hall, our present meeting place, and Miss Marian Pritchard will be the preacher. Our people are holding together very loyally, though to winter in a large hall is trying. The forenoon services suffer much through severe weather, but the evening attendances are usually large. I am hopeful that we shall enter our new church with a largely augmented membership. It is much more central, and will be much more comfortable than the old one. The old place can hardly be traced now; where it was there are shops with three stories of dwelling-houses over them.

We hope to have the use of our new hall in June next, and we shall enter on its occupancy quietly, leaving the formal dedication of it till Mr. Carpenter gives his lecture "How to Read the Gospels." Before then we have much to do, and we are setting our minds devotedly to it.

ALEXANDER WEBSTER.

Aberdeen, March 5, 1906.

A UNITARIAN MISSION.

THE United Mission recently held by the four congregations at Ashton, Mossley, Mottram, and Stalybridge proved, we are informed, a most encouraging success. The idea was first suggested last September, and very careful preparations were made. The plan, as we have already reported, was to hold a Mission at each of the churches in turn during successive week-ends, the programme in each case to consist of Saturday devotional service and public meeting, special Sunday services, and a lantern lecture on Monday evening expounding Unitarian doctrines and ideas. A special hymn-paper with an invitation leaflet was widely distributed from house to house in the neighbourhood of each of the churches, and the announcement was also made by posters. The congregations united their forces most heartily in each of the Missions in turn. The Saturday meeting at Mossley coincided with the annual meeting of the East Cheshire Christian Union. The hymns were thoroughly popular both as to words and tunes, and proved a great strength to the Mission. The lantern lectures were: "In the Footsteps of the Master," by the Rev. T. P. Spedding, at Mottram; "The Prodigal Son," by the Rev. J. E. Stead, at Stalybridge; and "Good News," by the Rev. H. B. Smith, at Mossley and Ashton.

The Rev. H. Bodell Smith, of Mottram, who has furnished us with full particulars as to the Mission and the methods of preparation, writes as follows of the result:—

"The Mission has not brought in many outsiders to either the meetings or services. But that fact does not make the Mission fruitless or a failure. Before we can lay hold of outsiders, we need, above all, a Mission to ourselves. When our own people have had a new heart and a more fervent spirit put into them, we may be fit to go seeking to win those who are as yet beyond our walls. And yet the outsiders have been reached. Eight thousand leaflets explaining our faith have been taken from house to house. In eight thousand homes attention has been brought to the fact that we have a message to proclaim, a gospel to declare, and a real mission to mankind. That is something more than it is possible to measure. In many of those homes, doubtless, the little leaven has begun to work for a better disposition towards Unitarianism and to Unitarians.

"But the chief good accruing from the Mission has been among our own people. The four churches have been drawn into closer fellowship; they have united in each other's meetings; they have mixed together as 'one brotherhood in heart,' and as members of one Household of Faith; and their hearts have been warmed to each other; their love for their church and faith has been roused into fervent expression; and there has been a kindling of earnestness and zeal amongst them that is not likely to die out. The Mission has been a grand object-lesson in united effort, which may lead to various forms of mutual help that will put new value into church membership. At the fourth week-end our people were expressing deep regret on all sides that the Mission was coming to its close. They wished for more, and felt that they needed these meetings to go on. Many have been heard to say that the Mission has convinced them that they personally were not doing enough for their church and the faith it stands for. Resolves to give more devoted support and more ungrudging labour for the cause have been many. It has been a great refreshing of souls, and a new consecration to religion.

"One important factor has been the hymn-singing of good words to popular tunes, and as much of it as we could get. For instance, at the Saturday evening meetings the speeches have been short, not more than fifteen minutes, each followed by a hymn sung by the whole assembly. The programme of the meeting has been: Hymn, short prayer, hymn, chairman's address, hymn, speech, hymn, speech, hymn, speech, hymn, short speeches by laymen, hymn or doxology and benediction.

"Some of the speaking by lay members of the churches has included striking testimony to the value of our Unitarian doctrines. The ministers, too, have been seen in a new light. More than once in public speech was ministerial capacity for Mission work hailed as an agreeable discovery. The sermons of the special preachers were greatly appreciated, and thanks were expressed for their ready assistance. These four churches seem bent on having another United Mission next October as a beginning of the winter's work.

"Except at Sunday services, no collections were taken. Profit cleared from the Saturday tea and the collection at the Sunday afternoon service, it was understood, should go towards paying the share of each church towards expenses.

"The object of the Mission has been fulfilled as stated in the printed circular—'To arouse the members and adherents of each church, and the residents in its district, to a livelier interest in the religion of Jesus Christ as understood by Unitarians; to stir up a revival of fervency and zeal for our Unitarian faith, and of more devoted service for God and man.'"

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Belfast: First Church (Resignation).—The Rev. Douglas Walmsley, B.A., has resigned the pulpit of the First Presbyterian Church, Belfast, his resignation taking effect at the end of April. At a meeting of the congregation, held on March 4, the following resolution was unanimously passed: "The members of the First Presbyterian Church, Belfast, having heard Mr. Walmsley's address, in which he resigns the ministry of the congregation held by him for nearly twelve years, and being assured that he has fully and carefully considered this step before he arrived at this decision, regret that they have no option but to accept the resignation placed in their hands. They desire to record their warm appreciation of Mr. Walmsley's many excellent qualities, his ripe scholarship, his zeal for truth, and his honourable and Christian conduct on all occasions and in all places. They also hope that ere long he may feel able to resume ministerial work, and to find a sphere of Christian activity worthy of his high character, ability, and eloquence."

Chester (Farewell Presentation).—On Feb. 20 a soiree was held at Matthew Henry's Chapel on the occasion of the Rev. H. E. Haycock's farewell to the members of his congregation. Mr. T. Arthur Johnston, a trustee of the chapel, presided. There was a large attendance of members and friends. Mr. W. W. Tasker, in making the presentation, which consisted of a suitably-inscribed cigar case, together with a purse of gold, bore testimony to the fact that Mr. Haycock's ministry had been a notable one. The cause of Unitarianism in Chester had flourished, and during the five years of his pastorate the various activities in connection with their chapel had been considerably extended. He also alluded to the good public work Mr. Haycock had accomplished as a member of the Board of Guardians. On behalf of all present he wished him God-speed in his new work at Bolton. Mr. Haycock warmly acknowledged the gift, and assured them it would ever remain a source of great satisfaction to him to know that he had gained their affection and esteem. After referring to his work among them, he dwelt on the possibilities of his new work at Bolton, and thanked them one and all for the great kindness they had always shown him. A splendid musical programme followed, and brought a very pleasant evening to a close.

Chorley.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held on Sunday last, presided over by the minister, the Rev. W. T. Bushrod, and the reports of the past year's work were eminently satisfactory. The attendance at public worship for some time past has been a great cause of thankfulness.

Crewkerne.—The annual entertainment in connection with the Sunday-school took place at the Town Hall on Wednesday and Thursday, February 28 and March 1, and was, as in previous years, most successful. There was a crowded attendance, numbering nearly 600 parents and young people on Wednesday (children's night), and on Thursday, in spite of very unfavourable weather, the hall was packed. The pieces chosen this year were the fairy plays of "Red Riding Hood" and "Blue Beard," and the scholars acquitted themselves admirably, reflecting the utmost credit on themselves and on Mrs. Sutcliffe, who had trained them. The entertainment, which gave great delight, realised nearly £25.

Llandyssul.—The annual Sunday-school tea and concert were held on February 28, and passed off with great éclat. The chapel and vestry were crowded during the proceedings, and an outsider coming upon the scene would conclude that the spirit and enthusiasm prevailing indicated a strong and united people. Mr. Lewis Thomas, superintendent of the Sunday-school, presided at the evening entertainment, the minister acting as conductor. The sum collected by the penny bank during 1905, amounting to nearly £50, was distributed, as well as the examination certificates of the Sunday-school section of the South Wales Unitarian Association. A hearty vote of thanks was passed to Miss Lewis, Pontwelly, who kindly furnished the tea, and to Mr. E. C. Richards and P. C. Thomas, who had charge of the musical programme.

London: Child's Hill.—At the morning service to-morrow (Sunday) the preacher will be the Rev. W. H. Read, who, until the last few weeks, has been a Catholic priest at Cambridge. Mr. Read has met with no little success in the priesthood, but his views have been, for some considerable time, passing through a stage of unsettlement, and he has now given up his living.

London: Kentish Town (Welcome Meeting).—A large and influential meeting was held in the schoolroom of the Free Christian Church, Clarence-road, on Thursday evening, the 1st inst., to welcome the Rev. Frederick Hankinson to the ministry of the Church. There was a reception from 7.30 to 8.30, after which the chair was taken by Mr. Armytage Bakewell. The secretary (Mr. A. Savage Cooper) read letters of regret for absence from Professor Carpenter, Revs. Frank K. Freeston, J. Page Hopps, and many others, including the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, (a former minister of the Church) and Mrs. Bayle Bernard (the oldest member of the Church), wishing Mr. Hankinson every success in the difficult task he had undertaken. Mr. C. Fellows Pearson, (the president), Mr. Oswald Nettlefold, (the treasurer), and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie (the secretary) of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association; Mr. G. Harold Clennell, the secretary of the London District Unitarian Society, and the Rev. F. Allen, the secretary of the Provincial Assembly, the Rev. William Wooding, as the oldest settled minister in London, and Rev. A. A. Charlesworth of Highgate and Mr. E. F. Grundy, the secretary of Hampstead Church, all expressed a very hearty welcome to Mr. Hankinson on behalf of their societies and churches. Mr. Armytage Bakewell, on behalf of the congregation, also offered him a most cordial welcome and assured him of the earnest co-operation of all the members of the Church. Mr. Hankinson acknowledged with much feeling the welcome accorded him. A man, he said, must have faith in his work or he would be useless in any calling. There was need for faith in our simple religion that it might reach the teeming masses in the crowded districts of London. He had been pitted by some for coming to so difficult a task, but he had been ministering to the church for the past three months and had felt an imperative call to undertake the charge by reason of the earnestness of all the members of the congregation. He found reason for encouragement, and was determined to put his best strength into the work, for which he asked the Divine blessing. After the welcome ceremony the church was thrown open for the inspection of friends, and was much admired by many who had not previously seen it. Some songs were sung and refreshments were served during the evening. The meeting closed with the singing of the doxology. There was a general feeling throughout of hope and confidence in the future.

London: Peckham.—The annual meeting and prize distribution of the Sunday-school and band of hope was held on Wednesday, Feb. 28. Mr. Cooley, the church secretary, presided during the earlier part of the meeting, the prizes being distributed by Dr. B. C. Ghosh.

The expenses of the meeting were more than met by the proceeds of a concert given a few weeks ago by Mr. G. Carter.

London: Stepney.—The annual meeting of the members and friends of College Chapel was held on Thursday evening, the 1st inst., when there was a good attendance. Mr. A. N. Stuart, of Islington, presided. The report and statement of accounts were read and submitted by Miss F. Hill, hon. secretary and treasurer. The former was a record of good work, only possible through the devotion of the ladies who have voluntarily undertaken the duties. Morning and evening services were regularly held, there was a Sunday-school of 100 scholars, and the other agencies included temperance and mothers' meetings, provident society, and singing classes. The accounts showed an adverse balance of about £12, consequent upon the cessation of grants, although there had been considerable curtailment in the expenses; but the work would go forward, even if further economies were necessary. It was hoped, however, that new subscribers would be forthcoming. It was found easier to obtain money for the social work than for the religious, though that was made a distinctive feature of the mission. Amongst others present who took a part in the proceedings were Miss Tagart, Miss E. C. Lake, Miss Read, the Misses Reed, Miss Woolnough, Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, Mr. Ward, Mr. C. Read, and Mr. E. Capleton, who continues to occupy the pulpit and superintend the Sunday-school.

London: Wandsworth.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held on Tuesday evening, the business being transacted in the course of a very pleasant evening of a social character. In the absence of the chairman (Mr. Biggs) the chair was taken by Mr. Charles Fenton. Mr. H. B. Lawford presented the report, and Mr. Hugh James the treasurer's accounts, both of which had been previously printed. A resolution of confidence in the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, and of gratitude to him and Mrs. Tarrant for their devoted work, was very cordially passed, and the occasion was taken to wish Mr. Tarrant Bon voyage for the tour in the East, on which he is to start with Mr. Ion Pritchard next Tuesday. Naples, Athens, Smyrna, Constantinople are in their route, and then Palestine and Egypt. During the six Sundays of Mr. Tarrant's absence the services are to be conducted by the Rev. V. D. Davis, who is a member of the congregation.

Lye.—A bazaar in connection with the Unitarian Chapel was held on Monday and Tuesday, February 26 and 27. The total sum realised by means of subscriptions, collections, and sales now amounts to £200 18s. 6d. This is the gross amount, the net sum realised being a little over £185.

Manchester: Sunday-school Holiday Home.—The Rev. Charles Peach delivered a lecture dealing with the history and working of the above at Blackley and Oldham on Monday and Tuesday of this week. The lecture was illustrated by over 100 beautiful lantern slides, which were much enjoyed by crowded audiences at both places.

Manchester: Upper Brook Street.—The Rev. Charles Peach has just delivered a course of Sunday evening sermons on the poems of Robert Browning. The closing address was on "Saul," and, as being in keeping with it, a special musical character was given to the service. Violin solos were given from Schumann and Godart by Mr. Oederlin, and Mr. F. C. Wild sang the tenor recitative and air "Deeper and deeper still," and "Waft her, Angels" from "Jephthah." The church was well filled, and the service was much appreciated.

Pudsey.—The Unitarian Dramatic Society performed in the Victoria Hall on Saturday evening, and attracted, as usual, a large and appreciative audience. On Sunday evening the minister, the Rev. A. Amey, discoursed on "The Fellowship we Offer," the subject being suggested by the inauguration of the Unitarian Mission in Bradford.

Sheffield.—Professor Carpenter's closing lecture of the course on "The Christ of the Creeds and the Christ of Experience" was delivered on Thursday last. There have been good attendances at the series, and much appreciation has been felt and expressed. Cordial thanks were voted to the lecturer, Revs. C. J. Street, A. H. Dolphin, and H. Dawtry, and Mr. Rowntree, a member of the Society of Friends, taking part in the resolution. The lectures have been attended by many who have no connection with our churches.

Swansea.—At the annual meeting of the congregation on Tuesday week the loss sustained by the removal of Dr. Tudor Jones to New Zealand was recorded, but otherwise the report presented by Mr. C. H. Perkins was satisfactory. Mrs. Reid, who also presented a very satisfactory balance-sheet, resigned the office of treasurer, and was very cordially thanked for her long services to the church. Mr. J. J. Guppy was appointed treasurer. Mr. J. Moy Evans presided.

Walsley.—On Saturday afternoon, March 3, the Rev. E. E. Jenkins cut the first sod on the site of the new school buildings, Mr. Robert Marsh presiding over the interesting ceremony, and immediately afterwards some thirty young men of the school and chapel, provided with spades, picks and barrows, joined enthusiastically in the work of excavation. Good progress was made with the work, and when darkness came on the ladies of the congregation provided tea for the workers. The growing needs of a successful Sunday-school, and the social work which is so important a part in the life of all congregations, particularly those in the country districts, have necessitated an extension of the schools at Walsley. For many years this has been in view, and some money having been accumulated it was decided to proceed with the erection of new buildings, towards which many Bolton friends have promised help. The old school buildings are to be divided into class rooms by movable glazed screens, and a new school and assembly hall to seat 300 is to be built. An entrance porch, cloak room, and other necessary accommodation will be provided, making altogether premises well suited for their work. The foundation stones will be laid in May by well-known friends of the congregation.

Wimbledon.—The first of the series of five Sunday evening services which are being held in the Worple Hall was conducted by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, of Wandsworth, on February 25, and was much appreciated by a good congregation. The address was on "God and Man." As Unitarians, Mr. Tarrant said, they were not there to enter into rivalry with other churches, but to offer what lay in their power as a guide, if possible, to those who (of whom there were many) who in these days of inquiry are seeking light in religious things. He then spoke of the cardinal thought cherished by Unitarians, that God is really a Father to man, and went on to show by many illustrations how much was implied by that relationship. Last Sunday the Rev. E. S. Hicks, of Islington, was the preacher, and his address on "The Personality of Jesus" was followed with deep interest by the thoughtful congregation present. At the close several names were given in of those willing to co-operate in the establishment of a church.

THE Rev. W. Rosling, whose retirement from the Congregational Church we have recorded, is engaged in organising a Unitarian Mission Church at the Co-operative Hall, Bowling Old-lane, Bradford. At the opening meeting some eighty persons were present. "Never again," said Mr. Rosling, "whatever may be the consequences—whatever may be entailed in the stand for liberty—never again, by God's grace, will some of us be trammelled by an ecclesiastical creed." What he wanted that church which was budding in West Bowling really to stand for was a simple, sincere, Christian life. They believed that purity of heart was essential to a knowledge of God. God was only realised in the soul. All men in all the ages who had known God had known Him in the depths of their being. Just as God came into the life of Jesus and Paul, and Peter and John, so God was coming into the life of men to-day. That he held to be the great necessity for such a movement as that which they were starting in that neighbourhood. They wanted to get away, and must get away at all costs, from the thought that God was an absentee from this part of the earth. It would never be worth their while to form a society in that part of Bradford merely to deny the validity of orthodox doctrine, but it was worth while to form a community to seek soul contact with God, and it seemed to him that there never was a greater need for that than at the present time. On Tuesday week Mr. Rosling attended the annual meeting of the Chapel-lane Unitarian congregation in Bradford, and received from the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones the right hand of fellowship:

BEDFORD COLLEGE, UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.—The Worshipful Company of Goldsmiths has made a grant of £1,000 to the building and endowment scheme for the above College. The Worshipful Company of Grocers have granted £25 for the same purpose. Two more donations towards the Queen's special list of £100 contributions have been received since the announcement from Her Grace the Duchess of Marlborough and Mr. and Mrs. Henry Yates Thompson.

THE REVISED Third Edition. ESSEX HALL HYMNAL

SMALL PICA, 534 HYMNS, CLOTH, RED EDGES.

PRICE 1/6 NET.

In the Index of First Lines a suitable tune for each Hymn is suggested.

The Essex Hall Hymnal, in its Older or Revised form, is now in use by 180 Congregations. The Revised Edition is printed in clear, large type, and strongly bound in cloth. Suitable tunes are indicated for each hymn, but congregations are not confined to one set tune.

THE EDITORS of the Revised Hymnal, the Revs. V. D. DAVIS, B.A., JAMES HARWOOD, B.A., and W. G. TARRANT, B.A., in their Preface say:—The Editors have had cordial help from many correspondents, to whose knowledge and critical suggestions the present book owes more than can be told. This fraternal co-operation inspires a trust that the new Hymnal may have escaped some of the perils which beset more private compilations. It represents the average feeling of a number of persons, who have made a special study of hymns, rather than the particular preferences of any individual.

TERMS FOR CONGREGATIONS.

Congregations ordering 20 copies at one time will be supplied direct from the Publisher, not through the Trade, at 1/- each; carriage extra. THE HYMNAL WITH CHANT BOOK combined, price 2/- net, with reduction for quantities.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THIS is the season of annual meetings. We report in our present issue the meetings of the Midland Christian Union and the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission. Next Wednesday comes the annual meeting of the Mansford-street Church and Mission, to be held at Essex Church, and in the following week that of the Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel. The meetings of the Liverpool and Manchester District Associations are also close at hand, and on March 28 the Council Meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association is due:

THE exhibition of the Martineaus' Aviemore pictures and other water-colours, at the Modern Gallery, 61, New Bond-street, has been so successful, and has given so much pleasure to many friends, that it has been decided to keep it open for another week, and it will not, therefore, close until Saturday, March 24.

At the annual meeting of the Aborigines Protection Society, to be held at Caxton Hall, Westminster, on Wednesday next, at 3.30 p.m., Sir Charles Dilke has promised to move, and Mr. P. A. Molteno, M.P., to second, a resolution upholding native rights in British South Africa. In support of another resolution the Rev. J. H. Harris will protest against the continued tolerance of monstrous abuses in the Congo, and Mr. H. W. Nevinson, who has lately returned from Central Africa, will call attention to the increasing slave trade carried on in Portuguese territory. Mr. G.

P. Gooch, M.P., and other members of Parliament are expected to take part in the proceedings. Sir W. Brampton Gurdon, K.C.M.G., C.B., M.P., the president, is to take the chair.

WHEN the delegates of the National Free Church Council assembled last week in Birmingham their mood was naturally one of considerable jubilation. The new committee of the council includes the name of the Right Hon. Lloyd George; Nonconformity, that is to say, in its most militant form, exerts its influence in the inner circle of the Government itself. And this fact is no more than a reflection of the great political change we have witnessed in the year 1906. The Free Church Council no doubt rejoices in a Liberal majority, since members of Free churches are for the most part Liberals. But then they are all Nonconformists, and the number of Nonconformists who can write M.P. after their names is very largely increased. There is ample excuse for the slight exaggeration which speaks of the Nonconformist General Election. Under these circumstances we are not surprised to find political questions very much to the front. Of course sermons were preached and papers were presented on theological topics. Among these last was one by Dr. Forsyth. Those of us who have not forgotten the length of his address to the Congregational Union last autumn and of his articles in the Contemporary and the Hibbert can readily sympathise with the difficulty Dr. Forsyth expressed in having to say something in twenty minutes!

TWENTY minutes for theology! We rather imagine the delegates had not come together to study theology, and certainly the chief interest seemed to centre round public questions. Yet a third of an hour is not so little after all when the Rev. Sylvester Home was confined to three minutes, and managed to achieve a telling speechlet into the time. The programme in fact, was a very full one, and brevity had to be the soul of wit. Of course, the first of the public questions dealt with was that of education. The resolutions and the speeches were of a familiar type. The delegates did not choose to face the question whether any constitutional principle demands the payment out of the rates for Bible teaching and not for Prayer-book teaching. They were met in Birmingham, and they recalled great memories of Dr. Dale, but they care not for Dr. Dale's fidelity to the fundamental principles of Nonconformity. The president of the Council, the Rev. Scott Lidgett, L.C.C., thus stated its present demand:—

"(1) That national education must henceforth be a civic and not an ecclesiastical task.

(2) That ample security must be given for the protection of conscience in the case of teacher and taught by the exclusion of sectarianism.

(3) That provision should be made for the training of character in a definitely Christian civilisation.

(4) That the demand of the people for the Bible in the schools should on these conditions be respected.

(5) That respect should be shown to the spiritual mission of the churches, although they are restrained from trespassing upon ground that does not belong to them." Dr. Clifford and Dr. Myers denounced the church compromise, the "right of entry."

THE greater part of one session of the Council was devoted to the subject of unemployment. This was introduced by Dr. A. E. Garvie, who treated the question "What the Churches can do," and roused the assembly to a high pitch of enthusiasm by his proposal to solve the unemployed difficulty by a tax on millionaires. The feature of the afternoon, however, was a speech by Will Crooks, member for Woolwich. The speaker had himself had to tramp for work. He brought home to his audience the terrible human significance of the mere official figures and averages of unemployment. So much so that the president pledged the two hundred Nonconformist M.P.'s to stand shoulder to shoulder with the Labour member. That was definite, though, of course, such a pledge cannot be held to binding, but it indicates the temper of the meeting.

OTHER subjects dealt with included temperance legislation, on which a strong resolution was passed:—

"All licences should be granted for a definite and short term, and be liable to be discontinued without monetary compensation.

"A new local licensing authority should be created representing the people, which shall control the issue of licences in suitable areas.

"All licensed houses should be closed the whole of Sundays and election days except to bona-fide travellers and lodgers in such houses, and the regulation of the hours of closing should be left to the local authorities, subject to the limitation that the closing hour be in no case later than eleven o'clock.

"The annual licence duties should be greatly increased, and such duties should be more equitably imposed than at the present time."

We miss, however, any statement such as seems to be needed, as to the treatment of present licences. We imagine the policy would be to treat these in the same way as is proposed for new ones. But we cannot overlook the fact that holders of present licences have, under the recent Act, acquired a vested property which is legal, however inimical to public morality and welfare.

IN its closing session the Council turned to the momentous issues of peace and war. The resolution was marked by extreme moderation, but it expressed the "eager desire for such an agreement among the States of the world as shall secure a large disarmament among the nations of Christendom, and in strengthening bonds of peace throughout the world." Dr. Townsend, in the course of discussion, put in a very necessary reminder. There has been within the present generation a rapid increase in the use of arbitration. Side by side with this has gone the crushing and iniquitous increase of armaments. It seems time for still more determined effort on the part of the friends of peace, and we commend to the National Council and to our readers the "splendid risk" which Mr. Leonard Courtney is prepared to run.

THE range of discussion was a wide one. It is well worth our consideration as the expression of the sentiment of a great mass of English middle-class opinion, a body of belief which is at once a religious and a political force. The keynote of it all was sounded in the address and emphasised by the personality of the president. The commission of the church is for Mr. Scott Lidgett a world commission, and progress towards the ultimate efficiency of States lies through the ever fuller expression of Christian principle in legislation and administration. The emphasis on administration is valuable, and is natural from an Alderman of the L.C.C. The whole conception of a central faith animating every secular concern is also natural to the speaker. The Rev. Scott Lidgett is the head of the successful social settlement in Bermondsey. Drawn there by deep social sympathies, he has learnt how intimately connected are the economic and the spiritual. He is one of those who gives powerful utterance to the growing conviction that the test and the possibility of religion lie in the daily affairs of the masses of mankind.

THE terrible disaster which befel the Courrières coal mines, some twenty miles from Lille, on Saturday last, is overwhelming in its magnitude. Although it has not as yet been possible to number the victims, it appears to be certain that over a thousand lives have been lost. Among those who have taken part in the attempted work of rescue was a party of German miners, whose action has been very deeply appreciated. Both from this country and from Germany, from the Government and from the miners of the North, prompt expressions of sympathy were sent. The French Government immediately voted a large sum for the relief of the sufferers, while the President and many others have made personal contributions.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

EXPECTATION of the Government's Bill for the amendment of the Education Acts naturally finds expression in this month's reviews. The most valuable article is that by Lord Stanley of Alderley, in the Nineteenth Century and After, on "Education and the New Government." This is followed by an article on "Evangelicals and the Education Question" by Lady Wimborne, who rejoices that clerical control will be removed from the schools, because that is leading insidiously to Rome, and would like to see "undenominational" religious teaching enforced in all the schools as an antidote to sacerdotalism and as essential to sound national life. Lord Stanley concludes with the following summary of the points he regards as essential in the coming legislation.

(1) All ordinary day-schools aided by the rates must be under complete public management as "provided" schools.

(2) The whole of the teaching during school hours must be by the responsible teachers of the schools appointed by the local education authority.

(3) There shall be no interference by the State directing the giving of religious or Scripture teaching in the school.

(4) In every school district there shall be a supply of provided schools within the reach of all.

(5) Where the geographical conditions make it inexpedient to have more than one school in a neighbourhood, that school shall be a provided school, and no other school shall receive State aid.

(6) Schools held in trust for elementary education shall be transferred to the local authority if the existing managers fail to conduct them as efficient day-schools.

(7) Non-provided schools transferred to the local authority shall be kept in repair by the local authority, but the former managers shall retain the use of them on Sunday and at such other times as they are not needed for public education.

(8) On two occasions a week, either at the beginning or end of the school session, the schoolroom shall be at the disposal of persons desiring to give religious teaching to scholars desiring to receive it; but this attendance shall not be included in the official hours. The time shall be from 9 to 9.30 a.m., unless the applicants desire some other time; and any dispute as to time shall be settled by the Board of Education.

(9) In districts adequately supplied with "provided" schools, the Board of Education may, on the application of parents and of the managers of any non-provided school, allow that school to be withdrawn from the common school supply of the district and from any control or interference by the local authority, and may admit it to annual grants, as is done under section 15 of the Act of 1902.

(10) The aid grant provided by the Act of 1902 shall be distributed in a more graduated way, so as to give greater relief to those districts which are levying a higher education rate.

Of these sections (8) and (9) show how Lord Stanley would deal with the religious difficulty.

On this special subject Canon Barnett has an article in the Independent Review, and there are also some editorial notes showing how this difficulty is common to countries sharing our Western civilisation, and nowhere has been brought to a wholly satisfactory issue. The strict logic of the "secular" system is deprecated, and while it is strongly urged that the injustice of a single school area with only a denominational school must be remedied, for its existence "is not compatible with a fully organised national system of education." It is added: "When, however, the State has seen to it that there shall be within reach of every child a school under complete public control, and not connected with any particular denomination, it should be ready to give full consideration to any proposals made on behalf of the religious bodies, which are not inconsistent with this principle. When parents claim to have their children instructed, so far as practicable, in their own faith, it is difficult to see how their claim can be refused, except on grounds which would exclude religious teaching altogether from the schools. The claim may be met in two ways—by separate schools where there is a choice of schools, or by facilities in the common school where there is no such choice. Neither of the two methods is altogether free from difficulties. But it is worth making a considerable effort to avert the growth of a new sense of grievance and the probable creation of starved and inefficient denominational schools outside the State system."

In the Contemporary the article on the "Amendment of the Education Acts" is by Dr. Macnamara, M.P., who would have preferred, had it been possible, a return to the ad hoc system of electing an authority, and urges an increase in the London County Council to meet the need for thorough administration by a popularly elected body, and the subdivision of the county areas. As to religious teaching, he suggests universal "Cowper-Temple" schools, with "facilities." Some striking figures are given as to the position of the denominational training colleges, which must be brought into line with a truly national system.

Other articles in the Contemporary to be noted are "Health and Education," by T. C. Horsfall; "Revivalism and Mysticism," by W. F. Alexander; "The Unemployed," by G. P. Gooch, M.P.; and "Chinese Labour and Imperial Responsibility," by H. C. Thomson. In the Independent Mr. J. Ramsay Macdonald, M.P., writes on "The Labour Party and its Policy." In the Nineteenth Century and After, the Rev. Ethelred Taunton writes (from Rome) on "The Holy See and France," believing that "the Church is freer in the catacombs than in a concordat." Lady Paget has an interesting article on "Brixen and Health."

The World's Work and Play, with a fine portrait of the Speaker as frontispiece, opens with a very interesting illustrated article on "The House of Commons." Among the pictures is one of the members of the Independent Labour Party in the new House grouped on the Terrace.

PEOPLE say a church is a holy place. So it is, if holy people be in it; not else; the kingdom is within you, not in stones.—F. W. Robertson.

SIR OLIVER LODGE'S CRITICISM OF PROFESSOR HAECKEL.

IN Ernst Heinrich Haeckel (born 1834) nineteenth-century modes of thought appear to be making their last effort in claiming the acceptance of men. His antagonist, on the other hand, who is seventeen years younger, may be regarded as an early representative of the thinkers who are to voice the ideals of the twentieth century.

Already signs are not wanting in indication that the temper of our time is changing, that a new spirit is abroad, that a different attitude is being taken toward the universe, a stronger expectation made from life's revealing powers, a deeper sense of wonder stirring the hearts of our contemporaries. We seem to be hearing the rippling music of a new tide already beating in marvellous promise on the shores of truth. The old temper was agnostic, and therefore pessimistic; the new will tend to become more and more gnostic, and therefore optimistic. For the purposes of this review the change may be stated as follows:—Whereas the science of thirty years ago had a tendency, in the words of John Tyndall, to "see in matter the promise and potency of every form of life," the science of the present century, if we are to trust Sir W. Crookes, will seek to "see in life the promise and potency of every form of matter."

The title of Sir Oliver Lodge's recent book "Life and Matter" recalls this changed expression of the modern scientific attitude. Haeckel, however, still occupies the position of John Tyndall in his Belfast address. Things have moved rapidly enough since 1874 to justify a designation of the tenure of that position as "antiquated and rudimentary," which are the terms the Principal of the Birmingham University applies to the eminent biologist of Jena.

The Combatants.

Before plunging into the controversy, it is interesting to compare the two personalities. One has only to put their counterfeit presentments side by side in order to recognise the diversity of their character. Haeckel's face indicates a genial, affectionate nature. There is a bright and witty intelligence in the alert, bird-like eyes. There is a sharp vivaciousness in the features—token of a restless, nervous energy. Something of the rebel, too; a fire, a passion, which prepares us for a certain impatient haste and liability to leap into conclusions from inadequate data with which he has been so often charged. No dreamer here, no visionary, no far-off look as of one who sees into the very life of things. No depth in the eyes; an entire absence of calm. He reminds us of Emerson's designation of Napoleon, "he would shorten a straight line to come at his object." But, unlike Napoleon, he has ardour, which fills him with a missionary spirit for the cause he loves, and accounts for the verve of his attack upon ecclesiastical Christianity and the enthusiasm of his popularisation of science.

How unlike is the picture of his antagonist, with his massive head, bastioned with beetling brows and crowned with the "mount of reverence," under which are set calm unruffled depths of eyes with something of the mystic in their dispassionate gaze! The whole nature would appear to be dominated by the comprehensive intellect, and therefore is cautious, careful of every step it takes, and lending to the whole character a strength, a solidity, a sobriety, a dignity, a majesty not possessed by the lesser man.

In a contest between such men the issue is at once foreseen. Eloquence and interest will be on the side of the enthusiast; good sense and cogency on the side of the philosopher.

Haeckel no Philosopher.

Haeckel does not look like a philosopher. And after Sir Oliver has coped with him, the "unanswerable work," as Mr. McCabe calls the "Riddle of the Universe," comes out rather shrunken and dismayed. But Haeckel is an indefatigable worker in collecting the facts garnered into the treasures of science, and in this domain his eminence is assured. It is the speculative and destructive portions of Haeckel's work that his antagonist is forced to regard as misleading and inaccurate.

Like Herbert Spencer, Haeckel has attempted to synthesise the whole body of knowledge into one system, to unify it by the application of an all-comprehensive principle. But it is not the "whole" body of knowledge known as much as that portion approved by himself, that he has thought it worth while to reduce into a single system. Though he has "surveyed the whole range of existence, from the foundations of physics to the comparison of religion, from the facts of anatomy to the freedom of the will, from the vitality of cells to the attributes of God," he completely ignores or unwarrantably denies the facts that will not fit into his system.

His Philosophic System.

Wherein does Haeckel's system differ from that of the philosophers? They also seek to unify. They seek to set forth the ultimate law that governs the mass of observed phenomena, the underlying principle which furnishes the thread upon which the beads of experience are strung. But Haeckel speaks of having presented "my Monistic and Genetic Philosophy thirty-three years ago," as though he had originated some system unknown to the world before. Sir Oliver shows how all philosophy aims at being monistic, and so far from Haeckel's system of Materialistic-Monism being a recent invention, it is older than Plato, as old as Parmenides.

Haeckel's critic classifies the various monistic or unifying systems as follows:—

(1) Theories that refer back all known phenomena into manifestations of some unknown absolute reality. Exx.: Herbert Spencer, Spinoza.

(2) Theories that attribute all phenomena to the operation of a mind; that regard things material as having a psychical origin. Exx.: Berkeley and William James.

(3) Theories that regard the fundamental reality as "matter" or "energy," of which mind is the outcome. This is Materialistic-Monism.

This last system, though the least in favour with philosophers, is pushed in the most aggressive and militant fashion, and in the "premature and cheap" form advanced by Haeckel, is, in the opinion of Lodge, worse than none at all.

To those who supposed Haeckel to be advancing his theory in the name of science, it is salutary to know that another eminent scientist regards it as "gratuitous, hypothetical, in some places erroneous, and altogether unconvincing," while the dogmatic assertiveness and extravagant pretensions with which the scheme is put forward are characterised as unscientific and unphilosophic.

To many of these assertions Sir Oliver gives an emphatic denial.

The Law of Substance.

Haeckel has combined the chemical generalisation called the doctrine of the conservation of matter with the physical generalisation called the doctrine of the conservation of energy, into a single statement called by him the "law of substance." And as to him, matter and energy are the two exclusive forms of the fundamental reality, which explain all that there is in the universe, including art and religion and love, this law of substance he regards as the supreme and universal law. He would himself regard it as axiomatic and self-evident in the sense that its opposite is unthinkable.

His critic is at pains to show that Haeckel's assumption is simply untrue. Recent research into the constitution of matter makes it impossible to cherish the assurance that matter is constant and permanent. "There is now no single material property that can be specified as really and genuinely constant." (p. 31.)

"The destruction and the creation of matter are well within the range of scientific conception, and may be within the realm of experimental possibility" (p. 33), though it may still be supposed that the basis of matter is fundamentally conserved.

Sir Oliver further shows how there may be other categories of energy than are yet tabulated; how new forms may be discovered; and that if new forms exist, until they are discovered, the law of conservation of energy as now stated may in some cases be strictly untrue.

To declare that certain theorems based upon this law (a law that with new knowledge may have to be modified) has been "amply demonstrated"—such as that the universe is eternal, its substance is in eternal motion running on through infinite time in an unbroken development—is to declare guess-work to be equivalent to proof, and is therefore an unwarrantable exaggeration.

Is Life a Form of Energy?

But the most serious mistake Lodge discovers is the assumption that life is a form of energy, which exists as life only as long as its material vehicle persists, but is, on its dissolution, resolved into heat or chemical action. To Haeckel, mind is a motion of matter; life is an operation of cells; the phenomena of consciousness are a physiological problem, and, as such, must be reduced to the phenomena of physics and chemistry.

And in order to account for the appearance of life and mind and consciousness, he supposes that matter possesses these attributes from the start, that love is a form of chemical affinity, and freedom of the will must be looked for in the same quarter of repulsions and attractions.

Lodge's reply is: "This is not science, and the formulation of that idea gives no sort of conception of what life and will and consciousness really are." (p. 49.)

Others beside Haeckel have for a time adopted the materialistic theory of life, but with the acquisition of wider knowledge have passed into saner views. But the only explanation suggested by Haeckel for outgrowing his limitations is the implied insinuation that as they grew older they suffered from dotage. So he disposes of the wider outlook gained by the maturity of their faculties and the enlargement of their experience displayed by men like Kant, Wundt, Virchow, du Bois-Reymond, Baer, and others.

Grave suspicion must surely attach to a scheme of thought which, while emphasizing the doctrine of evolution, treats the evolution of the human mind into extended powers, and deeper insight as retrogression into illusion. Belief in Haeckelism demands that we shall regard the noblest and wisest of the race—philosophers, poets, religious leaders—as simply deluded and deluding. And Haeckel has the colossal self-conceit implied in making that terrible assumption. No wonder that his critic occasionally declined to say what he thinks, lest he should violate his intention of criticising politely!

That the most ardent scientific pursuit does not necessarily terminate in a materialistic atheism, Sir Oliver Lodge illustrates by the names of Newton and Huxley, the former of whom remained a Theist, while the latter, protesting against the grave philosophical errors involved in materialism, preserved an attitude of reverend agnosticism that furnishes a curious contrast to the gratuitous assumptions and the confident negative dogmatism of the Jena Professor. The names of Kepler, Herschel, Liebig, and Linnæus, of former days, and Crookes, Wallace, and Lord Kelvin of our own, could be added to this list.

Distrust Negations.

It must not be supposed from the above paragraphs that the aim of the book is wholly controversial and contentious. On the contrary, it is claimed also to be a supplement—an "extension of the more scientific portions of that work into higher and more fruitful regions of inquiry." (Preface).

When a Unitarian minister once turned Catholic, his perplexed disciples whom he had piloted from orthodoxy to a liberal faith came to him and asked if his conversion did not mean that all his teaching was now discredited. He wisely replied, "No, forget all my negations; retain all my affirmations." Sir Oliver Lodge gives a somewhat similar counsel to the readers of the "Riddle of the Universe." "In so far as it makes positive assertions, embodying the results of scientific discovery, and even of scientific speculation based thereupon, there is no fault to find with it; but when, on the strength of that, it sets up to be a philosophy of the universe—all inclusive, therefore, and shutting out a number of truths otherwise perceived, or which appeal to other faculties, or which are equally true and are not really contradictory of legitimately materialistic statements—then it is that its insufficiency and narrowness have to be displayed." (p. 60.)

Haeckel is, in the opinion of his critic, too sure of what is not known, and cannot be known. "To be able to perceive comprehensively and state fully not only what is, but also what is not, is a wonderful achievement." The hint ought to suffice. However, the Principal adds slyly, "I do not think that such a power has yet been acquired by any of the sons of men" (and more seriously), "nor will the semi-educated readers of this country be wise if they pin their faith and build their hopes on the utterances of any man, however eminent, who makes this superhuman claim." (p. 77.)

The Religion of Haeckel.

Haeckel, though he denies the existence of God except as the sum total of force operating in the material universe, without design or purpose, and laughs at the doctrine of immortality, is still able to extract some kind of religion from his materialistic monism. It is refreshing to find him defending, though it is in antagonism to Christianity, the humaneness of Buddhism, the love of animals it inculcates, and sympathy with friendly mammals. I conclude from that he does not believe in vivisection, nor eats flesh which involves the violation by slaughter of the Buddhist sense of the sacredness of life.

It is as refreshing for the Christian minister to mark his antagonist's defence of the teachings of Christ and correction of the mistakes of the German.

Haeckel supplants the "three great hallucinations" of Kant, viz., God, freedom and immortality, by what Tolstoy calls the Baumgartenian Trinity, "the good, the beautiful, the true," before which he professes to bow the knee in adoration. The adoration, however, avails little, as Lodge suggests, unless one's ideas of truth should be large enough to take into account possibilities far beyond anything of which he is at present sure; unless the meaning of goodness transcends the process of reduction into atomic forces and motions; and unless the sense of beauty has a fuller explanation than may be compassed in terms of sexual selection and the like. Such a limited view of religion may suit the author of the "Confession of Faith of a Man of Science," but is not enough for the race. (p. 94).

A Better Way.

Sir Oliver Lodge is not satisfied with merely pointing out the narrowness of Haeckel's views. He points a better way; at least, he suggests it. For with his native cautiousness and reserve, and the natural humility of a great scientist, Sir Oliver is not likely to burden his readers with his over-beliefs.

To readers of the Hibbert Journal, in which many of the papers collected into the present volume have appeared, the constructive speculations of the author of "Life and Matter" will be familiar. He holds that life has an origin independent of the forms of energy described in physics and chemistry; that it furnishes guidance and direction of the physical processes connected with the maintenance of our bodily existence; it pre-exists and survives the material organism in which it incarnates and through which it functions on the terrestrial plane for a time.

There is no striking novelty in this opinion—it does not go as far as Plato—its interest lies in the testimony it carries, how much of religious philosophy can be accepted by a man whose chief business is dealing with material phenomena while remaining in full accord with positive scientific material teaching. So much service, at least, has been rendered to modern thought by a generation of psychic research, aided by her latest offspring, the new psychology. So much belief has become necessary, if only as a working hypothesis, in order to account for the data known.

The Triumph of Idealism.

No small comfort accrues to the dreamer of dreams from the present attitude of men like Oliver Lodge. "Our highest thoughts are likely to be nearest to reality," he says. "Whatever we can clearly and consistently conceive, that is ipso facto in a sense already existent in the universe as a whole; and that, or something better, we shall find to be a dim foreshadowing of a higher reality."

"I believe in the ultimate intelligibility of the universe." "Why should it be inconceivable that human beings should receive information from beings in the universe higher than themselves?"

What vistas of thought are opened up to the imagination by these sentences! Yet they issue from the cold-blooded mood of a man noted for his soundness and saneness. After all, is not the highest science allied to poetry, and truth the handmaid of religion?

But if this attitude is typical of the scientists of the twentieth century, then is Haeckel's position accurately foretold in the closing paragraph of the chapter on Science and Philosophy:—

"The progress of thought has left him, as well as his great English exemplar, Herbert Spencer, somewhat high and dry, belated and stranded by the tide of opinion which has now begun to flow in another direction. He is, as it were, a surviving voice from the middle of the nineteenth century; he represents, in clear and eloquent fashion, opinions which then were prevalent among many leaders of thought—opinions which they themselves in many cases, and their successors still more, lived to outgrow; so that by this time Professor Haeckel's voice is as a voice of one crying in the wilderness, not as the pioneer or vanguard of an advancing army, but as the despairing shout of a standard-bearer, still bold and unflinching, but abandoned by the retreating ranks of his comrades as they march to new orders in a fresh and more idealistic direction."

We get no good
By being ungenerous, even to a book,
And calculating profits . . . so much help
By so much reading. It is rather when
We gloriously forget ourselves, and plunge
Soul-forward, headlong, into a book's profound,
Impassioned for its beauty and salt of truth—

'Tis then we get the right good from a book.

JESUS AND THE PROPHETS.*

To the making of the mind of Christ the goodly fellowship of the prophets contributed most powerfully, and their influence is seen in the whole form and content of his teaching. The question, therefore, as to the precise significance which he attached to their writings is of supreme importance for a real understanding of him. Did he regard prophecy as a detailed prediction that had either been or was to be literally fulfilled? Or did he regard it simply as preaching, the impassioned utterance of ethical and religious truths and principles that were applicable not to an age only but to all time? Or, again, does he seem to have considered it as sometimes the one and sometimes the other of these things? Such is the question which confronts the student of the Gospels, and which Dr. Macfarland's book is designed to answer.

The subject takes our author far and deep into the criticism of the Gospels. To the evangelists, prophecy is almost synonymous with prediction. They wrote for a public that had learnt to love and reverence the name of Jesus, and was, moreover, asking eagerly for signs or proofs of his Messiahship; and their purpose in writing was partly to satisfy the general demand, and to show that in all respects his life and death conformed literally to the predictions of Scripture, and that he was therefore the promised Messiah. This dogmatic purpose (especially apparent in Matthew) helped greatly to give shape and substance to the Gospel records. Dr. Macfarland fully appreciates its influence, and, wherever necessary, he is careful to point out misrepresentations and interpolations that may be due to it. The chapter in which he deals one by one with the various quotations which Jesus makes from the prophets (and from the psalmists who, in this connection, have to be included with them) is of exceptional interest and value. On each of these quotations he has written a brief disquisition setting forth the original meaning of the words and explaining the application which Jesus makes of them. In this way he gives his readers some excellent Old and New Testament exegesis. His finding, in all cases of authentic quotation, is that Jesus' concern is not to verify prediction, but, on the contrary, that he uses prophecy much as we might use proverbs or the words of well-known authors. So "familiar as household words" was the language of prophet and psalmist to him, that sayings of theirs came spontaneously to his lips as the fit expression of his own thoughts and feelings. Thus, what more natural than that, in face of opposition or neglect, the consciousness of his destiny should find utterance in the words—"The stone which the builders rejected, the same was made the head of the corner." Here was a saying whose truth was to be exemplified in his own case, as it had already been in the case of many another. Again, when with the words, "Well did Isaiah prophesy of you," he hurls at the Scribes and Pharisees the text about people who draw near to God with their mouth and honour Him with their lips but whose heart is far from Him, it is evident that his meaning is, as Dr. Macfarland says, "Well did Isaiah describe you. . . . You think he speaks to those back there in his time. But you do not understand prophecy. It is principle, universal truth, and it applies to you." Jesus frequently uses sayings or phrases from the prophets merely to point a moral or adorn a parable; but where, as in the examples just given, there is any suggestion of fulfilment, it is, as a rule, clearly of the kind which means the exemplification, analogy, or development of some truth or principle.

The name Messiah summed up for Jesus all the spiritual aspirations of his race. It was as personally embodying or fulfilling these aspirations that he felt himself called to assume the title. How much his conception of its content differed from that of the Scribes is apparent from the passage which records his controversy concerning the David descent of Messiah and which concludes with the question that proved so unanswerable to his opponents—"If David called him Lord, how is he his son?"

"This discourse," says Dr. Macfarland, "is not merely a sophistical endeavour to entangle the Scribes by citing Scriptural contradictions. The Scribes cannot answer his question because of their narrow, literal, and formal conception of Messiah, which they have compressed into the phrase, 'son of David.' Jesus himself can answer the question from his point of view. Spiritually, he is David's lord, by reason of his relation to the Father. He really waives the question of natural descent. His purpose is to point out the difference between a conception of Messiah as merely of the 'seed of David,' i.e., 'according to the flesh,' and that larger conception of Messiah as 'Lord,' i.e., 'according to the spirit.' (Romans i., 3, 4.) Here is a truth entirely independent of that criticism and exegesis of the Psalm which concerned the Rabbis, and which, unfortunately, has concerned many Christian writers of later times."

Once or twice Jesus seems to come perilously near to crediting the prophets with a certain power of detailed prediction; and the question as to whether he ever actually did so is, for the most part, bound up with another question, upon which scholars are still very much divided, that, namely, as to how much or how little of the apocalyptic language ascribed to him, and based largely on the book of Daniel, is really his. Perhaps, however, Dr. Macfarland is justified in reading the doubtful cases in the light of what appears to have been the Master's general usage, and in rejecting as none of his any reference or quotation which is inconsistent with the larger and more natural interpretation of prophecy. Certainly our author argues throughout with much force and lucidity, and his book merits the attention of all who seek to know how the prophet of Nazareth fulfilled the prophets who were before him.

HOLYOAKE'S HISTORY OF CO-OPERATION.*

It is too late in the day to be recommending Mr. Holyoake's History of Co-operation to students of social movements. They know the book. It is a storehouse of facts, it is thickly set with the author's trenchant observations on men and things, and it brings us face to face with those who toiled to give the idea of mutual aid credence and regal power is a competitive and disorganised industrial world. Mr. Holyoake knew these men in the intimacy of a common enterprise. The men whose names are become a part of history, and who, but for such a memorial as this, had been even now long forgotten, are here recorded. And, beyond this, again we meet with generous eulogy of the "forgotten workers" for the cause. The volumes, then, possess all the merits of reminiscences. The history is history written from within. Whether Mr. Holyoake's work can be regarded as a definitive history of the movement is another question. Perhaps he was too near to it, too closely wrapped up in it, for his judgments upon it always to set things in right perspective. But what is not doubtful is that no future historian can dispense with these volumes; and in all probability no future book can contain the vivid characterisation of the personalities of the crusade which lends its peculiar value and charm to the present work.

The "revised and completed" edition which lies now before us is largely identical with the volumes originally published in 1875 and 1879. By way of example, take the record of Robert Owen and his influence on co-operation. The story is touched with the affectionate regard in which the author always thought of the creator of New Lanark and "The New Moral World." But the account in these volumes is enlarged by the publication of the panegyric pronounced by Holyoake at the unveiling of the monument to Owen at Newtown in 1902. "It is said by parrot-minded critics that Owen was a man of one idea; whereas he was a man of more ideas than any public man England knew in his day. He shared and befriended every new conception of moment and promise, in science, in education, and government. His mind was hospitable to all projects of progress; and he himself contributed more original ideas for the conduct of public affairs than any other thinker of his generation."

The new volumes are enriched with illustrations, with portraits, e.g., of the author and of Owen. Then also we can look on the picture of the original Rochdale store, and allow our imagination to wander across the large outcrop of new thought and fresh undertakings which come from such an undistinguished birthplace. To mention but one other, the Anti-Corn Law Mill at Hull is full of memories of a struggle which had been regarded as finally decided, until one of the most masterful of contemporary politicians succeeded in again forcing it on a surprised country.

Of the three parts into which the work is divided, the first two, comprising some six hundred pages, are for the most part the original volumes. The third section,

* "The History of Co-operation." By George Jacob Holyoake. 2 vols. (T. Fisher Unwin. 21s.)

* "Jesus and the Prophets": an Historical, Exegetical and Interpretative Discussion of the Use of Old Testament Prophecy of Jesus and of His Attitude towards it. By Charles S. Macfarland, Ph.D. (Yale), Minister of the Maplewood Congregational Church of Malden, Massachusetts. With an Introduction by Frank K. Sanders, Ph.D., D.D., Dean of the Divinity School of Yale University. (G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York and London, The Knickerbocker Press, 1905. 6s. net.)

containing eleven short chapters, is devoted to bringing the history up to date (1904). Quite obviously the record of thirty years in sixty pages must be scrappy and inadequate, and, indeed, this third part is rather in the nature of an eclectic appendix. Here and there the reader is pleased or irritated, according to his individual predilections, by terse and uncompromising comments and criticisms, and, though there is no attempt at completeness, there is much useful information as to the modern aims and achievements of co-operators. One instance must suffice, an instance which incidentally disposes of the popular and shallow notion that productive industry can only be carried out under the stimulus of private profit acting on the soul of some wealthy entrepreneur. We refer to the pages devoted to the Wholesale Societies. The English Wholesale is certainly one of the great distributive businesses of the country. It has also its own fleet of steamships trading throughout the world, it has its tea estates in Ceylon, its dairy and fruit and livestock farms at home; and, to say nothing of its corn mills, &c., it makes annually 2,000,000 pairs of boots in the factories at Leicester, Heckmondwike, Enderby, and Rushden. Co-operation is equal to the difficulties of production on the largest scale. Yet these various works are dependent on the skill of men of the people, and give evidence, among other things, of the very wide distribution of business ability among all classes of the community.

One interesting reflection in reviewing a later edition of a standard work is this, that the world moves on. In the seventies the title, "History of Co-operation," explained itself. Naturally, it would deal with British co-operation. In the early years of the twentieth century, this is no longer the case. True, the United Kingdom has shown the way. But this country no longer possesses a virtual monopoly of this instrument of industrial progress. We have but to turn our eyes to the Continent. Whether we regard the Latin nations as in France and Italy, the Teutonic in Germany, or the Scandinavian as in Denmark, we see the people, the proletariat in the towns, the peasantry in the country districts, resorting in large and increasing numbers to the practice of co-operation for the sale or the manufacture of the prime necessities of life. In the great days of Liberalism, English co-operation was mainly based on the individualistic theory of society. There are signs that this is not at present so generally the case, and the co-operative movement, as Mr. Holyoake recognised with the frankest dislike, tends somewhat towards collectivism. In so doing, it does but come into line with the movement in Europe, where co-operation is predominantly an association of workers who are socialists, and who use this form of association to forward their collectivist consciousness and purposes. A new History of Co-operation at the present time would have to appraise the significance of this new trend of thought.

SOCIAL PROBLEMS AND MODERN PROPHECY.

IN his last lecture at Manchester, delivered last week, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant proceeded to apply the lessons arising from the study of the old prophets to the social problems of our own times. History, he said, repeated itself, but with variations. We see great changes, but the old problems abide. Empire on empire had passed away; half way between the time of David and the present day St. Augustine was writing his work on the City of God and pointing the way of escape from the evils of his time. We are still seeking the City of God, and the family of nations which emerged out of the chaos resulting from the barbarian invasion of Rome and Greece is still looking for ways of escape from the old evils, which, in spite of other changes, still remain. We have now huge populations which dwarf anything known in the Mesopotamian and Nile Valleys, but we have also new forces at our command, so that the old scourge of famine is no longer known in England, and only abides in India until we address ourselves earnestly to our true Imperial problems. We have a settled system of law which secures rights to all, and we have learnt the value of obedience. Now how are we going to administer this vast estate in empire, material resource and settled law? Much has been done to grapple with inherent dangers in the rise of industrialism. Beneficent factory and sanitary legislation had been enforced. Still, in spite of all, we find ourselves in a position full of menace to the national well being. The facts and figures resulting from the investigations of Messrs. Booth & Rowntree must make us stand appalled. While the artisan earning £3 a week, pays 9 per cent. away in rent, the very poor have to pay 29—nearly one-third of their total income. Between 300,000 and 400,000 persons in London are living in one-room tenements. One-fifth of the "Homes of England" are one-room tenements. In parts of London people are crowded together at the rate of 240 to the acre, whereas Sir W. B. Richardson laid down 25 as the healthy limit. The same state of things was growing up in towns outside London. Beside all this, from 23 to 29 per cent. of the working classes have an insufficient supply of food, according to Mr. Rowntree, and using the pauper standard as a basis of comparison. The effect of all this on life and health could be imagined. In Finsbury the death rate in one-room tenements was 38.9, in two-room tenements 22.6, in three-room tenements 11.7, while in houses of four rooms and upwards the death rate fell to 5.6. This was how poverty and bad housing conditions were destroying the life of the people. What then, in face of these facts, Mr. Tarrant asked, is to be done? Many voices address us. As in old times there are true and false prophets, the false prophets being not so much men of low ideals as men of limited faith and insight, opportunists who would catch at easy palliatives and patch up as far as possible existing conditions. But the true prophets see deeper and, as in the case of the old Hebrew prophets, they are often deeply pessimistic as to the possibility or utility of reforming present society.

Still they believe in the ultimate emergence of a higher social life, as the prophets looked for a remnant which should survive the day of wrath that they could see coming. But the worst danger was that which arose from the false application of scientific theories by men, themselves in comfortable circumstances, about the struggle for existence, the survival of the fittest, and the uses of poverty in spurring men on. Others were pessimistic as a result of their study of old literatures, saturated as they were with the failure of men to realise the Utopias of their dreamers. This led them to abjure idealism, not to be righteous over-much, to be critical and sceptical of the inner light. But these questions would not wait such cautious treatment. In "Locksley Hall, Sixty years After," Tennyson had drawn an indictment of modern Society more appalling than anything in the Prophets. But he preserved his faith in the light, in the power of man to master circumstances, and the true poet was the true prophet, the one who justified the hope of a remnant after the day of the Lord.

In answering the questions "what are the primary causes of social evils; how far are they the result of false conditions, or of false national character?" Mr. Tarrant rapidly reviewed the current theories known as Nihilist, Anarchist, Socialist, Communist, as well as those based more exclusively on land nationalisation. But the personal factor was the thing of highest importance—the contribution of thought and character made by great modern teachers which showed that the race of Prophets of Righteousness was not ended. Among these modern prophets, differing among themselves as they often did, but having in common the passion of nobler social ideals, he included Fourier, Carlyle, Mazzini, Ruskin, Tolstoy and others. From all these teachers there came the truth that no one act of government could change present conditions. There must be a new spirit and a large fusion of interest in a higher life. Capital, labour and character were the three factors needed for our times. All the suggested remedies run up into moral considerations. At the bottom of our failure is the want of character, the absence of loyalty to ideals, the want of fidelity. In order to make the most of time men must reckon with eternity. And here we were back at the thought of the old prophets. These prophets did make a great discovery. Nowhere else does it glow with such light as in their pages. Their imperishable legacy speaks to us of the necessity to live in awe and reverence before the Holy One in whom we live and move and have our being, the Holy One not of Israel alone but of all the world. And they gave us also the thought that we can trust this Holy One if we look to the right and do the right, for then we shall be going along the path of safety for ourselves, our people, and the world.

In spite of the exceedingly inclement weather, there was a large audience at the lecture, and a hearty vote of thanks was passed with acclamation on the proposal of the chairman, the Rev. Dendy Agate, seconded by Mr. Richard Robinson and supported in a suggestive speech by Mr. J. Wigley. The scholars of our household, Mr. Wigley said, in explaining away the old supernatural claims for the Bible, were striking off the shackles which made it at once the most revered, but least consulted of books, and were bringing it into the service of man anew as the most living of all the ancient legacies of man's long struggle to deal with the social problems of the ages. That, said Mr. Tarrant in reply, exactly summarised the aim of his lectures.

POSTAL MISSION WORK IN INDIA.

THE British and Foreign Unitarian Association Postal Mission work at Calcutta is carried on under the superintendence of Mr. Hem Chandra Sarkar. During the last six months of 1905, 175 applications for books were received, several of these being from Brahmo Samajes and public libraries; a large number of pamphlets have also been circulated. Mr. Sarkar has delivered lectures at various centres. Three book-prizes were offered and awarded to writers in India, of the best essays dealing with the problems of religious thought in Mr. Armstrong's book "God and the Soul."

At Allahabad the Postal Mission work is superintended by Professor R. Chatterjee. During the year 1905, 1,020 applications for books and tracts were received and responded to. Letters from the applicants conveyed their thanks, and expressed their appreciation of the value and helpfulness of the literature supplied from Essex Hall. In the course of the year, two additional tracts have been translated and published in Urdu—"A Message to Musalmans," by Rev. James Harwood, and "Materialism and Atheism Refuted," by Dr. J. Freeman Clarke—nearly one thousand copies of these Urdu tracts have been distributed among educated and liberal-minded Mohammedans.

Mr. V. R. Shinde reports that the work in connection with Postal Mission at Bombay had increased so considerably during the year 1905, that it has been found necessary to appoint an assistant who can carry on the work during his absence on long missionary tours in the country. At present there are 329 names of correspondents and inquirers on the register. In 1905 1,739 Brahmo and Unitarian books and pamphlets have been distributed, of these 945 were sold at a nominal price, and 794 were given free of charge.

The Postal Mission work in the Madras Presidency is under the care of Mr. V. Govinden. There, also, much interesting and valuable work has been done in disseminating a knowledge of the principles and faith held by Unitarians among thoughtful and inquiring people in that part of India.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Letters, &c., received from G. V. C., J. C., J. M. C., J. E., L. A. E., C. A. G., S. J. G., R. T. H., W. H., F. B. M., C. P., P. P., J. R., O. M. R., R. R., G. J. S., T. P. S., E. L. H. T., C. B. U., C. W.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

I HAVE just been reading a beautiful book, "The Soul of a People." It is an account of the people of Burmah, by one who lived many years among them, and was much impressed by their universal and unfailing kindness to animals. Here is an instance that he gives.

"A mail coach was started to run once a day between a town and the nearest railway station. There was a great deal of traffic between the town and the station, and it was supposed that the passenger traffic would pay the contractor well, apart from his mail subsidy; for Burmans are always free with their money, and the road was long, and hot, and dusty. I often passed that coach as I rode. I noticed that the ponies were poor, very poor, and were driven a little hard, but I saw no reason for interference. It did not seem to me that any cruelty was committed, nor that the ponies were actually unfit to be driven. I noticed that the driver used his whip a good deal, but then some ponies require the whip. I never thought much about it, as I always rode my own ponies, and they always shied at the coach; but I should have noticed if there had been anything remarkable.

"The driver was not a Burman. At the end of the year he wanted more money from the Post Office for carrying the mails, for he was not making as much as he expected, because the Burmans would not use his coach. He did not know the reason.

"So an inquiry was made, and the Burmans were asked why they did not ride on the coach. Were the fares too high? Was it uncomfortable? But no, it was for neither of these reasons that they left the coach to the soldiers and natives of India. It was because of the ponies. No Burman would care to ride behind ponies who were treated as these ponies were—half fed, over-driven, whipped. It was a misery to see them; it was twice a misery to drive behind them. 'Poor beasts,' they said; 'you can see their ribs; and when they come to the end of a stage they are fit to fall down and die. They should be turned out to graze.'

"The opinion was universal. The Burmans preferred to spend twice or thrice the money and hire a bullock cart and go slowly, while the coach flashed past them in a whirl of dust, or they preferred to walk. Many and many times have I seen the road-side rest houses full of travellers halting for a few minutes' rest. They walked while the coach came by empty; and nearly all of them could have afforded the fare.

"It was a very striking instance of what pure kind-heartedness will do, for there would have been no religious command broken by going in the coach. It was the pure influence of compassion towards the beasts, and refusal to be a party to such hard-heartedness. And yet, as I have said, I do not think the law could have interfered with success. Surely a people who could act like this, have the very soul of religion in their hearts, although the act was not done in the name of religion.

"That this kindness and compassion for animals has very far-reaching results, no one can doubt. If you are kind to animals, you will be kind, too, to your fellow-men. It is really the same thing, the same feeling, in both cases. If to be superior in position to an animal justifies you in torturing it, so it would do with men. If you are in a better position than another man, richer, stronger, higher in rank, that would—that does often in our minds—justify ill-treatment and contempt. Our innate feeling towards all that we consider inferior to ourselves is scorn; the Burman's is compassion. You can see this spirit coming out in every action of their daily life, in their dealings with each other, in their thoughts, in their speech. 'You are so strong, have you no compassion for him who is weak, who is tempted, who has fallen?' How often I have heard this from a Burman's lips! How often I have seen him act up to it! It seems to them the necessary corollary of strength that the strong man should be sympathetic and kind. It seems to them an unconscious confession of weakness to be scornful, revengeful, inconsiderate. Courtesy, they say, is the mark of a great man, discourtesy of a little one. No one who feels his position secure will lose his temper, will persecute, will be disdainful. Their word for a fool and for a hasty-tempered man is the same. To them it is the same thing, the one infers the other—that an animal or a man should be lower and weaker than you is the strongest claim he can have on your humanity; and your courtesy and consideration to him is the clearest proof of your own superiority. Nothing is more beautiful than the Burman in his ways with his children and his beasts, with all who are lesser than himself."

This has turned out to be a "Children's Column" taken from a man's book. His name is H. Fielding Hall, and he had been a magistrate in Burma from the time of its conquest. C. D. B.

MRS. BARNETT has, with reason, written to the papers in a jubilant tone announcing the successful formation of the Hampstead Garden Suburb Trust, Ltd., with Mr. Alfred Lyttelton as president, and, as directors, Mr. Frank Debenham, Sir Robert Hunter, Mr. Herbert Marnham, Mr. Henry Vivian, M.P., and herself. £70,000 has already been promised for investment—£45,383 in debentures, £25,015 in shares—about half the sum needed for satisfactory development. It will be remembered that about a year ago Mrs. Barnett took up her work as honorary secretary for this scheme whereby an estate adjoining Hampstead Heath is now secured to lay out as a whole, preserving the natural beauty of the western view from the heath, and providing pleasant and healthy homes for all classes of residents, rich and poor, those who supply capital for the enterprise receiving interest limited to 4 or 5 per cent. The seventy acres allotted to cottages for the industrial classes are to be worked on a co-partnership basis. So many people have already applied for sites that Mrs. Barnett considers the success of the project reasonably assured. The new company's registered office is at 4, Raymond-buildings, Gray's Inn.

RELIGION IN MORALITY.

FOLLOWING this brief article is a paper by Dr. JOHN CAMPBELL, of Belfast, to which we invite the serious attention of our readers. There are two main subjects with which it deals, which are closely linked together in the writer's mind. One is the need for a stronger affirmation on our part that moral faithfulness must hold the first place in religious life, as essential to salvation both here and hereafter; the other is the difficult and delicate question of the significance for national life, and therefore for religion, of a declining birth-rate. On this specific subject Dr. CAMPBELL writes with the weight of a man eminent in his profession, and with the special authority of wide experience. To many of our readers he will be known as a member of All Souls' Church, Belfast, deeply interested in the welfare of the churches.

Dr. CAMPBELL, it will be seen, refers at the outset to two recent articles dealing with the question of a declining birth-rate. Readers who turn to the article in the Nineteenth Century will find that Mr. BARCLAY, the author of that article, by no means shares the very serious view taken by Dr. CAMPBELL. He contends that with abundance of food and protection in the struggle for existence the birth-rate of man, and the animals he protects, naturally decreases, and he points to the curious fact that the birth-rate in Ireland was never so high as immediately after the great famine, while a similar phenomenon has been observed after famines in India. The conclusion Mr. BARCLAY draws from the study of figures is stated in the following sentence, which is directly opposed to the view taken by the BISHOP OF LONDON in his charge last autumn, as published in The Times of Oct. 20, 1905. Mr. BARCLAY says:—

"These figures conclusively prove that our declining birth-rate gives no cause for alarm, but, on the contrary, for satisfaction, indicating as it does the growing well-being of the masses of our people; and if the BISHOP OF LONDON had acquainted himself with the subject, as the gravity of his denunciation demanded, it would have been manifest to him that there was no reason for his unspeakable dismay, or ground for his imputation on the women of England, which a mere layman does not care to repeat."

The two doctors, on the other hand, whose paper was summarised in the British Medical Journal, confirm Dr. CAMPBELL in his view, and it is, unfortunately, impossible to deny that the evils to which he refers, and to which he attributes such disastrous and far-reaching results, do exist. We may hope that other causes, not of that corrupting and degrading nature, are also at work to produce the broad results that are recognised; but, at the same time, we shall do wisely to look the evil straight in the face, and where it is found to prevail, let Dr. CAMPBELL's warning and appeal be pressed unflinchingly home.

Other of Dr. CAMPBELL's positions will doubtless be hotly contested; but let it be noted that when he sets the Catholic on a higher moral level than the Protestant, he is dealing with one specific subject. We do not understand him to affirm that Catholicism produces, on the whole, greater independence of character, truthfulness, and integrity, or courage and heroic self-sacrifice, than Protestantism. When he pleads for the enforcement of a more definite moral code, it is interesting to remember what is said on that subject in the current number of the Hibbert Journal, by the Moslem critic of Christianity as a whole.

With the latter part of Dr. CAMPBELL's paper our readers will probably find themselves in more general and unqualified agreement. We shall all be absolutely at one in affirming that moral faithfulness must hold the first place in our religion, according to that other great saying of the MASTER'S, that we must seek first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, as the only true way of life. And we shall agree that in all the churches the stress ought more and more to be laid upon personal faithfulness in the whole range of human duty. The suggestion that the Churches should throw themselves into this work of moral regeneration with "loud and long and united clamouring" will be differently judged according to the temperament of those concerned. Quiet work and the steadfast witness of a faithful life will make a stronger appeal to many. And, for our own part, we shrink from claiming this work or this doctrine of life as distinctive of our own denomination. We cannot think that the Protestant world is looking to us for any such leadership. We have simply to be faithful in our own place, and must insist that the claim is urgent on all Christian Churches alike.

RELIGION AND MORALITY.

By JOHN CAMPBELL, M.D., F.R.C.S.

IN The Nineteenth Century for January, Mr. J. W. Barclay has published an article on "The Declining Birth Rate." In The British Medical Journal of February 3, 1906, there appeared an abstract of a paper on the same subject communicated by Drs. A. Newsholme and T. C. H. Stevenson to the Royal Statistical Society. Both these articles deal with a matter of great national importance, of great scientific interest, and of great concern to the religious community. It is to the religious aspect of the matter that attention is hereby drawn. However he may be affected by the national or by the scientific view of the subject, the religious man must be far more impressed by its influence on the immortal souls of his fellow-citizens, because behind the words "Declining Birth Rate" there lies the vast domain of vice and of disease born of vice. The birth rate is declining, and the future of the nation is imperilled by its decline. Its decline is largely due to certain unholy practices which are sapping the moral nature of the men and still more of the women of the community. Its decline is associated with the spread of diseases, which are enfeebling the bodies of the present generation, and will enfeeble the bodies of children yet unborn "unto the third and fourth generation." Above all things, its decline is connected with the greatest danger to the happiness, in this world and in the world to come, of those who, for worldly reasons, are transgressing the Divine law.

Though these papers are written from a purely scientific standpoint, they afford very sad reading for the thoughtful Protestant. They show clearly that the evils with which they deal are most rife in Protestant countries. They demonstrate that Catholic countries like Austria and Ireland contrast most favourably with Protestant nations, and that the prosperous French Canadian, with his Catholicism, is a far more moral man than his equally prosperous Protestant neighbour. Is not this deplorable? What does it mean? Theoretically, Protestantism should produce better men and women than Catholicism, and yet the fact that it does not do so stares us in the face. Is Christianity, as taught in the Protestant churches, spoiled Christianity? Should it not yield better fruits—not only better fruits than it itself now bears, but better fruits than Catholicism is capable of producing?

Being the most Protestant body of Christians in the community, this question has special claims on our consideration. Our authors show that diminution of the orthodox religious restraints in Catholic countries is associated with the declining birth rate, and with all the social evils which attend the lowering of the moral standard of the people. If we are to improve, we Protestants must either make a retrograde step and move towards the Catholic religious position, or we must adopt a better form of Protestant teaching than we have hitherto done. Of this there can be no doubt. A striking feature in the history of the Christian religion is the dearth of great and prolonged efforts to organise the world on strictly Christian, in other words, on practical moral lines. Religious teachers have directed their attention to organisation on a theoretical doctrinal basis. They have made belief in certain theories the primary thing, and have relegated the doing of "the will of the Father" to a place of secondary importance. Probably in this is to be found the explanation of the moral state of Christendom depicted in the papers above referred to. Morality, social and commercial, has come to occupy a second place in the mind of the average man. His early training has put the doctrinal points so strongly before him, that he has largely lost sight of the moral lessons to which the doctrines were intended to lead up. Protestants, having lost the Catholic habit of blindly following the rules of the Church and the dictates of their spiritual advisers, have been left to rely on a lax social code of honour rather than on a strict ecclesiastical moral creed. Hence their floundering. The remedy is obviously to supply them with a definite code of morals based upon the teaching of Jesus Christ, and to impress upon them, from their earliest years, the necessity for strict obedience to that code, if they are to secure present happiness and "inherit eternal life." If the Athanasian creed were a moral creed such as Christ himself outlined for the young ruler, few of us would object even to its minatory clauses.

The duty of formulating such a Christian moral creed and of pressing it upon the notice of humanity, belongs pre-eminently to our denomination. Our body had its origin in protests against a too great accentuation of mere doctrinal teaching. It must have not only a destructive policy but must also aim at construction. Objection to a doctrinal creed does not entail objection to a moral creed. The removal of the doctrinal creed necessitates the bringing forward of something to take its place. Those who speak of our position as a "negative" one see only one half, and that the least important half, of our mission. Ours is the positive duty of establishing the moral creed. It may be said that rejection of the ordinary creeds and confessions of faith obviously implies acceptance of a moral code. No doubt it may mean this to our own thoughtful people, but to the person of average intelligence, educated on the conventional lines, our raison d'être is by no means plain. For his instruction we require a simple statement of our belief that the following of the moral precepts laid down for our guidance by Christ Jesus is the only way of entering the Kingdom of Heaven and enjoying everlasting life. For his benefit we must urge, with clamour and with reiteration, that to actually live our earthly lives in deed and word and thought in accordance with Christ's teaching and example is the only way to attain salvation. This is at the present time our mission. This idea should run through every sermon preached in our pulpits and through every denominational newspaper published by us. With it as a dominant influence our position becomes no longer negative, but powerfully positive. We are not mere moralists following a cold system of conduct after the manner of the philosophers of old, but we are true Christians, warmed by the love of Jesus for mankind, sanctified by his teaching, elevated by his example, and bound by our affection for, and our loyalty to, him to follow him to that Kingdom to which he himself has gone. We must proclaim to the world that whosoever will be saved, before all things it is necessary that he do those things which Christ has commanded. Which, except everyone do perform, keeping his life pure and undefiled, without doubt he shall be punished according to the measure of his transgressions against the laws of God. We must establish and extend a "Holy Catholic Church" in which a common standard of righteousness of life and of obedience to the commandments which Christ himself has laid down is the uniting bond.

To do this effectually, we must organise our forces. Individuals have their influence on the community. Isolated congregations perform important duties. The range of individual or congregational efforts is, however, comparatively small. To do our utmost we must all, throughout the length and breadth of the land, fall into line and stand shoulder to shoulder, determined to achieve a great common purpose, and to uphold the great precepts of our Master. United under some form of church government, we could the better disseminate a knowledge of the true way of attaining everlasting life, and become a powerful religious force, a religious force differing from all other religious bodies in that our primary object is to teach men that their salvation depends upon their doing the will of their Father in Heaven. Our denomination has now a splendid opportunity of doing good work. The time has come for identifying Christian morality with Christian religion. The Protestant world requires a new reformation and looks to our untrammelled denomination for it. By loud and long and united clamouring we can bring it about. We must unite. We must make it plain to the meanest intelligence that our existence is not purposeless. We must proclaim in season and out of season that our mission is a positive one. If we fail to do so, the Kingdom of God is not in us. It is our plain duty, in the name of God and in the spirit of Christ, to rescue Protestantism from the sad position in which the scientific writers above referred to have shown it to be. With that object it is incumbent upon us to bind together our scattered congregations and religious associations into a well-endowed and well-organised church, which shall provide for the education and maintenance of carefully selected ministers, and for the continuous propagation of Christ's teaching—"Not every one that saith unto me Lord, Lord, shall enter into the Kingdom of Heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in Heaven." "For the hour cometh, in which all that are in the tombs shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done ill unto the resurrection of judgment."

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.—We are requested to say that notification of lodgings, hotels, vouchers for railway tickets at reduced fares, tickets for luncheon and the conversazione, will be sent out at the beginning of April to those who have applied for them.

THIRSTING FOR RIGHTEOUSNESS.

THE GLORY OF SIMPLE RECTITUDE.

BY THE REV. CHARLES G. AMES.

"BLESSED are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled." The man who says that has a claim on the reverent and grateful attention of all mankind. He gives voice to the universal reason and conscience; he inspires the highest and holiest hope. Heaven and earth may pass away, but the words that give life are themselves immortal. Like the utterances of the sibyl, they are "simple, unadorned, unperfumed, and reaching through the ages, because of God."

Here is one sign of truth. It affects us like a part of the permanent order of things; it is all of one stuff with the world and with our own proper nature. It has the ring of reality. Like sunlight, it carries its own evidence, and to the sane mind it recommends itself as sunlight does to the healthy eye, but it is concealed from our grossness by its own simplicity and transparency. Who realises this splendid miracle of the common day? In the same way we have become too familiar with some of the most obvious and important aspects of spiritual truth. These Beatitudes of Jesus may seem to be worn smooth. We have heard them from our infancy; their force and beauty appeal to unresponding hearts.

If we could have stood, one day long ago, among the Syrian peasants, on the slope of a hill in Galilee, and listened to these sayings as they fell fresh and clear-cut as newly minted gold from the living lips of the new prophet, perhaps we too should have been "astonished at his doctrine," we too should have "wondered at the gracious words that proceeded out of his mouth." Did it not seem as if Nature herself had at last found a voice, and as if that voice were speaking straight to her children, saying clearly and cheerily, yet soberly and solemnly, what all men vaguely think or feel, but can rarely put into words?

Yet these Beatitudes are remarkable for what they do not say. The sentences of Jesus seldom run in the grooves of old commonplace. He does not sit there, like the scribe of the synagogue, complacently reciting, in tones that make men sleepy, the virtues and piety of a dead ancestry, as if it were enough to have Abraham for a father and Moses for a law-giver. He pronounces no blessing on religious respectability, decorous conformity, doctrinal soundness, loyalty to the standard, fidelity to the traditions, or even diligence in the routine of observance and devotion. Any priest in the audience must have felt that a slight was put upon his great office, as if the speaker had forgotten to do it honour. The temple, the altar, and the sacred books are all mentioned with respect, yet they somehow fall into the background. Humanity is brought directly fronting Divinity, as if the pure in heart might see God and the impure might know the cause of their blindness.

Many a man in that company must have hung his head as the rebuke came home to him. Complacent worldlings, men proud of their estates or of their learning, doubtless stood there, expecting that he would confirm the world's vulgar judgment which says, "Blessed are the prosperous, the popular, the cultivated, and the comfortable." But no. The lips that opened in blessing made them shrink as if he had uttered a curse. Every word fell like a blow on their idols. The virtues which had strutted so proudly before God and man began to unmask as ugly vices as he went on to say, "Blessed are the men of humble mind, the men of good will, the merciful, the pure in heart. Yea, blessed are they who hunger and thirst for righteousness, so that for the sake of being right they dare and bear all losses and pains, and willingly let their names be cast out as evil."

No comfort here for the self-righteous, the self-satisfied, the self-willed, the self-seeking. But scattered through the company were men and women who felt their emptiness and poverty, who took no credit for their ancestry, their accomplishments, or their social standing, who hardly dared so much as to lift up their eyes to heaven. Yet, as they listened, all the world above, around, within, seemed to change. The awful Jehovah, whom they had thought of as throned afar in threatening majesty, seemed a smiling Father who wished His children to be near Him and to be as perfect as Himself. They drew in deeper draughts of the country air; their very emptiness seemed to make so much more room for God and goodness. Their cry of inward need changed into childlike trust.

Here was indeed a messenger of good tidings. Here was a doctrine as worthy of man as it was worthy of God. And does not all the best thought of our own time still travel this way? Has the weary search of mankind through the ages found anything better than a righteousness which is rooted in sonship to the highest, and which blossoms into service to the lowest? Has not our clearest conception of the divine ever been an expansion and idealisation of the best qualities of the human? The one fact which we most certainly know is our own existence; and in that fact, if we look deep enough and honestly enough, we shall find the revelation and witness of God. For, when a man has rightly revered the decrees of conscience, he has heard the Voice; when he has really made acquaintance with his own nature, he has seen the Face.

There are times when I feel entirely satisfied with this inward proof of spiritual realities. There are high moments when there is need of no other evidence of God than the fact that I am alive. And there are times when the sight of a good man, or something seen in the face of a child, or some stir in Nature that affects me like a footstep, carries with it conviction and assurance. Along with this feeling comes always the perception that goodness is what I am made for. Not even a voice out of the sky could tell me more plainly that the Holy Being wills that I too should be holy. Along with the reproof comes the encouragement, and along with the hunger for righteousness comes the promise that the hunger shall be satisfied.

To suppose the Creator indifferent to the moral character and welfare of His creatures is essential atheism; but, if not indifferent, He must have provided all needed helps to virtue, He must have given

His creatures light to find the right way and strength to walk in that way. But, even if He were indifferent, we cannot afford to be so, for our highest interest is to be found in seeking the completeness of our own being in and the harmony or rightness of our relations with all other beings, and with the laws and forces of the universe in which we find our place. Everything worth having or worth desiring is involved in character, in being simply and soundly right.

The world comes right when the man comes right. What it is to each one of us depends on what we are and how we take it. We make our own hells, we can make our own heavens.

"When the soul to sin hath died,
True and beautiful and sound,
Then all earth is sanctified,
Upsprings paradise around."

A rough-cast man rose in a country meeting-house to tell his experience: "It was in the north country, when the snow lay deep on the ground, that the Lord God found out Jonathan Hinckley and converted his soul. And the leafless trees gave praise to God." Is there one among us who might not report to himself something like this happy convert's story? Who has not at some time felt sure of his place in the great order, and seen all the world irradiated with a light which really shone from within the mind?

If a man has lost his faith in God and still holds fast his own integrity, well for the man. But, in this very concern to be true to the highest law he knows, he is unconsciously a worshipper. Blessed is the man who hungers and thirsts for righteousness, for already he holds in his soul the richest of all treasures. We who believe in God need not be seriously troubled about the fate or state of honest non-believers, for we may count their very honesty as a sign of the real presence and the finest inspiration.

Once accept the principle of duty, and all life becomes an honourable discipline and a steady advance. There is no higher rank on earth or in heaven than the rank of personal goodness; and he who loves it, seeks it, and practises it for its own sake is surely moving, however slowly, towards the perfect life.

Here also is the cure, and the only cure, for our restlessness and self-dissatisfaction. "No man can serve two masters." But he who falls heartily in love with virtue is no longer distracted by a divided allegiance. He has nothing else to do but to occupy himself with learning and doing what is right and reasonable. Having settled the central principle and leading purpose of his life, every step onward and upward makes the next easier, and the law of habit continually operates to confirm this deep-hearted choice. He is no longer driven by the lash of conscience; he is no more a servant, but a son, and the Father's house is his happy home.

Here, too, is the secret of victory over our trials and depressions. When shall we half realise the grandeur and glory of simple rectitude? Let me again repeat a tale of real life. Years ago, and far away, I knew a woman of most fine and excellent qualities whose deeply shadowed life was like a long crucifixion and martyrdom. In one of her letters she said, "My youth is gone, my hope is dead, and my heart is heavy; but I neglect no duty." In reply I said, "If you could ask God for just one blessing, and could be sure of that one and never of another, would you dare pray that your youth might come back, or that your earthly hopes might be renewed, or even that the load on your heart might be lightened? Would you not ask for a living principle within yourself that would make you neglect no duty? And can you not see that, in giving you the love of righteousness He has really given you the best thing in all the universe?" In her next letter she wrote that this view of the matter was new to her own mind, but that she accepted it as true, and found in it strength to take up her burden—a burden carried, as I believe, with patience, courage, and constancy to the end, which was not far away.

There is one thing more to be said. He who really loves righteousness cannot love it for himself alone; he hungers for its triumph over all the earth, he longs for the banishment of every wrong. Hence his zeal for justice is sweetened with good will to men, so that righteousness becomes one form of benevolence. The right is always the good. Hence the ethical passion kindled from the heart of Jesus has flamed out in abhorrence of wrong and evil, and has lent support and vigour to every movement for reform and welfare. "It is a spurious virtue that can contentedly see vice thriving by its side." The gospel is no gospel if it does not turn the hearts of men toward each other as well as toward God. It is no gospel if it does not unite all believers in wise, well-considered, and earnest movements for the cleansing of the world and the better ordering of all human life. Righteousness is rightness. To hunger and thirst for righteousness, therefore, is all one with the prayer that God's kingdom may come, and that His will may be done on earth as it is in heaven.

NORTH AND EAST LANCASHIRE UNITARIAN MISSION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting was held at Rochdale, on Wednesday, March 7: In the afternoon there was service in the Blackwater-street Church, conducted by the Rev. H. E. Haycock, of Bolton, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant. The text was from the Prayer Book version of Psalm cxix. 67: "Before I was troubled I went wrong, but now have I kept Thy word." It was an earnest appeal to the churches for new zeal and devotion in Christian service. "Woe unto us," said the preacher, "if we sit down self-satisfied as if on this earth and before high heaven there is nothing left for us to do." He would not exaggerate the pain and trouble in the world, but all who were not deaf and blind could perceive the enormous evils around us—the crimes, the vice that did not come within the meshes of the law, the corruption in commerce, and the vast number of men and women who were not rising to the full measure of divine life. These people paid their way, kept themselves fairly respectable, and went through the world with no thought above the satisfactions of the body. And the churches did not seem to be deeply troubled about them:

Instead of hugging themselves in their self-satisfaction, let them look around at what others were doing who, with their light, were going down into the dark places, searching out the maimed and wounded, breathing hope to the despairing, and doing their best to heal the sores of the time. Further, let them beware that the high-sounding phrases so often heard at their meetings, did not become platitudes. "We talk of the brotherhood of man—what are we prepared to do for our brothers? What of our own pleasure and time and strength will we sacrifice for them? Let us pledge ourselves anew, consecrate ourselves afresh to serve God in serving man."

After service the business meeting was held, the president, Mr. W. W. Hadley in the chair. The committee reported an uneventful year, with the work already in hand steadily maintained. The one new departure was a mission at Blackburn, where previous efforts had been made in the early days of the mission. The committee now hoped for good results. They were not satisfied to do so little, but if the Unitarians of the district really wished to see the principles and the practice of the religion which they professed extended over a wider area, then they must find more money. So long as the funds entrusted to them were insufficient the blame did not rest with them if the work had to be left unattempted. In view of the annual grants for which they were responsible, and which could only be gradually reduced, they did not think it right to incur fresh liabilities until they saw their way to meet them. It was for the supporters of the mission to determine whether the work was to go forward or to hang back.

The report, together with the statement of accounts, was adopted.

The thanks of the meeting were accorded the officers and committee for their services during the past year, and the following appointments for the ensuing year were made:—President, the Rev. T. Leyland; treasurer, Mr. D. Healey (Heywood); auditor, Mr. J. Chadderton; chairman of the committee, Mr. T. Harwood; vice-chairman, the Rev. J. J. Wright; secretaries, the Revs. R. Travers Herford and J. Moore.

The Revs. W. G. Tarrant and H. E. Haycock were thanked for the part they had taken in the service, and the thanks of the meeting were also given, on the proposition of Mr. T. Harwood, seconded by the Rev. R. Travers Herford, to the Rochdale congregation for their hospitable reception. This was acknowledged by the chairman and the Rev. T. P. Spedding.

Tea was then served in the schools, about 150 persons being present.

THE PUBLIC MEETING.

After tea a public meeting was held in the upper schoolroom. Mr. W. W. Hadley presided, and was supported by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, J. J. Wright, J. A. Pearson, A. H. Dolphin (representing the Yorkshire Union), T. P. Spedding and H. Haycock, Councillor D. Healey, and others.

The CHAIRMAN, in a short address, commended the work of the Mission. He urged the need of a closer fellowship between neighbouring churches, and suggested regular exchange of preachers between churches so near together, say, as Rochdale, Todmorden, Oldham, Middleton, and Heywood. He was inclined to think that Unitarians tended to become morbidly self-conscious; and that it would be better for them if they emphasised their Unitarianism less and their Christianity more. If their churches were to be a living force in the world they must appeal more to the heart. The only test of their efficiency was: How far did they help men and women to fight the battle of life? In all their work they should strike a bold and positive note. They should, as often as they could, absolutely and entirely ignore the attempts that were made to exclude them from the comity of Christian churches; and make their appeal to the hearts of men and women who wished to worship together and to help each other and their neighbours to live better and nobler lives.

The Rev. W. G. TARRANT welcomed the chairman's suggestion that there should be some sort of exchange of preachers between neighbouring churches, and said it might be well if they could adopt a system whereby occasionally a layman should occupy the pulpit in the stead of the minister. Ministers were too apt to get away from the ordinary thinking and feeling of ordinary beings. They could not help it; it was one of the difficulties of their position. They were apt to get wrapped up in their books, and to be interested in controversies, and they gave other people credit for being as much interested as they were themselves. He confessed that he had often felt the need of coming into closer contact with the lay mind, a mind not so much affected by books as by things. Passing on, Mr. Tarrant expressed the hope that they would live long enough to see more of their churches self-supporting. Some people said this was to be achieved by organisation and the intercourse of churches. What he considered they required was something more like the baptism of the spirit. They wanted to realise their responsibilities with their heart as well as their head, and if they did this a great future lay before their churches.

The Rev. J. J. WRIGHT spoke at length on the work of the mission, the ramifications of which, he said, extended at one time as far north as Lancaster, as far south as Leigh, as far east as Todmorden, and as far west as Blackpool. Their twenty-nine churches could be separated into three groups. About one-half were what they called self-supporting churches, such as Rochdale, Bury, and Bolton (Bank-street), &c. Then another set, comprising five or six churches, were at one time mission stations, but they had prospered, and some of them were now helping the Mission. Then there were the seven mission stations, such as Leigh, Horwich, Accrington, Astley, and Colne. These mission stations had great difficulties to contend with, and those in touch with their work could not fail to admire how splendidly they were carried on with the small means at their disposal. That being so, there was a claim on the more favourably situated churches to help the missions. If the self-supporting congregations only realised the struggles of the people at the mission stations they would be prompted to give more liberally. The mission stations did their level best; he only wished that some of the self-supporting churches did as well and tried as hard to raise money. He made an earnest appeal for further support, and said that another £300 or £400 per year could be well and usefully spent.

The Revs. J. A. Pearson and H. Dolphin and Councillor D. Healey also delivered short addresses.

MIDLAND CHRISTIAN UNION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the Midland Christian Union of Presbyterian, Unitarian, and other Non-subscribing Churches, was held in Birmingham, at the Old Meeting Church, Bristol-road, on Monday, March 12, and was fairly well attended. The prevailing note was of satisfaction and encouragement owing to the successful raising of the Priestley Centenary Fund of £5,000, and the determination to make good use of the opportunity thus secured for more progressive work.

The business meeting was held in the morning, the president, Mr. W. Byng Kenrick, in the chair.

The report of the committee, read by Mr. E. Ellis Townley, recorded the last annual meeting and three meetings of the Council held at Wolverhampton, Small Heath, and Cradley, and the changes in the Province, including the settlement of the Rev. J. E. Stronge at Kidderminster, the Rev. G. L. Phelps at Evesham, the Rev. W. G. Topping at Oldbury, and the Rev. C. M. Wright as assistant minister at the Old Meeting Church. The coming removal of the Rev. A. H. Thomas from Stourbridge to Leicestershire, in succession to the Rev. E. W. Lummis, who has been obliged by the state of his health to retire, was also noted. The committee deplored the loss by death of Mr. C. D. Badland, of Kidderminster, and of the Rev. Peter Dean, formerly of Walsall. The Rev. C. D. Badland, of Whitchurch, had retired and settled at Kidderminster, but would be ready for occasional service. Satisfactory progress at Small Heath was reported, and the good work done by the Lay Preachers' Association acknowledged.

Among the events of the year had been Professor Carpenter's lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience," given to large and appreciative audiences. The report concluded as follows:—

"The committee desire to express their thankfulness for the generous support which has enabled them with renewed hope and energy to continue and enlarge their work, and would urge upon the friends of liberal Christianity in Birmingham and the Midlands the need of further supporting the Union. Our objects are to provide a closer association among the congregations of the district and to promote a wider and truer knowledge of religion in connection with the freedom which rejects subscription to any articles of theological belief. In endeavouring to realise these aims the committee appeal for the help and sympathy of all the members of our Free Churches."

The accounts showed an adverse balance of £105 9s. 8d., the amount received in subscriptions being £150 3s. 6d., less by £7 than last year, and in congregational collections £57 11s. 2d., £5 more than last year. Grants amounting to £313 15s. were made to five congregations, including £150 to Small Heath, received from the Priestley Centenary Fund. Further grants amounting to £162 10s., received from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, were also made.

The roll was called by the Rev. A. H. SHELLEY, the clerical secretary.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, said it was four years since they had asked him to accept the position of president, and he had found in it opportunities for work much larger than he had anticipated, and difficulties greater also. He could not now look back upon the time without feelings of joy and satisfaction, and yet there was that other thought, that they moved slowly. Why was it? Amid the various schools of religious thought they belonged to those who believed in freedom for continuous growth and change in religious outlook. That was of the utmost importance, as bearing not only on religious convictions, but on the tone they should give to the whole course of their life. Holding that position, they had to recognise that it was a cause which did not make rapid progress. Asking what they could do to accelerate progress, he quoted the remark of a Japanese observer, who had found the people of this country constantly called upon to assert their rights, without any parallel assertion of their duties. And he would suggest to the laity in their churches that perhaps they might be giving too much thought to their rights and not sufficient thought to their duties as members of congregations. In that work they had entered into partnership. If they claimed the time, services, sympathies of their ministers, they must contribute their own share to the work of the church, not merely on week-night evenings, but on Sunday also, and on that day they could only contribute their share by regular attendance. That applied to them in a special sense as members of that association, which had to care for the well-being of the churches. In the past year they had organised a greater number of meetings of the representative body of the Union, but the attendance at these meetings had been disappointing, largely due, he believed, to mere carelessness. He asked members to realise that their presence at meetings, and the interest they showed, even if they took no part in discussions, was a strength to the work, and made for the general life of the body. He was as convinced as ever that they had an important work to do, and the help of all alike was needed. From the past four years they might gather considerable encouragement, and look forward with confidence to the accomplishment of the work.

Mr. A. G. HOPKINS, who seconded, said that never had their outlook been more cheerful than now, and the resolution was unanimously adopted.

Mr. HERBERT NEW then read the report of the committee on the Priestley Centenary Celebration, which told how, on the suggestion of the Rev. Joseph Wood, it had been determined to raise at least £5,000 to strengthen the work of the Union, and how that had been done, partly by the bazaar in the Birmingham Town Hall, in December, 1904, which realised (with some donations) £1,071 11s. 10d., but chiefly through direct donations, £3,900 9s. 6d., from 113 persons, bank interest £53 17s. 11d., making up the total of £5,025 19s. 3d. For this result they had chiefly to thank their president, Mr. Byng Kenrick, who had promised the last £500, and actually gave £625, while other members of the Kenrick family contributed altogether £1,575.

On the motion of the Rev. J. Wood, seconded by Mr. J. H. FORRESTER, a vote of thanks was passed to the committee, the stall-holders, and all those who had contributed so much to the success of the bazaar.

The Rev. J. C. STREET, supporting the motion, said there were two names they must chiefly remember in the expression of their grateful appreciation—Mr. Wood's and the president's.

The PRESIDENT said Mr. Wood and he were amply rewarded by the successful accomplishment of their purpose, and he put the resolution without the addition so kindly suggested by Mr. Street.

The resolution was very cordially passed.

The Rev. JOSEPH WOOD proposed the re-election of Mr. Byng Kenrick as president. They valued his presence and counsels, and congratulated themselves on having such a president. They were looking forward to an interesting time in the expenditure of the fund with which they had been entrusted. In that they would be guided very largely by the judgment of their chairman. It was not proposed to follow quite the old lines, and it would be an immense advantage in that matter to have Mr. Kenrick's counsel.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. H. E. PERRY, and unanimously passed. Mr. KENRICK, in acknowledging the vote said that the great thing they had to learn in connection with their work was the value of co-operation.

The other officers and committee were then elected, the treasurer, Dr. J. W. Russell, and the secretaries, the Rev. A. H. Shelley and Mr. E. Ellis Townley, being re-elected.

A vote of sympathy with the relatives of those who had perished in the dreadful disaster at the Courrières mines was silently passed, and the meeting terminated.

Luncheon followed at the Grand Hotel, Colmore-row, when the ministers and delegates were the guests of the Old Meeting congregation. The Rev. J. Wood presided, and among the toasts that of The Guests was responded to by the Rev. Charles Roper.

THE CONFERENCE.

In the afternoon a conference was held in the Old Meeting Church, and opened with the singing of the hymn "We come unto our fathers' God" (by the late T. H. Gill). The president was in the chair.

The Rev. CHARLES ROPER, of Kilburn, read a paper on "The Quickening of Life in Local Centres," giving in particular an account of what has latterly been done in the Manchester district. The paper opened with a plea against the too great individualism of Unitarians, and what seemed to be their ideal of a church of Units. To their fellow-Christians of other denominations, religious fellowship and comradeship were more significant realities; there was much to be learnt from them as to the sharing of a common interest, experience of a common need and union in common discipleship. The lack of comradeship was too often noticeable in their small congregations, where sometimes people were found to have attended for years, and no one speak a word to them. On the other hand, his late large and flourishing church at Moss Side was built up by a persistent display of orthodox ardour in making all who came within it feel that they were brothers in Christ, and essential to the maintenance of that spiritual atmosphere which alone could send all who worshipped together forth into the work-a-day world, strengthened and inspired to truly live the religious life. Organisation within the church was of the utmost importance in maintaining the enthusiasm of its members. The central fires must be fed methodically if the steam is to be kept up. Too many of their churches ignored the value of machinery. They talked glibly about the freedom of the spirit as if that included the whole theory and practice of church dynamics. Something more was needed. Encouragement and direction and practical help could be, and ought to be, given by an outside and representative organisation, whose suggestions came with greater authority, and were received with heartier welcome than when they emanated from an individual church member. He had known more than one church treat lightly, and almost ridicule, a scheme put forth by one of its own members, and yet give essentially the same scheme a successful trial when advocated and supported by its District Association. Individual churches were sometimes, like individual men, short-sighted in policy, and the combined wisdom of a group of churches was necessary to convert them to the recognition of the desirability of some new departure. The District Association must be alert, earnest, thoroughly alive to its responsibilities, and the possibilities before it; otherwise, if its work were done perfunctorily it could give no help or inspiration, and would only damp the ardour of its constituent churches. Its government should be representative in order to secure the absolute confidence of its members.

Mr. ROPER then gave an account of the Manchester District Association, with its representative governing body, and the admirable work it has done of recent years in the establishment of new churches, the organising of special services, and the monthly visits of the governing body to the churches of the district. He quoted from the preliminary circular the objects of these monthly visits both in the religious service and the public meeting held regularly for many months on the last Saturday of the month:—"(a) To realise more fully the joys and privileges of our Gospel, the need of personal devotion to our ideals, and of zeal and sacrifice in bringing that Gospel to the knowledge of others." "(b) To emphasize the need of seizing every opportunity for united work, having in view the freedom enjoyed by our churches, which makes the voluntary manifestation of loving sympathy in each other's labours all the more necessary and helpful; to this end it is most desirable that loyalty to the District Association shall be assured in all its arrangements for joint meetings and services."

These meetings, with persistent care in the arrangements, became a notable success, and were acknowledged, even by those who at first had been opposed or indifferent, to have been a great help. At some of the services it was found that at least eighteen out of the twenty-two constituent churches were represented. It took two years and five months (June 7, 1902, to November 5, 1904) to get round to the whole twenty-two churches, and the average afternoon attendance was 138, and evening 145, which showed a wonderful improvement on the average of the first five of the series. After this came the establishment of the Social Questions Committee, which was now active in bringing before the churches the pressing social needs of the day.

"A District Association," said Mr. Roper, in conclusion, "has to engage in a variety of detail work, and yet, as it seems to me, the most important thing for it to do is to arouse and maintain enthusiasm throughout its constituent churches. Enthusiasm is what we most need in our churches to-day. O that we were so deadly in earnest that people would call us MAD! It would be our salvation. With Unitarians religion should mean life; not the mere round of animal functions, but the healthy activity of a man as an intellectual, emotional, and reasonable being. It, therefore, involves rational conceptions of God, of human nature and human duty. That being so, worship is not an end in itself; it should bring us into a closer and felt relation to God, and it should inspire us to fulfil all the obligations of human brotherhood. True religion does not ignore but recognises the fact that man is a social being, destined to work out his own salvation here below. And in this we must be enthusiastic, or our professions will be vain. May God grant you in the Midland Christian Union a succession of enthusiasts. Men and women inspired to grapple with the demons of darkness; faithful and courageous and undaunted; who in their zeal for truth despise mere shibboleths and ceremonies, and aim at mercy, justice, and love. There are vices in society which batten and thrive upon the vitals of ignorance and poverty. We want enthusiasts who can arouse the heart of manhood, who can deal with the crying evils, the poverty, the immorality, the ungodliness, and who can do all this fearlessly, flinching at the imprecations of no man, pandering to no prejudices, shrinking from no threatened interests; men who have the true, undying spirit of Jesus, and who will strike for freedom and truth and love as unhesitatingly and boldly as he would do were he living and working amongst us here to-day. A mighty trust is placed upon us. We are divinely commissioned. Let us obey God's laws and carry out His divine commands with zeal and devotion and enthusiasm."

The Rev. JAMES C. STREET opened the discussion, and in doing so proposed a warm vote of thanks to Mr. Roper for his paper. Never, he said, had they had a more fruitful topic brought to their notice, or more valuable suggestions. What Mr. Roper had put before them recalled his own early days in the Manchester district, where he began his ministerial work as the first missionary of that Association. He remembered the stirring up of new life, the building up of new churches. Mr. Roper's paper had shown how the work was taken up where he had laid it down. The scattered churches, which knew little of one another, had been brought into vital union by the Association, and were all interested in one another. In that Midland district they had been feeling their way towards some such vital union. There was great need that they should visit one another's churches, not for purposes of criticism, but to strengthen the common work. Thorough co-operation and true brotherhood had been the essence of Mr. Roper's paper, and that was what they needed to bring spiritual life and energy to bear for the uplifting of the life of the churches.

Mr. EDWARD TYNDALL seconded the resolution, and earnestly endorsed the plea for truer brotherhood.

Messrs. BAKER, MANSELL, BASNETT, and TRANTER continued the discussion, and, the vote having been unanimously passed, Mr. Roper briefly responded.

Dr. C. HERBERT-SMITH, who had come down specially from London, then gave an address on the Boston Conference Fund (1907), by which it is hoped to provide £3,000, to enable a hundred Unitarian ministers to go to America next year to attend the International Council meetings in Boston. Dr. Herbert-Smith spoke in his humorous and telling way of the advantages not only to ministers but to the whole community of such a visit, recalling the inspiration of the Geneva meetings, and looking for even greater benefits from contact with the vigorous life of American Unitarianism. He told of how generously the London churches were responding to his appeal, of the methods adopted for securing contributions (half-crowns as well as £5 or £10 were warmly welcomed), and appealed to the Midlands also to take part in the effort.

The meeting then adjourned for tea in the large upper schoolroom. Before the company separated, a cordial vote of thanks was passed to the Old Meeting congregation for their hospitality.

DR. HUNTER'S SERMON.

In the evening a religious service was held in the Old Meeting Church, conducted by the Rev. Joseph Wood, when the Rev. John Hunter, D.D., of Glasgow, was the preacher. There was a large congregation, and a collection was made for the funds of the Union.

"Faith" was the preacher's subject, and his text Mark xi. 22, 23: "Jesus saith unto them, Have faith in God. Verily I say unto you, Whosoever shall say unto this mountain, Be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea; and shall not doubt in his heart," it shall be done. The sermon was an eloquent and impassioned exposition of the true meaning of faith, not as merely intellectual assent, but as essentially moral and practical in character. When Jesus said, "Have faith in God," it was not a call to simple trust; he demanded not only passive submission and confidence in the Father's care—"The Eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms"—but an active response also—response of the whole being, mind and heart and will, to God. That meant entire practical acceptance of the ideal truth and good, of the divine law and order of life.

Such faith concerned the will; it had a moral quality—loyalty to the will of God in life and work, to the best we see and know, together with a sure and deep conviction that, in spite of all delay and defeat, God's best, including ours, is advancing to power and victory and glory. Jesus never gave the name of faith to a belief on which one had no courage to act. Men must act on their belief, otherwise there is no reality in it. Faith and obedience in the New Testament were often spoken of as one and the same thing. Obedience is faith in action, in its necessary result. Faith without works is dead, not really faith at all. We are accustomed to say that we believe in God; but thorough-going belief, practical faith, is by no means common: Moral daring, definite, unreserved committal of oneself to live as a son of God, is rare in the world. Yet Christian faith began so, with the consecration of one who gave himself utterly to be and do what God required, with the courage of one who obeyed perfectly the heavenly vision. Jesus knew no order but that of the Kingdom of God, and to that he summoned his disciples. And now also they must have faith in God, and not worship other gods—of crooked dealing, selfish expediency, and time serving. Those things were the denial of God. He desired truth in the inward parts. Truth, justice, and love must be the working principles of their life. It was not necessary that they should succeed, or even that they should live, but it was necessary that truth, justice, and love should be supreme in the world. Men of faith were those who believed that the right thing could be done and must be done. Right was of the nature of things—that is, of the nature of God. The greatest foe of religion, said Dr. Hunter, was not theological, but practical unbelief. There were thousands in that city in all the churches who would not like to be suspected of unbelief, yet what they called their faith could not move a single stone, much less a mountain, of prejudice and evil. It had no more effect on their selfish lives than belief in the moons of Jupiter. They must have faith in God, and give themselves to the absolute truth, and so be lifted out of inconsistent, broken, morally ineffective lives. They could not serve God and Mammon. The God of truth would not be served by what was not absolutely true and pure. The faith of Jesus, the faith they needed, was fearless, enlightened with moral enthusiasm. It never knew when it was beaten. It loved sympathy, but it could stand alone. As they saw it in the first disciples, all greatest things had been done by men of faith, for with God all things were possible. To that power of faith, which linked their life with the infinite source of strength, God had entrusted the redemption of the world. The chief business of the minister, said the preacher, in conclusion, was to persuade men to have faith in God.

It is not at all surprising that in proportion as we attend to the perishable part of our nature, our nature should appear perishable; and that in proportion as we neglect the mind, which alone has any heritage in the future, the future should become obscure.—Martineau.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Bradford.—There was a crowded congregation in Chapel-lane Chapel on Sunday evening, when the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones preached on "What Unitarians Believe," being led to that subject by a letter in the public Press, asking for a concise statement of their views. The text was 1 Cor. viii. 6, "To us there is one God, the Father." Unitarians, the preacher said, were at once the most ancient and the most modern section of the Christian Church. They claimed to be the representatives of the Christians of the first three centuries, while they gladly welcomed every new truth that might dawn on the expanding mind of man, now at the beginning of the twentieth century. They were called Unitarians because with Jesus and all the heroes of the Bible they believed in the great Father of all as the supreme object of their worship. They felt that they were called of God to do what lay in their power to hasten the time when the true worshippers should worship the Father in spirit and in truth. At the conclusion of his exposition he said their faith in the Fatherhood of God was such that they could not accept the common dogma of the fall of man. The scientific doctrine of evolution had come to their aid in this matter; and so they believed not in original depravity but in human capacity. Modern science assured them that there had been no fall, but a perpetual development of conscience, and a steady growth from good to better. Their orthodox brethren said they believed in the Divinity of Christ. The Unitarians made a much wider affirmation, and asserted the Divinity of all the children of God. They believed in salvation by character, which was a far higher and nobler thing than the common dogma of "salvation by blood." In opposition to the dogma of imputed righteousness, they held that salvation meant the highest development of the moral character which man is capable of. In this respect their faith had a special function to perform—the upholding of a high standard of morality. The sermon was well reported in Monday's Yorkshire Daily Observer, from which the above passages are taken.

Chatham.—On Sunday week the Rev. Tyssul Davis gave the first of a series of addresses on "Chatham as it ought to be," dealing in the first instance with "Physical Regeneration." He showed what had been done elsewhere, as at Port Sunlight and Bournville, towards realising a nobler idea of civic life, and pictured a regenerated Chatham. At the conclusion of the service a conference was held, but the majority of the speakers, instead of dealing with the constructive policy, as foreshadowed by the preacher, confined their remarks principally to criticism of those who had conducted the municipal affairs in the past. Councillors W. Paine and S. J. Hart each made a few remarks during the course of the discussion. The address is fully reported in last Saturday's Rochester Observer.

Ipswich.—On March 4 a series of sermons was commenced for the exposition and justification of Unitarian beliefs, the preacher, morning and evening, being the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones, of Plumstead. In the morning he spoke chiefly to the younger members, and in the evening preached to a large congregation, there being many visitors from other denominations, on "The Christ we Love." It was a powerful description of the life and teaching of Jesus. On Sunday evening, 11th inst., the Rev. Lucking Taverner preached, his subject being "Atonement." He dealt with the orthodox doctrine, referring to the teaching of Luther, C. H. Spurgeon, and the commands in the Church of England Articles. He showed the origin of the idea of human sacrifice, and how the apostles, through their contact with the pagan world, applied the ancient ideas to the sacrifice of Jesus. The true conception of God he illustrated from parable of the Prodigal Son. In conclusion, he referred to John xvii. 22, &c., "That they may be one even as we are one." The congregation was not so large as on the previous Sunday, owing chiefly to the exceedingly inclement weather, but there were many visitors. On Friday, 9th inst., Mr. R. Pearce, M.P., gave a most amusing and interesting lantern lecture to a large and appreciative audience, the subject being "My Voyage Round the World." Amongst his hearers were many old friends. The lecture was in connection with Friar-street Social Guild.

Liverpool Sunday School Society.—The annual meeting was held in the Bootle Free Church Hall on Saturday last. Tea was very kindly provided by the Bootle teachers, after which the chair was taken by the president (the Rev. J. Morley Mills). The council's report, read by the secretary, Miss Alison Hall, showed that useful work had been done during the year. There had been five general meetings for the members, and during the autumn a course of six lectures on "The Life of Jesus" had been given by the Rev. J. Collins Odgers. Full syllabuses were prepared by Mr. Odgers, and these have been found most useful by the teachers in their classes; the council trust they may be more widely used. The statistics show that in the twelve affiliated schools there are 1,834 scholars and 121 teachers. After the council's report and the treasurer's statement of accounts had been adopted, the Rev. Charles Craddock read a short paper on "The Apocalyptic Writings—their Meaning and Use," dealing chiefly with the Books of Daniel and Revelation, and showing how they were written in times of great storm and stress to encourage the people to look above and beyond their present troubles. He thought the Book of Daniel might well be taken in a class, and would be found most interesting. The Rev. H. D. Roberts, Miss Coventry, Mr. Hughes, the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, Miss L. McConnell and Mr. Robinson joined in the discussion, all expressing full appreciation of Mr. Craddock's paper.

London: Child's Hill.—On Sunday last the Rev. W. H. Read was the preacher at the morning service. Mr. Read has but recently given up his office as a Roman Catholic priest at Cambridge, and the Child's Hill pulpit was thrown open to him in order to give him an opportunity of publicly stating the reasons that had brought about his severance from the Roman Church. The preacher said that he had left Roman Catholicism after much grave, mature, and anxious thought, as the result of the gradual development of his mind during past years. The actual severance with his late friends had been painful, but he found joy in the hope of labour in the work of the ministry in putting before others the result of his own experience. But he could not contemplate himself as a noisy controversialist. Principles rather than persons were to be considered. Every reflecting man was bound to use his power freely, and no church must stand in the way. There was now for him no priestly caste holding the keys of knowledge, teaching and governing by an increasingly elaborate system of dogmatic and moral theology. In the Roman Catholic Church there was no intellectual freedom. The greatest thinkers in that Church were advanced and liberal, but they were silenced. They could not speak out. But we should not condemn rashly: we should endeavour to look at the question from our opponent's standpoint. The preacher also spoke of the difficulties in the way of progress—prejudices, inherited traditions. Yet Love should be the supreme law, and we must work in the spirit of Christ. We claim the liberty of the sons of God to think and to speak in the light of modern knowledge, and by methods of dispassionate study. Our own tiny work must be done, following the light that leads.

London: Peckham.—On Tuesday evening the gentlemen of the Avondale Guild were "at home" in the schoolroom to their lady friends, and under the energetic leadership of Mr. Gibberd provided an extremely diverting entertainment for their guests. At the close of the proceedings the ladies acknowledged the compliment paid them by their hosts, and promised to return it at some future date.

Saffron Walden.—The deferred annual meeting of the General Baptist Church, held on Monday, under the presidency of the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, received a satisfactory report of a year of active work and of improved church property, but an adverse balance of about £40. The trust estate had again suffered through agricultural depression. The usual resolutions were passed.

Stannington (Memorial and Welcome Meeting).—A marble tablet to the memory of the Rev. Iden Payne, who for more than 20 years was minister of the Underbank Chapel, was unveiled on March 5th, by Mr. Alfred Vickers, the senior member of the congregation and one of the trustees, when an impressive service was conducted by the Revs. C. J. Street, A. H. Dolphin, and J. Ruddle. A number of ministers and friends from Sheffield were present. On the same day a meeting was held in the school room to offer a cordial welcome to the newly appointed minister, the Rev. J. Ruddle. After tea the chair was taken by Mr. W. R. Stevenson, the senior trustee present. The Revs. C. J. Street, A. H. Dolphin and H. Dawtre gave addresses of welcome on behalf of the Sheffield District ministers; the Rev. John Ellis spoke on behalf of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union; the Rev. John Lee, Congregationalist minister of Loxley, an intimate friend of the late minister, spoke words of welcome to his successor; Mr. Sellars, of Stannington, represented the Wesleyans; Mr. Dungworth, the Lay Preachers' Union; while Mr. A. Vickers, Mr. J. Gilman, and Mr. George Vickers represented the congregation, Sunday-school and choir. A very genial spirit pervaded the meeting. Mr. Ruddle thanked the various speakers for the kind words they had said; expressed the confidence with which he entered upon his duties, and his desire to discharge them in a spirit of faithfulness and friendliness. A short concert by members of the congregation followed the welcome meeting.

This book aims at making the ordinary reader acquainted with the new and valuable light thrown on the Bible by the scholarship of the day, in the belief that the more widely the truth about it is known, the more widely will its incomparable spiritual elements be appreciated. While frankly admitting to the full what is called the destructive criticism of the rationalist, the author endeavours to show that this criticism is really constructive, and places the use and enjoyment of the Bible on a basis that cannot be shaken.

OLDBURY UNITARIAN MEETING HOUSE.

A FUND is being raised to provide a Memorial to the late Rev. Henry McKean, and it is thought that a number of the ministers and members of our Unitarian and Free Christian Churches who knew Mr. McKean would feel a pleasure in contributing.

It is proposed to perpetuate his memory by providing an Organ and marble Mural Tablet for the Meeting House in which he laboured for 46 years. The scheme for a new organ Mr. McKean himself started, and was very anxious to see carried into effect. Towards the Memorial as a whole, the members of the congregation—which is composed entirely of working-class people—have contributed £100, and as £300 will be required, it is hoped this appeal will meet with a ready and liberal response. NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Courrières disaster appears no less terrible now that we are removed from the explosion by another week. In many respects the tragedy darkens. The accident has served as the provocative occasion for a strike which may, it is feared, assume vast proportions. The life of the miners and their families is a hard, harsh one. At best they work at a trying task for exaggerated hours of toil and an inadequate wage. There is permanent discontent and hostility. It is not unnatural, then, that the population suspect the mine owners of not taking sufficient precautions, and, in support of the suspicion, point to the fact that work was allowed in the mine while fire was already raging in an adjacent pit. But among all the gloom emerges one fact good to record. The visit of the salvage corps of German miners from Westphalia has been of great immediate service. Its complete outfit of rescue apparatus has drawn the attention of foreign governments, including our own. Beyond this, the visit has demonstrated the solidarity of interest of the workers in the coal pits whether French or German, and has helped to rivet the growing consciousness of brotherhood among the peoples.

THE sumptuous volume published by the Dunfermline Trust contains Professor Patrick Geddes' brilliant and picturesque proposals for rendering a small Scottish town beautiful, and for cultivating a love of the beautiful city in the minds of the citizens. Professor Geddes has rendered a similar service to London in his lecture to the Sociological Society. Those of our readers who are acquainted with the Dunfermline photographs will readily fill in the outline of the thoughts of the lecture. How fully the actual is made to yield to the desirable, and at the same time how closely what is fair and good in the past is preserved! We all need to be reminded of the meaning of cities, how that they are no more than a reflex of mind. And of no city is this truer than of the metropolis. Hardly, indeed, to be called a city, so large, so multifarious, and so amorphous a place it is. Yet how full of history, of association, and also of possibility! That the possible may become real we need many things. Among them not the least is Professor Geddes' Civic Museum. There it should be possible, in model and in picture, to see London as a whole as we cannot otherwise see it, except from a balloon. There is so much of beauty, of strange interest, that we cordially wish the Civic Museum a speedy building. Thence may develop what were of such priceless worth—a school of citizenship. If Professor Geddes has anything to do with it, it will not be merely utilitarian, but inspirational as well.

THIS idea of the educational and imaginative value of seeing things, in order therefore to think thoughts has many applications. We notice, for example, that the young people's branch of the Colonial Missionary Society is preparing a Missionary Exhibition. This is to be held in the Memorial Hall, and to be distributed into four main courts representing Australia, Africa, the West Indies, and Canada. They are to be shown by means of curios and pictures, by lantern lectures and lantern slides. In addition to the purely missionary instruction, such a show can hardly fail to convey a great deal of miscellaneous information in an agreeable manner. To many of the young visitors it may serve also to suggest fruitful lines of reflection on the meaning and the relations of our colonies.

MISS NICHOLSON, of London, told a meeting gathered under the auspices of the Vegetarian Society in the Town Hall, Manchester, of the good work done in the feeding of poor children by the London Vegetarian Society. From very small beginnings the work had come to assume great proportions, and to receive the notice of the County Council and even of Parliament. Hundreds of thousands of dinners were now being provided every winter in the poor districts of London at a charge of one penny per head. These vegetarian dinners were so good and so popular that the children everywhere preferred them to the meat dinners provided at greater cost.

WILLERT STREET MISSION CHAPEL

No grace the Mission Chapel hath
Of stately spire or storied stone;
No doves about its windows fly,
Or breezes from wide spaces blown.
Yet, though unsanctified by Art,
By Time's soft touch unhallowed yet,—
Here, where no lordly towers arise,
Are Salem's firm foundations set.
And, unto him who deeper sees
Than the vain outward show of things,
Here, in the wilderness of streets,
Is Elim, with its palms and springs.
Not only where the jewelled cross
Flames over the high altar place;
Nor where the jubilant anthem rings
Through long drawn heights of shadowy space
Does grace abound, and faith grow warm,
And the heart burn within, but where
The earnest seekers of the light
Bow in sweet unison of prayer.
And, hither to the upper room,
The welcome of its light and song
Up these stone stairs, when vesper bell
Ring out, they come: a goodly throng.
There are, with toil and thronging care
Grown weary through the weary week,
In quietness of thought and prayer,
Find here the Heavenly grace they seek.
Here young hearts, yearning into life,
Thrill with the sudden breath of praise;
And old age recreates the glow
Of unforgotten yesterdays.
Here the sore, sorrow stricken heart
Courage from manly utterance gains,
Comfort in sweet familiar song,
Healing in gracious organ strains.
Where these signs are—where true Love waits
Heart-anxious to assuage life's tears
With sovereign grace of sympathy,
The Holy Church of God appears.

THE Van Mission, of which the ideal was so persuasively put before us last summer, is now taking actual form, as will be seen from the interesting communication which we publish this week from the Rev. T. P. Spedding. We shall look with great interest to hear of the first experiences of our travelling missionaries, and trust that they will abundantly realise that they are out not to sow seeds of theological controversy, but to speak the word of living religion to the people. Friends will note Mr. Spedding's appeal for an additional £50 to cover the working expenses of this summer's expedition, and we trust that he will promptly get what is required.

AN INDIAN UNIVERSITY OF THE SEVENTH CENTURY:

PROFESSOR ESTLIN CARPENTER, who has recently been appointed external examiner in Comparative Religion for the Theological Faculty of the Victoria University of Manchester, visited the University last week, and lectured on the above subject. This was the last of a series of popular lectures arranged by the Theological Faculty, and delivered by eminent representatives of various schools of religious thought. The lectures are open to the public, and always attract large audiences, including many ministers of various denominations. Professor Carpenter found one of the largest audiences of the series present, and had a most hearty reception.

The lecture was an account of the travels of a celebrated Chinese scholar, and of his visit to the most famous seat of Buddhist learning. Hiouen Tshang, the scholar in question, was born in the year 629, in North-West China. He was admitted at the age of 13 to the Monastery, where he was noted for his piety. On the outbreak of political troubles he was compelled to leave the Monastery, and he set himself to learn the truth from all the recognised teachers. Finding their teaching as well as the sacred books to differ widely, he decided to journey to India to consult the highest authorities. Professor Carpenter gave a graphic account of the journey, which occupied over three years, and of the dangers faced and many narrow escapes from death. Ultimately he arrived at Nalanda the most famous Buddhist University.

Five hundred devout merchants were stated to have bought the ground on which the seat of learning was to stand, and they "presented it to the Buddha." Successive endowments created a vast pile of buildings. There were eight huge quadrangles, an equal number of temples, one hundred lecture-rooms where the ten thousand students were taught, and six immense blocks of residential building used as quarters for monks and novices. The government of the institution and its subjects of instruction were in turn described. "These records of the past," Professor Carpenter said, "are worth studying. They are the witness of the venerable East to the abiding principle that the first condition of the quest of truth is liberty."

The University was divided between the eighteen recognised sects. Constant discussions took place, but none were excluded. No creed or articles barred the way to any chair, and the head of the University was chosen for his learning only. To this principle of freedom, Buddhism had always been faithful. It had never made theological agreement the ground of religious communion. Have you the right disposition, was its only question. That was the secret of the extraordinary enthusiasm which carried the religion all through Asia. Some day, Professor Carpenter said in conclusion, "the Universities of the West may learn of the East to honour this principle of freedom, and in this, Manchester and its great University were leading the way."

Professors Peak, Rhys Davids, and Herford spoke in most eulogistic terms of the lecture, and a vote of thanks was carried with great and long-continued applause:

LIVERPOOL DISTRICT MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the Liverpool District Missionary Association was held in the meeting-room of the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, Liverpool, on Saturday afternoon, the 17th inst. There was a large attendance of subscribers and friends. After refreshments, the Rev. J. C. Odgers, the president, took the chair, and spoke felicitously of the good work being done by the various agencies of the Association, ministers, missionaries, and lay preachers. He proposed the adoption of the report and accounts.

Mr. PHILIP H. HOLT seconded the resolution, but begged to dissent from some of the remarks made by his friend in the chair, asking, "Were we on right lines?" Were we engaging our missionaries in the best way to-day? He hardly thought we were, but found it difficult to supply another. He suggested, in effect, that the work necessary for Unitarians to do to-day was done by the Postal Mission, and, say, the Hibbert Journal. He wanted consideration to be given under altered circumstances to different kinds of work. The Association in forty-six years had contributed £20,000 to the enterprise of establishing new congregations, and he was bound to ask, What had been the result?

Mr. CHARLES W. JONES, in proposing a cordial vote of thanks to the missionaries for their devoted and valuable work, said no doubt it was necessary to revise methods of work, and he had not personally received much satisfaction from Crewe, in which effort he had been largely associated. But that such work should still be undertaken there could be no doubt, until "Fundamental Christianity" should be more acknowledged than it is at the present time.

The succeeding speakers, one and all, addressed themselves to the point raised by Mr. Holt, and with unanimity deplored and combated his suggestion. The Rev. H. D. ROBERTS said he was glad the question had been publicly raised, as it allowed him the opportunity of declaring how difficult this tacit opposition to "new causes" had rendered the raising of the necessary funds for the avowed work of the Missionary Association. He might tell Mr. Jones that any money spent on them was bearing fruit at this present time in even the visible embodiment of success; and, with regard to Mr. Holt's idea, it did seem curious that when other churches endeavoured to extend their borders and their influence it was not sectarianism; but that when the people who could not be sectarian, if they tried, made a mild effort to put their gospel forward, then it was sectarian. And why should Garston be shut up, when they did not propose to close Ullet-road, or Hope-street, or the Ancient Chapel? In fact, he had come to that meeting to suggest that Mr. Hirst's services in the summer at Garston should be supplemented by a resident minister for the winter months—the time when continuity of effort was most necessary; and, knowing as they all did, something, at least, of Mr. Holt's munificence, he could assure him that £100 for this purpose would be a service of as high quality as any of the noble gifts which Liverpool owed to Mr. Holt's unostentatious generosity. To rely on the Postal Mission work, which was excellent, or the Hibbert Journal, which also was, no doubt, excellent, as a solvent of current theology, was to render a pure gospel futile, if we did not, in addition, provide "spiritual homes," even in iron churches, or upper rooms, for common worship, on an open intellectual basis.

The Rev. J. MORLEY MILLS, as minister of a grant-aided congregation, spoke strongly on the absolute need for churches, and cited his experience at an old chapel and in the newer work at Bootle. The Rev. R. P. FARLEY pointing out that Postal Mission work only touched those men or women who had a native desire and opportunity for writing on deep themes, asked what was to be done for ordinary workers in a huge industrial centre like St. Helens. So far from joining in Mr. Holt's lament that their missionaries' efforts and talents should be frittered away or "wasted," at, say, St. Helens, he would suggest that the ministers of their older Liverpool churches should be sent by their congregations for three months to the missionary stations, as the best men were wanted in those difficult places. At St. Helens there would be plenty of scope even for the Apostle Paul.

The Rev. J. C. HIRST desired to speak a word for the self-sacrificing and arduous work done by the "faithful few" at Garston, and heartily endorsed the suggestion for a minister at Garston for the winter. He could not forbear comparing the meagre sums given for the propagation of a cause which had produced such a fine and public-spirited type of men and women with the magnitude of the sums freely given for education and hospitals.

It was announced that the Rev. H. FISHER SHORT was, unfortunately, unable to speak for Crewe, as he had been unavoidably detained for a funeral; whereupon, the Rev. A. E. PARRY thanked the Association for the sympathy extended, and generous aid given to the Liscard congregation, and spoke of the influence on character of these very churches which Mr. Holt wished not to multiply.

The Rev. H. W. HAWKES in proposing a vote of thanks to the President, and to their hosts of the Ancient Chapel, emphasised the remarks of previous speakers, and gave a few details of the new work at West Kirby; and the Rev. J. L. HAIGH, in seconding, warmly thanked Mr. Odgers for his interest in Hamilton-road.

The accounts showed an adverse balance of £180 17s. 3d., a few shillings less than last year; and £77 12s. 8d. on the St. Helens Building Fund, where the deficit had been reduced during the year by a donation of £100 from "an Octogenarian." For the general account, annual subscriptions amounted to £196 11s. 6d.; donations, to £54 10s.; chapel collections, to £87. From the B. & F.U.A. a grant of £100 for the missionary minister was received. The report contained a word of hearty congratulation to the Liscard congregation on the attainment of their independence, and a letter from the secretary of the church gratefully acknowledging the help received from the Association during the past twelve years.

LITERATURE.

THE SCIENTIFIC TEMPER IN RELIGION. *

THE Rev. P. N. Waggett, of the Society of St. John the Evangelist, has already issued several illuminating and scholarly little works dealing with modern scientific and religious problems. His latest publication, "The Scientific Temper in Religion," lacks none of the power or charm exhibited in previous productions. It consists in the main of addresses given by him in St. Mark's Church, Marylebone, in the spring of 1903, arranged now in book form. Its main plea for a more scientific attitude of mind in dealing with religious questions and laying the bases of conviction, all thinkers of the more liberal schools of theology will cordially second. But that they will see eye to eye with Mr. Waggett in what this involves or in what it leads to is beyond hope.

The chief characteristic of the scientific temper, according to the author, is to be found in a spirit of adventure tempered by a due regard for authority. This is harmless enough; but when the questions arise as to the nature of the authority that may be appealed to in religion and the extent and vitality of its claim, one is forced to join issue with the author, and to declare that he seeks to introduce a dogmatic view of the function of Christ and of the Christian Church which has long been contested, and can by no subtleties find support in scientific teaching or in the truly scientific spirit.

The main characteristics of the scientific spirit are openness of mind and a simple love of truth deeper and stronger than all prepossessions or preconceived notions. The scientific spirit knows no "authority" whatever in the theological sense.

Mr Waggett tells us that "the discipline of natural science begins and continually proceeds by the exercise of authority and the willingness of obedience. Step by step this authority justifies itself. This obedience is rewarded by a personal apprehension of that which was spoken of." And from this he proceeds: "So it is to be in the conflict and in the labour of faith. We put ourselves in the school of Christ who knoweth the Father. . . . We put ourselves in the great Church under his hand. . . . Placing himself antecedently under the command of one who knows, whom he believes to know although he cannot prove that He knows, he shall become convinced of the knowledge of his Teacher by the fact that it is communicated to himself. This is the spirit, as I conceive, of science in religion." The author further elucidates his position in an interesting chapter on "Experience and Dogma." There he asserts: "We gain the conviction of the reality of the whole circle of religious statements only through Christ. . . . it is by considering the nature of the faith which He in fact originated, and the conditions of health in the social body which in fact He founded and sustains" that we gain the experiences "which are known to us as the development, intrinsically single and undivided, of a perfectly simple condition of trust in Jesus Christ, God and man."

It is difficult to understand how a man of such wide reading as the author shows himself to be can seriously make such a statement as: "We gain the conviction of the reality of the whole circle of religious statements only through Christ." Is there no religion, no "circle of religious statements," to be found outside the sphere of Christ's influence? Were there no religious convictions in the world before Jesus lived? How did the writer of Psalm xxiii. or of Psalm ciii., how did Isaiah or Amos or Jeremiah, gain the conviction of the reality of the religious statements they make? Such simple questions shatter the whole contention, and show that it issues from a narrow view of the development of religion. Recently I heard Professor J. Churton Collins declare in a lecture at the University, Birmingham, that a more religious people than the Greeks had never existed. If religious conviction that has worth can come only in the one way, as Mr. Waggett says, then we may brush the Greeks aside as but witnesses to spurious methods of attaining conviction, for they certainly did not get their religion through Christ. It is assumptions such as this that do, and always have done, harm to Christianity, because they link it to the narrowest views of human development, such as the world is now slowly but surely outgrowing.

But to turn to the plea for authority, to justify which the author appeals to scientific procedure. I have said that the scientific spirit knows no authority whatever in the theological sense. Mr. Waggett declares that "the discipline of natural science begins and continually proceeds by the exercise of authority and the willingness of obedience." It does nothing of the kind. It begins and continually proceeds by the exercise of Reason. Science never says, "Believe this first and prove it afterwards." It says, "Prove it and then believe it." Belief is not the prior condition of its proof. The prior condition is simply that the thing be true, and the mind be open and rational. When Mr. Waggett wished to know about Weismann's theory of heredity, he surely did not first accept Weismann as an authority, give in his obedience, and believe what he was told. That condition of mind would have resulted, perhaps, in his being a blind partisan of Weismann, but not in the production of worthy conviction. No, I presume he went to Weismann with as open a mind as possible, asking for information, for proof, and holding his belief as conditional on such proof being forthcoming. That is the scientific spirit. Where it appears in religion it is the ruin of "authorities." It looks for guidance, for teaching, for inspiration, but will brook no laying down of the law even though the promise be held out that all will come right in the end.

And so we do not agree with the author that the scientific temper in religion means an impulse to an antecedent acceptance of the authority of Christ or of his church, though it should mean a new willingness to test his worth as a teacher and inspirer, to prove the value of the principles and ideals for which he stood.

The merit of this little work is, however, great. It is powerful on its side of a great question. It is full of suggestion, and might be studied with advantage by those belonging to more rational schools of thought than the author. It arrests attention, and challenges thought and criticism, which are no mean virtues. The author evidently feels strongly the "pull" of the modern scientific spirit, and one would not be surprised if eventually it drew him far away from his present, as we think, insecure moorings.

J. WORSLEY AUSTIN.

A BOOK WORTH READING.

In an attractive-looking volume entitled "The Unit of Strife," Miss Edith Garrod presents for serious consideration a treatise upon "the struggle for existence," and upon what she herself inside the book calls more correctly "the unit in the strife."* No convenient general term seems to have been agreed upon by English writers descriptive of all the parties to the process of evolution, or to such stages of the process as are accompanied by the survival of the fittest. What name have we which we could apply to a cell, an individual, a family, and a community, to cover them all in their common relationship to the "strife" and change which are carried on in the midst of them? Miss Garrod has felt the lack of such a name, and has suggested "the unit of strife" to supply what is wanted, trespassing for brevity's sake upon the usage of language.

Miss Garrod advocates the advantages of conceiving of "the unit of strife" under several forms, simple or complex, as, for instance, here a cell, and there a group of cells, at this time a family, at that a group of families, until we come to nations and groups of nations. "It is here maintained that when an aggregate of individuals in competition with other individuals or aggregates acts as one unit, that aggregate constitutes the unit in the struggle to exist, whatever be the nature of its parts, or the bonds by which those parts are united."

Having contrived thus to fasten attention upon nations and empires as the most interesting of all "units" in the struggle for existence, Miss Garrod goes on to consider some of the causes which have contributed, and are still contributing, to bring about the progress of human societies. The principal cause of the uplifting of humanity beyond all other species is said to be "the development" in man "of an abstract consciousness." This consciousness has revealed to man "the existence of forces which play about his being," of "laws which he must either obey, or, not obeying, suffer the penalties of disobedience." It has made him realise "his inherited instinct of single-self-seeking as an instinct which he must subordinate to the larger family instinct, and again to the wider tribal and national claims, and again to the claims of the whole human race." It is a consciousness "which has made him resist his instinct of narrow self-insistence as an enemy to all that he can discern of law, of the universe, of God."

For our part, we accept Miss Garrod's finding that "with man, development has thus passed from the purely physical phase to one in which moral cohesion is the triumphant factor." From which point of view she is enabled to illustrate

* By the Rev. P. N. Waggett, M.A. (Longmans, Green & Co. 4s. 6d. net.)

* "The Unit of Strife," by E. K. Garrod. (Longmans, Green & Co., 1905. 3s. 6d. net.)

very clearly the utility of the prophet and the preacher to the process of evolution and the long march of the human race. It is a service for which we owe the writer gratitude. "The obvious and easy way dictated by the single-self-seeking instinct has never been the right way to travel in, and the seers have been hard pressed to make clear to the multitude the need of turning their steps in the more difficult direction of acting for the benefit, not of self only, but of the whole community, which from their heights they have seen to be the only way." The vision of seers themselves has been a thing of development, and it has been accompanied all along the line by that "unknown quantity . . . in human progress," the instinct of self-sacrifice. Miss Garrod sees in self-sacrifice the indication that "a force must be conceived of which works from without man, a force which must be capable of producing effects which no human agency will explain." Enlightened individual instinct may account for self-restraint, but "the leverage of a more far-reaching motive must be sought which will account for action in which self-interest is for the time forgotten; for deeds of self-sacrifice which stir the pulses of all who hear the story of them told; for the willing acceptance by many of life's sorrow and its suffering as instruments, in subduing the instinct of individual self-insistence which continually molests them."

Miss Garrod carries the argument a step further:—"If the development of human communities has been furthered on the part of their members by an apprehension of, and attempt at, co-operation in laws which make for cohesion and growth, then man's faith in the existence of a force which works through law, and his consequent attempt at obedience to law, are shown to have been essential factors in the development of his communities. An agency is brought to bear on conduct which goes beyond a consideration of the profit to be derived by the individual from his own action, an agency the operation of which necessitates a belief in that which man cannot rightly formulate, an obedience, the issues of which he cannot pretend to foresee. He conceives of the nature of that force, of those laws, as his ignorance best permits at any given time, and under his best conception he worships the still unknown God."

Thus, in this thoughtful volume religion and science are bound together. The slender sketch it has been possible to present of the main argument does but scanty justice to the writer's information, and the careful texture by which the chapters are knitted into a whole. It is a pleasure to be conducted on such a steady tide of reasoning. Miss Garrod keeps us in touch with facts, and large views of facts, and brings us to a most hopeful goal. In few minds which treat upon this topic have science and religion made such peace together; religion, she says, has played its part in the evolution of the world, and still has a part to play. Man's faith has thus received confirmation from practice and experiment. "And it seems inevitable also, that towards a higher conception of the Deity and law man's attitude should grow more reverent, that he should become more religious as he grows more wise." P. E. RICHARDS.

SHORT NOTICES.

THE Sunday School Association (Essex Hall) has just issued a folded card, on the face of which is printed "The Bible Library," with the two following quotations: "The Bible is not one book, but a little library of books, or library with various alcoves."—W. C. Gannett. "The Nineteenth century has discovered meanings in the Bible which have never been realised before. It has found the clues to its origin."—J. Estlin Carpenter. Opening the card, one finds drawings of two book-shelves. One shows the Old Testament Library, according to the Jewish arrangement, with three shelves, for "The Law," "The Prophets," and "The Writings" respectively, and the various books arranged on the shelves, with the name on the back of each volume. The second shows the same library, according to modern arrangement. Now there are four shelves, "Ancestral Tradition and Law," with the five volumes of the Pentateuch, "National Tradition and History," "Prophecy," and "Poetry, Wisdom, Romance and Reflection." The Book of Jonah is on the third shelf with the Prophets, but a note adds that it should "in form unquestionably be placed under the head of Romance. In the importance of its teaching, however, it belongs to Prophecy." On the back of the card is a third book-shelf for the New Testament Library. The card is sold for a penny. This graphic way of teaching should be found useful.

We noted recently the admirable use to which the Sunday School Association has been putting the cheap issue of Dr. Drummond's Epistle to the Galatians. A similar cheap edition, in paper covers, is also issued of Mr. Addis's masterly little book on Christianity and the Roman Empire, and also of the two books for younger children, Aunt Amy's Book of Beginnings, Stories from Genesis and how to teach them, and Sunday Flowers and Sunday Hours, by Miss Jennett Humphreys. The price of Mr. Addis's book is 1s. net, the other three are each 6d. net, and this effort to bring the books within reach of a wider public should meet with a warm response, (Sunday School Association, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.)

The Pocket George Macdonald, is a companion to the charming little volumes on R. L. Stevenson and Richard Jefferies, the selection being made by Alfred H. Hyatt. From a line or two to a page in length the selections run, and Macdonald lends himself admirably to such use. There is both prose and verse, and therefore, of course, the lines, "Where did you come from, baby dear?" The shortest of the passages, and not the least pregnant, is "God's ways want God's time." An alphabetical table of contents adds the reference to the work from which each passage is taken. (Chatto & Windus, 16mo., cloth, 2s. net; leather, 3s. net.)

Two editions of Mrs. Browning's Aurora Leigh have been recently issued by Mr H. R. Allenson, the one a popular sixpenny edition, in paper cover, the other a charming little pocket edition, printed on India paper and bound in limp leather (2s. 6d. net), a very welcome memorial of the centenary.

THEORIES OF FELLOWSHIP.

I.

OUR churches seem to be feeling their way towards a clearer statement of their basis of fellowship. Some would rally us round a common name, some round a programme of social reform, some round a common theological creed; others would make the absence of a creed the test of fellowship, and would have individual freedom of thought, word, and deed to be our only uniformity. Some would have us unite for worship in buildings of brick or stone at set times and seasons, some would find our true union in a common spirit of consecration, sending each on errands of love and mercy.

Watchwords may differ, but by the calling of many voices we are being awakened to a new day of closer fellowship. Whether the bond of union be purely spiritual or purely material, or a bond both material and spiritual, it is clear that a closer union of some kind is desired. The call for our fellowship of churches to unite more closely in order to accomplish their work more effectively sounds in our ears as the voice of our common prayer. It is the sincere desire of many earnest souls, and those who give utterance to it reveal themselves as representing nearly all shades of thought amongst us. The very variety of the voices is the surest sign of this. And it were a great pity to let this unanimous desire for closer fellowship pass unfulfilled or even unheeded simply because there is at present no unanimity as to ways and means.

In a case of this kind we should surely think most of the thing we are agreed about. We desire closer fellowship one with another. We must already feel ourselves to be fellow-workers and to be serving a common cause. We feel the helpfulness of our fellowship in times past, and we rejoice in the sense of our comradeship that now is. Something deeper than all our differences draws us together; we have always rejoiced to belong to a religious fellowship in which men and women of widely differing views have ever met together as friends. Few of us would like to have fewer differences; we desire to meet and speak with those who see another side to our own. One of the great privileges of our own religious fellowship lies just in this wide range and variety of thought. It would be a sorrowful gathering for most of us in which we were invited to meet only with those who were pledged to agree about everything. Such a meeting would have no interest. We all value the free meetings of free men and the free expression of varying religious convictions. In all our differences, we are friends, and rejoice in a comradeship that draws together men of very varied characteristics.

In seeking to strengthen this courageous comradeship, and to deepen the power of its religious and practical influence, we are not seeking the beginnings of friendship, but the expansion and growth and culture of it. We do not seek to reconcile inveterate enemies, or to bring opposing forces into line. Our forces are working together already, our extremists on either hand are the distant outposts of a common army, and we are all of us friends and fellow-workers, and have been these many years.

The healthy and vigorous varieties of religious life that find expression amongst us cause us no dismay. Considering the smallness of our numbers there is evidence of real religious strength in the sight of one man here and another there agreeing to stand firmly by convictions which few even of so small a fellowship are able to support them in. It is probably true, though it may also be dangerous, that we admire one another. We reverence the fidelity to truth, the stand for conscience, the staunch rectitude of the men we differ from. If there be many amongst us that are alone with God, we yet all stand by them; they are alone, and yet not alone, amongst us. Our fellowship in religion goes deeper than our differences.

Our desire for closer fellowship is then but a deepening sense of the value of our fellowship. It means that in agreeing to differ we have found ourselves strengthened by the constant sense of a deeper fellowship than that of intellectual agreement. A religious bond has united us in sympathy of spirit, and strengthened us in steadfastness of purpose.

We feel that our own fellowship of churches, even should it be nameless, has certainly not been soulless.

We believe that the spirit which unites us is a spirit not commonly found in other churches; that the bond by which we feel ourselves bound together is one that the rest of the religious world still needs to learn. We hardly like to say so in any way that would cast a slight upon other churches. But, whatever other kinds of religious fellowship there may be, we believe that the fellowship we ourselves enjoy is a fellowship that might be more widely accepted by warring theologians and opposing churches, to the ending of much warfare and the better understanding of the deepest religious truths. The desire to make more effective use of our own fellowship comes to us from our outlook as well as from our inlook.

Did we think of ourselves alone we might desire to go on as we are. Each of our churches has its hands full already with work of its own. Most of our more active members are fully engaged in one way or another in trying to do good in the world. None wishes to abandon the post of usefulness which he has already found. Those who are preaching that all men ought to be Unitarians do not wish this all-important message to be silenced. Others are equally occupied with visiting the sick and the afflicted and carrying food to the hungry. Others are spending their time in the government of the nation, the city, the village, or the household. Others are strenuously at work in the hard endeavour to make commercial life honest, and industry ennobling to all engaged in it. Others are studying complicated social laws, and seeking the right answer to urgent practical problems. Others are engaged in earnest meditation upon the spiritual needs of the human soul, and are our guides in making plain the meaning of the sayings of Jesus and those eternal laws of God which are the same for all men and in all ages. We have all kinds of earnest workers, thinkers, preachers, teachers, and doers.

When we seek closer fellowship with one another we do not seek to make any of these men give up doing the good work they are already engaged in. We recognise that all our differences of opinion and of occupation will continue as before. We shall not all rush together to tear down the Unitarian name; neither shall we all rush together to set it up. We shall not all call in a body upon the invalid nearest our church; we shall not all clamber into the pulpit; but some will visit the sick, some will preach, some will organise outward works, some will give us one kind of advice, and some another. We shall continue to recognise that different kinds of men do different kinds of works. But, busy as we all are, and happy in our hearty fellowship together, yet when we look out upon the world around us we feel that there is a call for us to do a united work. Something more is needed than our individual efforts. The spirit of our fellowship has a message for the world. Somehow or another we are beginning to feel that we have experience of something amongst ourselves which would be of priceless benefit could it become the experience of all mankind. A fellowship of religious sympathy and earnestness which yet allows such wide scope to varieties of theology and to the free play of individual consciences, has surely a message for the whole religious world. It is when we turn our eyes to look out upon the world around us that we feel we ought unitedly to effect something greater than we have effected so far. We ought to spread more widely through the world this glad spirit of religious fellowship. We ought to make it clear that though men differ in their beliefs and in their theories and in their methods of work, they may yet be closely knit together in the spirit of religious fellowship. If the differences amongst us are great, do they not epitomise, as it were, the world-wide experience of divergence between man and man, and of conflicting creeds as between one church and another?

And if we have found a basis of religious sympathy and fellowship which can unite us in one religious community in spite of such divergences, have we not discovered something that the whole world is in need of? Is not this one of the feelings uppermost in our thoughts when we tell one another that we have a message for the world?

IS THE FREE LENDING LIBRARY AN UNMIXED BLESSING?

Of late the free lending library has been much in evidence. It has formed the particular vehicle to convey the public bounty of a modern millionaire who appears almost more anxious to give than folks will accept. Many districts have their Carnegie Library. It is frequently one of the handsomest buildings in the neighbourhood. To use an expression, there has been and is now "a boom" in libraries.

We have discussed the subject from many points of view—even the reading one. Our local pride has been increased, our suburban patriotism has risen many degrees. Life without a £2,000 to £5,000 library is simply unthinkable. We pity ourselves for the anterior days; we wonder how we existed. And yet, amidst much pardonable exultation, a still small voice breaks in upon us and dares to inquire if the free lending library is altogether an unmixed blessing.

It is said that in olden days there was a position filled by one called the devil's advocate, whose special mission it was to endeavour to discover flaws in an apparently flawless character. Perhaps even the library question may, upon inquiry, be seen to admit of some criticism.

At the opening of a Carnegie Library some little time ago, a well-known clergyman was heard to say, "I wonder if it would not be better for folks to endeavour to collect little libraries for themselves." Of course, this was said sotto voce—many good things are—but, none the less, there is much solid truth in it.

The pride and joy of possession, or, as the children say, "one's very own," strikes deep at the roots of self-respect, a self-respect applied to the intellectual as much as to the material. Given the thinking man or woman, a personal library would appear to be the most natural thing in the world. "My library," "My bookshelf," "My literary store" are terms one loves to use and also to hear. The cost is not the difficulty—or, rather, the cost in cash—inclination, will, and appetite are the chief factors.

Books are cheap to buy, but are dear to appreciate. Your Carnegie Library should but stimulate the desire to amass. It provides the means for the individual to secure the end. Somehow, one wants, or ought to want, to be on very familiar terms with one's books. They should not be regarded as so many lodgers here for so many days and then away for ever. Books must be admitted into one's family circle with the idea of becoming permanent members.

A really good book does not choose to give of its best in fourteen days. It says in so many words that its sterling worth can only be revealed by time and acquaintance. Fancy "Sesame and Lilies" being understood in a fortnight!

Besides, the education of the reader has to be considered. The work which at one time only appears to be the production of a distorted mind is seen at last to contain pearls of wisdom. Man is a creature of the relative. The volume which the schoolboy holds in great derision and treats with scant ceremony, becomes, or may become, an idol of his maturer years.

We purchase books sometimes because it is respectable to do so. Our friends recommend certain authors, and, with a view to maintain our intellectual reputation, we order them—to remain on our shelves unhonoured and unread. But the day comes when we commence to appreciate; then it marks an epoch in our education.

The free lending library is apt to minister to the caprice, whim, and humour of the occasional intellectual mood. There lies a danger in this, for, after all, system and plan in reading are worthy of recognition. The law of continuity may have its drawbacks—or shall we say burdens?—but progress follows by due obedience.

One's own little library, to again use the phrase, does mark out a line of development. To watch the growth in a garden or in a child is attended with exquisite interest, especially if one or the other comes under personal supervision: The same may be said with reference to our shelves. The slow but certain addition causes the keenest delight. Each newcomer seems to herald a new advancement. We grow upon what we feed on. Perhaps the most potent argument for the plea of ownership as opposed to tenancy lies in the fact that the chief value of a book consists in yielding to research: We are continually referring to the past in order to throw light on the present. In 1905 one wants to know what happened in 1805. You read Justin McCarthy's "History of Our Own Times" (not covering a very long period), and you close the book feeling that nothing is more true than that "history is always repeating itself." An intuition impresses one that during the succeeding years intrigues, plots, cabals, now in one form and now in another, will bear much resemblance to those which in the past fifty or sixty years have actually occurred. To take down a book which you have not opened for the last five or ten years, to successfully verify a fact or to point a moral, is truly a triumph of the intellectual storehouse. One finds as the years roll on that life seems to run very much on parallel lines, so much so that an event in itself possesses only half its significance until the complement arrives. Our reading shares this experience. We are struck with this or that passage and think we understand it, but frequently we have to wait for the key in another rendering—then the flash of intuition reveals the whole. Books play many parts in their services to us. Our dispositions require various literary prescriptions. One does not want to always depend upon the memory of a book; one goes to a book to find one's memory. There are books to which instinct guides us; refreshment, solace, censure, encouragement, restfulness, are all involved. It is the real tangible possession of a group of literary treasures which ensures companionship.

The personal and private library need not be an expensive luxury; a few shillings will secure some of the classics of ancient and modern times. A systematic collection—say, one book per month—will shortly produce the nucleus of a good store. It is not the quantity, it is the quality which at all matters.

One would not like to be thought ungrateful for the existence of the free lending library, but it has seemed only right and proper to call upon each thinking man or woman not to be satisfied till personal possession has become an absolute fact.

THE Choral Competition held by the London Sunday School Society at Essex Hall has for years been doing good work by quickening interest in good singing in the schools. This year's competition, it will be seen from the advertisement in another column, is to be held next Saturday (March 31). Both the competition and the concert afterwards should attract a large audience.

MEN in deep reverence do not talk to one another, but remain with hushed mind side by side. Each one feels, though he cannot tell how it is, that words limit what faith declares unlimited.—Martineau.

MADAME JESSIE HILLEBRAND.

[The writer is indebted to "La Mara," Leipzig, and to Signor Pratesi, Florence, for much of the following compilation. Mme. Hillebrand, many of our readers will remember, belonged to the family of the Norwich Taylors, who were so closely associated with the Octagon Chapel. Her father was Dr. Martineau's second cousin. Her aunt, Emily Taylor (1795-1872), and her great-uncle, John Taylor (1750-1826), are both known as hymn-writers. Another great-uncle was the Philip Taylor to whom Dr. Martineau went as colleague, at the beginning of his ministry, in Dublin. Her great-great-grandfather was the noted Dr. John Taylor (1694-1761), author of the Hebrew Concordance, who was minister of the Octagon Chapel when it was opened in 1756, and afterwards divinity tutor at the Warrington Academy. Her father's cousin, Edward Taylor (1784-1863), son of John Taylor the younger, was the Gresham Professor of Music.]

MANY will join in regretting the loss of this remarkable woman. Distinguished by genius, education, musical gifts, and enthusiasm for everything beautiful, she was intimately acquainted with the most prominent musicians of her time, and was especially bound by warm friendship to both Liszt and Bülow.

The only child of the late Mr. Edgar Taylor, a prosperous London solicitor of literary tastes, translator of Grimm's delightful fairy tales, her birth is the subject of a congratulatory letter to the father, in which Ugo Foscolo, the Italian poet and refugee, seems to foresee in her cradle the great love of this English lady for Italy and Florence, where she lived half a century, and where she has died almost an octogenarian, May 8, 1905.

Born on December 27, 1826, she had the misfortune, as a girl of 12, to lose her father. In the following year she was taken by her mother for educational purposes to Dresden, where she formed one of the happiest friendships of her life. Thither, also, came young Hans von Bülow, in 1842, who took his first pianoforte lessons in her company from Frl. Schmiedel. In August of that year Jessie and her mother left Dresden for Italy, and at this time she probably paid one of her periodical visits to Norfolk. In 1844, in her nineteenth year, she married M. Laussot, a merchant of Bordeaux, passing the winter of 1845 with her friends in Dresden during her husband's business travels in Russia. Finally separating from him, she lived first in Stuttgart with her mother, and then removed her friendly home to Florence, where countless Germans and friends of every nationality enjoyed her hospitality.

In glancing through these past fifty years of her life, it seems like a beautiful tale woven with the purest love aided by the Muses. Her unceasing works of kindness were not only prompted by warmth of heart, but guided by wisdom, and enhanced by her artist-soul. Quick to see the intrinsic worth of character, she did not take tinsel for gold, or cultivate barren ground; she did not tolerate judgments lightly formed, and she forgave everything but falsehood and deceit.

Herself a most learned musician, she took the greatest pleasure in educating necessitous students, who, thanks to her aid and instruction, were able to earn their own livelihood; and some of these whom she sent on as worthy pupils to Liszt and Bülow, for instance, Buonamici and Sgambati, became eminent artistes. She wrote and published, under the name of Alibrandi, a learned manual of music. About the year 1865 she founded, and for many years directed, a musical association called the Cherubini Society, whose chief aim was the cultivation of choral singing, and which gave excellent concerts for benevolent purposes in the Philharmonic Hall of the Pagliano Theatre. Much beautiful music that had been forgotten, or very little known, was revived by her. She promoted the knowledge of Cherubini's music, and had it performed by her choir in the fine hall of the Palazzo Rinuccini; she presented his works to the Musical Institute of Florence; she got the Syndics' permission for a memorial tablet to be affixed to the house of the great Maëstro, and induced them to have one of the streets of the city named after him. Thus bestirring herself, she courageously bade defiance to every hindrance encountered, even to her own individual trouble of deafness, and rendered great service by the elevation of artistic taste and the diffusion of German music in the city on the Arno. Especially did she come bravely forward with the works of Liszt, at that time treated with almost universal hostility, persistent even though the master himself advised against bringing them out. Certain it is that without Madame Laussot's arduous preparatory musico-educational work Bülow would not have found in Florence a position for the productive activity satisfying to himself, when, shaken in the foundations of his inner and outer existence, he took refuge with her, turning his back on the German Fatherland. Her very soul seemed to be steeped in music. As her English countryman, the early-deceased Walter Bache, one of the truest and most disinterested of Liszt's pupils, expressed it, "he had never known a woman who was so thorough and through a musician." Who, indeed, could have been more justified in this opinion than he, who like Sgambati and Buonamici, honoured her as the artistic adviser and motherly friend who had pointed out the right course for him and had brought him to Liszt and Bülow? An astonishing perception as to the kind and the strength of endowment of youthful musicians rendered her especially capable of the part of an adviser, and her kind heart did not lack the love of humanity and the noble patience requisite for the fulfilment of this part. A never-refusing readiness to help seemed inborn in the composition of this marvellous woman, and it was rather her pride to give her best strength in support of women's earnest work.

Her sound judgment led her to admire the finest literature—Shakespeare, Goethe, Schiller, Dante; Homer and Sophocles, whose works she read in Greek (which she first began to study in her 40th year) were her favourite authors. She translated into English Schopenhauer's monograph "On the Fourfold Root of the Principle of Sufficient Reason," published in London by George Bell.

After the summer of 1879, when the death of Monsieur Laussot left her free again, his widow entered into a second and extremely happy marriage with the distinguished historian Karl Hillebrand. He was a man of profound knowledge and of universal cultivation, an uncommon nature, at once attracting through the outward beauty which harmoniously accorded with the fine grace of intellect and nature of his wife. Born in 1829, in Giessen, he had taken part in the insurrection in Baden in 1849, and had to atone for his longings after freedom as a prisoner in Rastatt. But he succeeded in finding ways and means of escape with a companion of his imprisonment. Under cover of a dark night, unseen by the watch, they managed to scale walls and palisades, to swim through moats, to crawl through sewers, and at last, swimming, to cross the tide of the Rhine until a ferry-boat happily landed them on the French shore. The bullets sent after them by the German peasants could no longer reach the fugitives. Hillebrand remained in France, first in Paris, then, from 1863 to 1870, in Douai, teaching as a professor. The Franco-German war obliged him to seek a new home. One was offered to him in the house where his friend Madame Laussot lived with her aged mother, until finally they formed but one family. The belated wedded happiness was, alas, but of brief duration. Dr. Hillebrand was struck down by consumption in 1884, when little over fifty, whilst working at his "History of France, from the time of Louis Philippe to the year 1870." After his death Madame Hillebrand supervised the publication of the new German edition of all her husband's works.

The fruit of such a life spent in noble deeds did not fail to show itself in her last years, widowed and sad as they were; in the quiet dignity with which she bore the almost total loss of hearing, the sense from which she had derived her chief enjoyment, by awakening on her magical pianoforte the grand harmonies of the great German and Italian masters. That pianoforte, through which the spirit of Beethoven, Mozart, and Cherubini communed with her, she closed for ever when deafness completely isolated her from the world of sound. The beautiful sunny nature, "full of fun, and life and energy, everlastingly doing kindnesses," and giving richly of her sympathy to all who claimed it, bore this last trial with the noble patience which had characterised her life. On the eve of her death she wished to see once more, with the eyes that saw no longer, the pretty little rambling hill, Monte Oliveto, which had delighted her husband, and which she had looked on for so many years with ever fresh pleasure, from her windows in the Lung' Arno, in that house near the woods of the Cascine—a house of genial and generous hospitality, where the élite of intellect were wont to meet, and which is closed for ever to her old and unforgetting friends. Now she also has followed the Great Ones who went before her, walking there above in Light, so to harken to the Harmony of the Spheres.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

ALTHOUGH we believe that Christianity is the best and truest form of religion the world has ever seen, we must recognise that in every other great religion, also, there are true and helpful thoughts. And in every nation, God has raised up good and beautiful characters, who have tried to serve Him faithfully, and so have helped others to do the same, for, as Longfellow says—

"Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our live sublime."

I am going to tell you to-day about one of the true and beautiful thoughts in the Mohammedan religion, which is believed in by millions of people, and whose Bible is called the "Koran." They believe in one great God, as we do, but they call Him by the name of Allah, which in Arabic means "The God." Their great teacher and prophet was Mohammed, who was born 571 years after Christ; Mohammed wrote a great part of the Koran, which also contains stories from the Jewish Scriptures and many Eastern legends. The Koran speaks of the "ninety-nine beautiful names of Allah," each name describing one of his qualities, such as the "Merciful," the "Good," the "Forgiver," the "Help in Peril," and many others, all showing how loving and wise they believe Him to be. Among their religious observances, they are taught to pray at stated hours, five times every day, and as each prayer time comes round, wherever they are, they spread on the ground the praying mat, which they carry about with them, and, with their faces turned towards their sacred city of Mecca, they kneel and repeat the prayer appointed for that hour of the day.

Sir Edwin Arnold has written a book containing some beautiful poems, in which he describes the "ninety-nine beautiful names of Allah," giving some story or legend as an illustration of each.

One of these "names" is the "Compassionate," and the poem about it, tells how He is compassionate to both great and small. It begins—

"'Tis written that the serving-angels stand
Beside God's throne, ten myriads on each hand,

Waiting, with "wings outstretched, and watchful eyes,

To do their Master's heavenly embassies."

And a few lines further on we read—

"Neither is any creature, great or small, Beyond His pity, which embraces all."

In illustration of this we are told how Solomon, who was King of Israel about 1,000 years B.C., had been victorious in some battle, and among the spoils of war which he had taken from the enemy, were a thousand beautiful war-horses, "with nostrils all a-flame, and limbs of swiftness." These splendid horses were "led for Solomon's delight before the palace," where he could see them, and he was so engrossed with the sight, that for the time he forgot everything else.

Now, while this grand parade of horses was going on, a little yellow ant, which had been out gathering food for her young ones in the nest, had been caught in a storm, and, worn out with her long journey and her load, could not stand against the heavy rain, and was in danger of perishing under a tree which had fallen flat on the slope of the mountain side. God sees everywhere, so He saw the poor little ant, as well as King Solomon, and He saw that they both needed help, for the King was in danger of forgetting that the sun was sinking, and his "sunset-prayer," which was one of the five prayers to be offered by everyone each day, had not been begun; and he needed something to remind him of this duty.

Now the poem shall tell the rest of the story, which should help us to remember how "God's tender mercies are over all his works."

"Thus it is written; and moreover told
How Gabriel, watching by the Gates of Gold,

Heard from the Voice Ineffable this word
Of twofold mandate uttered by the Lord:
'Go earthward! pass where Solomon hath made

His pleasure-house, and sitteth there arrayed,

Goodly and splendid—whom I crowned the King—

For at this hour my servant doth a thing
Unfitting: out of Nisibis there came

A thousand steeds with nostrils all a-flame
And limbs of swiftness, prizes of the fight;
Lo! these are led for Solomon's delight,
Before the palace, where he gazeth now,
Filling his heart with pride at that brave show;

So taken with the snorting and the tramp
Of his war-horses, that Our silver lamp
Of eve is swung in vain, Our waning sun
Will sink before his sunset-prayer's begun;
So shall the people say, 'This King, our lord,

Loves more the long-maned trophies of his sword

Than the remembrance of his God!' Go in!

Save thou my faithful servant from such sin.

Also, upon the slope of Arafat,
Beneath a lote-tree which is fallen flat,
Toileth a yellow ant who carrieth home
Food for her nest, but so far hath she come
Her worn feet fail, and she will perish, caught

In the falling rain; but thou, make the way naught,

And help her to her people in the cleft
Of the black rock!

The Presence, and prevented the King's
sin,

And help the little ant at entering in."

God our Father knows when we all need help, and has many ways of sending it. Sometimes it is we who need it, and he puts it into the hearts of others to give it us, a word of encouragement when we are depressed, or of comfort when we are sad, or of reminder when we are tempted. Sometimes God uses us to send a message by to someone else. What we have to do is to try, as Dr. Martineau says, in one of his beautiful prayers—to have "eyes to see, and ears to hear, and hearts to respond" to God's messages, whenever and however they may come to us.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR SERVICE.

REPORTS of the annual meetings of the Manchester Domestic Mission, the Belfast Domestic Mission, and the Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, which is the lineal descendant of the first of our Domestic Missions established in England, appear in our present issue. They bear witness to the fact that this work among the people in the poorest quarters of our great cities is still animated by a vital religious energy, and faith that the work is needed as much at ever. It is a progressive life that one sees active at these centres of religious fellowship and service, ready to adapt itself to the actual needs of the time, and eager to go forward, if only the means placed at its disposal will allow.

For the Mansford-street Mission in particular the past year has been notable by reason of the building of the fine new club rooms, with the new front in Blythe-street, and one must rejoice that work, animated by a spirit of such devoted and happy fellowship and brotherly kindness, should receive this recognition, and the ampler equipment which was essential to further growth.

In Manchester it will be seen that there is need for further extension, and from all the Missions the cry for more helpers is perennial. Let it be remembered always that this is not merely a delegated work. It is the work of the churches, not only to furnish the material means, but personal help in the many kinds of beneficent activity which centre in the Missions, and for this they ought to accept direct responsibility. There is no work richer in the promise of blessing, both to those who give and those who receive, none that will more surely quicken the faith and refresh the heart of those who will give themselves in singleness of purpose and brotherly sympathy to its accomplishment.

There are endless opportunities for helpful service. Let those who doubt it ask of any one of the missionaries: Teachers are constantly needed, and the clubs for men and boys, the women's meetings, recreative classes for the girls, temperance, provident, and guild work, invite many kinds of help, in frank, unpatronising friendliness. As examples of such openings, here are two needs mentioned in Mr. GORDON COOPER'S Mansford-street report. "The Children's Hour," which a friend used to hold to the intense joy of many little children, has had to be given up because of her continued ill-health, and no one at the moment could be found to take her place. But before next winter comes round surely some one will take up this happy task for the little ones. And there was also a girls' drilling class, started a few years ago, which this year the teacher has been unable to resume. Not one of the missions but can offer plenty of such openings for willing helpers, and we note again from Mr. COOPER'S report this reference to the work of the Provident Bank:—"The work of this society is not by any means limited to the mere collecting of money. . . . Much good is done by these friendly visits to the homes of the people." It is a simple and natural way of coming close to the realities of life among the poor, and of finding opportunities for the exercise of true and understanding sympathy, which cannot be too highly prized. Often in such work it is the people visited who are themselves unconsciously the teachers and the helpers of burdened lives.

BELFAST DOMESTIC MISSION.

THE annual services on behalf of the Mission were preached on Sunday, March 11, by the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, of Bury; in the morning in the First Presbyterian Church, and in the evening in All Souls' Church.

The annual meeting was held on the following evening, in All Souls' Church. Dr. John Campbell presided, and there was a large attendance of friends and supporters of the Mission.

The committee's report, which was read by Miss C. Bruce, the hon. secretary, referred to the hopeful spirit pervading the work carried on at the Mission by Mr. and Mrs. Slipper and their helpers. As to funds, it was pointed out that the useful balance in the Savings Bank became smaller each year, as sums had to be taken from it to supplement the income, but it was not yet exhausted. The provident fund collected during the year was £295 13s. 11d.; paid out, £299 1s. 6d.; in Savings Bank, £43 4s. 3d. The committee regretted the loss of an old and valued friend in Sir Robert Lloyd Patterson, who had ever been a tried and generous supporter of the Mission. A letter had been received from Mr. Slipper announcing that he had been invited to become minister of Moneyrea, and tendering his resignation of the post of missionary.

The accounts, presented by the treasurer, Mr. Robert Dickson, showed an expenditure beyond income of over £20.

The Rev. G. J. SLIPPER, the missionary, in his report, said that during the past year the enthusiasm of all who helped him in the various branches of the work had been loyally maintained, and a very deep debt of gratitude was due to the band of ladies and gentleman who had supported his efforts and shown an unflagging interest in the promotion of the spiritual and social aspects of the Mission's aim. One pleasing feature of their success was the faithfulness and steadfast loyalty of the young people who had grown up in their midst. Some new families had been gained by their personal visitation and interest. The immediate neighbourhood round about the Mission had changed very much during the past few years. The people who were living in the streets around were, mostly Roman Catholics, who, of course, did not encourage house-to-house visitation. But the workers had gone further afield, and their parish had no bounds. Every opportunity was embraced by which they might reach the poor, and, ever keeping before them the aims for which their work was promoted, they laboured steadily on in the cause of ameliorating their conditions and bringing the Gospel of Christ into practical service on their behalf. During the past year they had been singularly free from that extreme stress of poverty which was so apparent in former years. Work amongst the labouring classes who were willing to work had been more steady, and they had not been troubled quite so frequently by that class of poor who ranked amongst those known as the unemployable.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report, bore testimony to the excellent work done at the Mission, and proceeded to speak of the character of the Christian work of redemption and the prevention of sin, dwelling upon the special subject dealt with in his essay published in last week's INQUIRER.

Dr. MELLONE, who seconded the resolution, said that the work of the Mission had never been more efficiently done than during Mr. Slipper's ministry.

Rev. E. D. PRIESTLEY EVANS said the Mission was a useful, a beneficial, and noble work, and one that deserved every encouragement. In the course of his speech, which was much appreciated, he pointed out that if, as Unitarians, they had advocated freedom, it had been with one object only—not that men should become unrestrained, but in order that they might obey the highest of all powers. He believed that if they had reached the height of progress, there was still another duty left, and that was to maintain that progress, because there was always a danger of falling away from the height of righteousness which had been reached. If they were to maintain the level to which they had reached, it was necessary that they should do their utmost to attend upon religious services.

The motion was passed unanimously.

Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND moved a resolution acknowledging the cordial way the work of the Mission had been supported, expressed sincere regret at the withdrawal of Rev. G. J. Slipper, and wished him and Mrs. Slipper much happiness and prosperity in their new field of labour. He referred in the highest terms to Mr. Slipper's work as Missionary during the past seven years in the city. Mr. Slipper had won a position of respect and usefulness for himself, and had made a great many friends,

He hoped wherever Mr. and Mrs. Slipper might go, they would find an abiding resting-place in the hearts of their people.

Mr. W. T. HAMILTON, in seconding, said Moneyrea's gain would be the Mission's loss.

Miss BRUCE, on behalf of the Ladies' Committee, spoke in warm terms of Mr. Slipper and his wife. The resolution was passed by acclamation.

Mr. SLIPPER, in returning thanks, said it was gratifying to know that his work had met with the approval of the committee.

On the motion of the Rev. J. A. KELLY, seconded by Mr. W. Minnis, the office-bearers and committee for the ensuing year were elected.

Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND having taken the second chair, Mr. W. H. MCFADDEN proposed and Rev. A. O. ASHWORTH seconded a hearty vote of thanks to the chairman, which was cordially passed, and the meeting was closed with hymn and prayer.

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE seventy-second annual meeting of the Manchester Domestic Mission was held in the Town Hall, Manchester, on the 14th inst., the Lord Mayor presiding. The annual report, which was taken as read, spoke of the undiminished zeal and earnestness displayed in the work during the past year. The special appeal made for £3,500 to extend the premises at both mission stations had been well responded to, £2,800 having been paid or promised. An earnest appeal was made for the balance as well as for increased annual subscriptions, as the regular expenditure exceeded the income by £200. But "the chief need of the Society," the report continued, "is a wider personal interest in its objects and its work. If a real and extended sympathy with the aims of our work could be aroused, financial difficulties would soon settle themselves. In these days when the barriers that separate the poor of our over-crowded towns from their more prosperous fellow-men seem to be growing greater rather than less, the Missions still, as of old, afford to those who wish it the opportunity of bearing the glad message of love and service to suffering and sorrowing humanity."

The separate reports of the missionaries were full of interesting details. At Willert-street friends had raised £100 towards the Extension Fund by means of a sale of work. Sunday and week-evening services had been held, classes of all kinds carried on, and over five hundred scholars instructed in the Sunday-school. There were 78 scholars over 16 years of age, and the school had 400 scholars in average attendance. Recreation in all its forms had been well attended to. Holidays of various kinds had been arranged, from the scholars week at Gt. Hucklow to day trips for the mothers, over 1,000 individual holidays in all having been provided. The Working Men's Club was as successful as ever, and it had contributed £10 to the Extension Fund. The report concluded with a sketch of many new plans of work to be undertaken when the extension of premises is completed.

Renshaw-street, the other Mission, rejoined, in its report, that its structural alterations had given new facilities which had been utilised to the full. Here, too, the services had been regularly carried on as well as the Sunday-school, which has about 300 scholars, 47 of whom are over 16 years of age. There are here also clubs for girls, boys, and young men, singing, dramatic, and drill societies, as well as more recreative clubs, such as cricket, &c. Many holidays had also been arranged, and over 100 scholars had spent a week at Gt. Hucklow.

The LORD MAYOR, in moving the adoption of the reports, expressed his pleasure in welcoming "this ancient institution," which continued to carry out its work in a steady, consistent fashion. The want of funds he regarded as a healthy sign. He urged that the basis of support should be widened. They had, perhaps, depended too much on the rich. The whole trend of events was to place power in the hands of the masses. Why not also responsibility for the carrying on of such work as this? He had no fear that the masses would not be equal to such a demand. He believed the reports and accompanying appeal would prove irresistible if they were carefully studied.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL briefly seconded the resolution, and the reports were adopted, after which the Lord Mayor had to leave and Mr. Steintal took his place in the chair.

Professor CARPENTER moved a resolution, expressing cordial appreciation of the work of the missionaries. No one, he said, who had read the reports could fail to feel the breadth and variety of the work that was being done. He was glad to see in both reports indications that the pressure of unemployment was less than in the previous year. The public conscience was becoming more sensitive on this matter. We were being gradually awakened to the tremendous realities of our modern life, and more conscious of our responsibilities in regard to the lot of the poor. Speaking on details of the reports, he was glad to see the place held by the Sunday-schools, and by their success in retaining their elder scholars in a way he feared they failed to do in the South. He was particularly pleased that so much had been done in providing the "priceless gift" of real holidays for so many children and others. If he might venture a suggestion, he would urge the extension of temperance work. They ought to take a strong line on this, and he especially commended for study among their young people the excellent lectures now being promoted by the United Kingdom Alliance. On the whole, he found the work at the Mission was rather educational than redemptive, although education itself, of course, was redemptive. The work of keeping those who had been gathered in left little time for going to the mass outside. But someone had to do this work, and he was glad to testify to the efficiency of the Salvation Army and other agencies in regard to it. They themselves, however, ought to take a part in it. They must never despair, but go back to the great conception of Jesus, who said: "All souls are mine, mine to train, to redeem, to perfect." They had restored the conscience to its natural activity, and it was the instinct of righteousness in their souls by which the response would be made, if the appeal was rightly put. They were able to appeal to the drunken father, the slatternly mother, and the disobedient children—"be ye perfect for your own sake, for God's and the world's sake," for the accomplishment of which God set before them the opportunity of an endless life. The State was now beginning to say, "all souls are mine," and to realise new responsibilities to the aged, the young, and the poor. Consequently, statecraft was becoming more difficult, and there was increasing need of a clear grasp of the facts. They required more knowledge and closer insight into the things which were happening at their very doors. The church must incorporate the new social science in its work. The Church could do what no other agency could accomplish. It was for the Church to inspire and stir up the power of sacrifice which would be needed for the carrying out of their ideals. The Church must generate the force of self-sacrifice, and insist that for every moral wrong there was a moral remedy. God's power was in their midst calling them to be the agents of His mercy and grace, and only as they responded and gave themselves to unselfish work for others would they find their own true life.

Councillor T. R. MARR, in seconding the resolution, said he had frequent opportunities of seeing the work at Willert-street, and he could testify that they were there really helping to build that city of God of which Augustine dreamed.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL having heartily endorsed the resolution, it was carried with acclamation.

The Rev. J. W. BISHOP, in responding, gave some impressive details of his work, showing how much of the best side of it could never be expressed in any printed report. Discussing the value of the work, he took strong exception to a statement recently made by a brother worker in the home mission field that, after all they were only dealing in palliatives. He insisted rather that all else was palliative and this only the true remedy. As they touched the springs of character their work became redemptive and real, as he had often seen in the changes wrought in homes and lives brought within the range of the Mission's agencies and its gospel of healing love.

The Rev. A. W. TIMMIS assured the meeting that no appeal to realise the importance of temperance work could be necessary for anyone who knew the districts in which their work lay. If there had appeared to be any slackness, for his part, it was only because he was seeking and promoting something more effective than the ordinary Band of Hope, which too often was only a place of mere amusement. He promised in his next report to give some account of the working of this more vigorous temperance agency. Were it possible he would gladly go further and spend and be spent in the redemptive work of which Professor Carpenter had spoken. But if the Mission was to be maintained as a real religious home for the teeming life of young and old gathered about it, he must necessarily deny himself and stay at his post to see that what had been won was not lost again.

Among the subsequent speakers were Mr. G. H. Leigh and the Revs. C. T. Poynting, N. Anderton, and Charles Peach.

MANSFORD-STREET CHURCH AND MISSION.

THE annual meeting of the Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal-green, was held at Essex Church, Kensington, on Wednesday evening. The choir was taken by Mr. W. Wallace Bruce, L.C.C., and there was a fair attendance of friends and supporters of the Mission; but a good many absences through ill-health and other causes. Mr. Stanton Preston, Miss Louisa Jones, the Treasurer, and the Rev. F. K. Freeston all wrote expressing their great regret that they were unable to be present, and their deep interest in the work.

Mr. J. CLASSON DRUMMOND read the Committee's report, and, in the absence of the Treasurer, presented the balance-sheet. He also delivered a message of warm greeting from Mr. Stanton Preston, his co-secretary.

The report recorded a year of successful work and steady progress. The new buildings in Blythe-street had been completed and formally opened, and added greatly to the efficiency of the Mission, bringing it for the first time, through the club, into constant and close touch with a large number of men residing in the district. The outside of the buildings had been thoroughly repaired, and the cost, about £120, would have to be defrayed during the current year. The report recorded the Committee's high appreciation of the conscientious devotion with which Mr. Cooper had carried on the work of the Mission, and the ready sympathy he extended to all helpers, and concluded as follows:—

"The Committee would appeal again most earnestly for more help; larger premises mean more expenses, but they also mean much greater possibilities of doing good work. Probably never before has the public conscience been so aroused as to the difficulties and the struggles of the poor; our work is to help these; it is to try and lighten their burdens and to bring more brightness into their lives that we ask for further subscriptions, and, above all, for more men and women who will devote some of their leisure to this most truly Christian service."

The chapel committee's report recorded a membership of ninety-seven, and the adoption of the "New Hymnal," attendance at evening service well maintained, and hearty congregational singing; and then gave particulars of the manifold work carried on in the Mission, concluding as follows:—

"To all the many helpers your Committee offer their sincere thanks. The opportunities for good work were perhaps never greater than they are now; we are enlarging our borders. The Guild has brought us into contact with the blind and the lame; the Clubs are bringing in our midst many that years ago we seemed to have no chance of getting into fellowship with. Let us see that we are able to give a good account of our stewardship, and that our actions as a Church, and as individuals, shall be such that dark homes will be brightened, those that sorrow will receive comfort, and that even those who are joyful will feel that their joy is more full because of the existence of our Church and Mission."

The report of the minister, the Rev. Gordon Cooper, opened with a grateful reference to the immense gain to the Mission of the fine new club rooms, the opening of which had made the past year memorable. Mr. Cooper mentioned that he had been made a manager of the group of schools in the Mission district, and had joined the C.O.S. committee, taking special interest in the work of a sub-committee on "Thrift and Skilled Employment." The men's club had made real progress. It had a membership of 96, and was steadily growing. The Preston Club for younger men and the Garrett Club for boys were also prospering, and the happiest spirit of friendliness and sympathy prevailed among the members of the clubs and those who went down to help. The Mothers' Meeting, the Young Women's Circle, and various classes for girls had also been well maintained, but a girls' drilling class and the "Children's Hour" were in abeyance until new helpers could be found. Two new visitors had undertaken provident visiting, and the nine districts had now regular weekly visitors. The afternoon Sunday school was full to overflowing, but a teacher was still needed for the senior class of young men, which was of great promise. Much other good work was referred to, and finally the real help received from the students of Manchester College, Oxford, one of whom came down to the mission for each week end during term.

The Treasurer sent some notes referring to the accounts, and mentioned that for the first time the Mission had been rated at about £30, which was an extra charge that would in future have to be met, while the growing work inevitably brought increased expenditure. The deficiency of £41 10s. 6d. on the Blythe-street Hall building account of £1,265 5s. 2d. would be met by selling out stock. The cost of repairs to the outside of the building, of about £120, had been actually paid (as the building contract included a deferred payment next June of £200), but it would only appear in next year's account. It would be necessary to sell stock for at least £160. On the general account, with a total of £430 4s. 1d., the deficit of £28 14s. 9d. was slightly increased, to £29 19s. 3d. Subscriptions amounted to £271 2s. 6d., donations to £36 8s. 6d., collection at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, £24 6s. 6d. There was a falling off in the annual subscriptions, &c., of £7 18s. 6d., almost exactly balanced by the interest on Mr. Thornely's legacy, but it was to a large list of annual subscribers that they must look for their main support, and she appealed once more for new subscriptions.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, congratulated Mr. Gordon Cooper and the committee on the success of their efforts. It was specially gratifying to hear that he was getting hold of the men of the district. His own experience of the last fourteen years, which had thrown him a good deal among the leaders of the working men, had convinced him that while the advances of science and progressive philosophy had led them to abandon the old doctrines in which they had been brought up, and they themselves thought they were without religion, that was not really so. If they only knew it, their religion was very much that of Jesus of Nazareth. What touched them was the need for the bettering of the condition of the people. They saw the present evils of society, the slums, the unhealthy houses, the dullness and dreariness which led to drink, and they gave themselves up to the endeavour to overcome those evils. Therefore, though they thought they were without religion, those men were as good Christians as they were themselves. One of the great difficulties in that very imperfect London of theirs was that North and East and South there were vast regions of mean streets, where life was exceedingly dull. In the West they suffered from too many interests and too much excitement, and often longed for more quiet, but in those other quarters, from sheer dullness, after their monotonous work, men longed for a little excitement, and had usually to seek it in what they regarded as their club, the public-house, where they must pay for their footing by drinking, as they well knew, more than was good for them. It was one of the great advantages of their club down at the Mission that it met that evil; those excellent rooms were a great gain. And so Mr. Cooper had an opportunity of getting hold of the men, and his problem was to lead them to see that there was religion in harmony with their own thought, and to draw them to the church. It was a great evil in London that the classes were so far apart from one another. Yet nothing was so interesting as human nature. And if, with the improved means of locomotion, they from the West would go East and help to manage the clubs and share in the work, they would find it of exceeding interest, and there were no people more loyal and thankful to those who showed them genuine sympathy than the people of East London. That was his own experience, and he hoped that more of their friends would go and take part in that work.

Mr. ALFRED THOMPSON, one of the workers at Mansford-street, in seconding the motion, said they were very fortunate to have that splendid set of buildings, and very grateful to those who had helped to provide them. Now their need was of new life to be brought in by people of more culture and leisure, and opportunities of seeing life at its best. That was what would help them most of all. He remembered in his own childhood seeing Dr. Drummond, Mr. Carpenter, and Mr. and Mrs. Odgers and others, who came to the Mission, and what new impulse it gave to his life. Such influence they needed especially in the Sunday-school. He made a plea also for the decoration of their schoolroom, so that when the children came in out of the streets they might feel that they came into a new atmosphere. They at Mansford-street felt it an immense help to have the link with Oxford, through the Manchester College students, and they were glad that while Mr. Cooper was away on his holiday in Italy they should have Mr. Mellor in charge of the work.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

Mr. EDGAR WORTHINGTON moved the next resolution, rejoicing in the continued growth of the work at Mansford-street, and particularly in the development of the clubs rendered possible by the enlargement of the Blythe-street building, and offering the best thanks to Mr. Gordon Cooper for the keen enthusiasm with which he had devoted himself to the work of his ministry. Mr. Worthington spoke of the need of such missions as theirs, which had arisen out of the wide separation of employers and employed. Whereas, in the old days, an employer lived among his people and worked with them, often with his own hands, and knew all about their lives, now they were far apart, and they had to seek for more artificial means to bring the classes together. The impulse out of which their work had arisen came from America, where Dr. Tuckerman had shown them what a Domestic Mission might accomplish. The value of such work had been quickly recognised in this country, and their missions had done a large amount of good work. He was particularly glad to hear of the success of the clubs, and mentioned the great interest which he had found at a university settlement in Manchester, called forth by the holding of a "Poetry Circle," in which an evening was devoted to some poet, and the members who had been reading their poet during the week each made some contribution to the reading and discussion in the evening. The East-End had a great resource also in the Whitechapel Art Gallery, which through its successive exhibitions, so admirably organised, and the explanatory lectures, was a real centre of art culture, which must be of utmost value to the people who would take advantage of it.

Miss H. BROOKE HERFORD seconded the resolution, and said that Mansford-street stood quite alone in the success of its clubs. Too many missions were a sort of glorified mothers' meeting, but there they had fathers' meetings, too, and it was a great gain. The fine new buildings were, of course, an immense help, but it was to Mr. Cooper, and to the spirit he put into the work, that the success was really due, and they must congratulate themselves on having him there as leader of the work.

The Rev. GORDON COOPER, in acknowledging the resolution, said that on those occasions he always felt he got more than his fair share of thanks. There were many other workers to whom their gratitude was due. The work was undoubtedly hard, and there was plenty of it, something was going on every night of the week; but it was so interesting and fascinating, and so many helpers came to take part in it, that they had no time to think that it was hard. That vote they had passed ought to be divided among them all. He much regretted Mr. Preston's absence, and read a note he had received from him, saying he hoped some day to be with them again, and passing on a message of greeting from the Rev. John Ellis to the Mission workers.

As to the men's club, he had been greatly interested in what Mr. Bruce had said of the working men's religion, for that was what he also had found. When they had some special services at Mansford-street, and some of the men came in, he had found afterward that they had been greatly surprised to discover that there could be another view of religion than that of the orthodoxy they had abandoned. He hoped that as time went on more of the men would be interested in the church. One thing he hoped for was the establishment of a men's meeting on Sunday afternoons. The work had many claims, and he mentioned a special need of the Window Gardening Society for subscriptions towards the coming season's work. At present they had an adverse balance of £3. It was a great pleasure to him that the annual meeting should be held at Essex Church, and he warmly welcomed the growing friendship between the church and Mansford-street.

The Rev. V. D. DAVIS then moved, and the Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS seconded the appointment of the committee and officers.

Mr. RONALD P. JONES in moving a vote of thanks to the Chair, said that Mr. Thompson's plea for the decoration of the school-room was clearly a call to the newly formed Women's Social Club.

The Rev. F. ALLEN seconded, and the Chairman having acknowledged the vote, the meeting terminated.

THE VAN MISSION.

ONE of the best friends of the Van Mission expressed some distrust of the scheme laid before the Missionary Conference last July, because it seemed to be an attempt to provide the machinery before the men were found. The only possible answer was one of faith. You must make a beginning one way or another, and no method is entirely free from criticism. Sometimes there are men with an abounding willingness for work, but the means are not forthcoming. And, on the whole, it is easier to find men than tools—because men have souls. In this particular instance, through the splendid generosity of a venerable lady—who for the present must be known only as "Friend B."—the means were to hand, and if the men were problematical, there could be no harm in trying for them. The result is what might have been expected. Long before the preliminary list of names was exhausted, the necessary staff was obtained. As the rota was gradually filled up and the choice of weeks became limited, a few friends were unable to accept because of prior engagements, but these refusals were accompanied by expressions of regret which encourage the hope that another season may see them in the field with us.

There have been offers of assistance also from laymen, and the next step will be to organise their help. And already the Mission has produced one splendid example of service which more than justifies the anticipation with which the work was started, and is an evidence of that untapped willingness which some sanguine souls believe is ready for consecration if our general methods were less repressive of spontaneity. Mr. Bertram Talbot, of the Highgate Church, London, will travel with the Van during the whole season, relinquishing his post of private secretary to an eminent agriculturist in order to devote himself to the work of the Mission. Mr. Talbot is a frequent writer in our magazines and other papers, and he has compiled an interesting little book on the "History and Growth of the Bible." His offer of voluntary service in addition to the sacrifice of his employment was more than the committee felt themselves justified in accepting, but the arrangement arrived at involves the committee in no addition to an expenditure which at the outset was calculated on the basis that no fees would be paid. The Mission itself will be greatly benefited by the constant presence of one missionary in whose hands the advance and business details will rest, over and above his help in the services.

The Van will arrive in a few days at Summerville, Victoria Park, where the committee of the Home Missionary College have gladly provided quarters for it when not on the road. The vehicle has been obtained on advantageous terms from a Unitarian friend. It is comfortably fitted up, and provides living accommodation for two men. A tent also is provided for additional sleeping space when required. Some gloomy forebodings have been expressed as to the cooking, and as to the sort of fare the temporary chef would be able to set before a possible visitor. But, with a fine instinct, Mr. T. is taking lessons in the preparation of plain meals, and for the rest, he would be a poor parson who couldn't cook a chop. The Van, however, is not large enough for a dinner party, and guests will not be encouraged. Slight alterations have been necessary in order to make a decent platform for the speakers and the harmonium. Over the platform is the legend, "Truth, Liberty, and Religion," and at either side of the Van are ribbons on which are painted the words "Unitarian Van." The name of one of the officers is also inscribed, and to him a hawker's license will be issued, because books will be sold. Space is also provided for announcements.

A large supply of literature will be carried. There will be handbills for distribution, and a series of hymn-papers. The latter have been chosen in preference to hymn-books or display sheets, so that they can be given away. In addition to the hymns and particulars of the Mission, explanatory matter will be printed on the back, so that the double purpose of hymn-paper and tract will be served. Almost certainly in addition there will be a plentiful supply of the best pamphlets, large and small, issued by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, together with copies of the sixpenny reprints, which it is hoped may command a ready sale. Other gifts have been promised, including several hundred copies of Rev. R. T. Herford's sermon entitled "Back to Jesus."

The Van is to start on its journey on May 14, returning to Manchester on September 30. It will not stop in any town where there is a Unitarian congregation, but as far as possible places will be selected near enough to existing churches to permit of neighbourly assistance being rendered. It is hoped that the minister or some member of the nearest churches will preside over the meetings, and that young people of the church and school will attend. By this means existing churches may be interested in missionary work at their thresholds, with results that may not be lost upon their own home work. New friendships also may grow out of this contact, and possibly lead to the formation of Unitarian circles in the places visited, or to the adhesion of corresponding members. In travelling over this new ground, the Mission will seek the co-operation of the neighbouring churches and the goodwill of the missionary associations, which is already practically assured.

Usually two places will be visited in each week. During the day the missionaries will employ themselves in advertising the meetings, seeking friends, and interviewing inquirers. In the evening the service and address will probably be followed by questions and sometimes by discussion. From the outset it has been made clear that controversy will be avoided, emphasis being laid on the grounds and principles of religion, and their relation to citizen ideals and the realities of the common life. Careful reports will be made, and, if acceptable to the papers, weekly articles will be furnished. At the close each missionary will be asked to write a candid impression of the work, its need, its value, and the worth of its continuance.

In the following list are the names of the ministers who will accompany the Van, and a provisional list of the places to be visited. Those marked with an asterisk are near enough to existing churches to warrant the hope that assistance may be forthcoming. Where known at the moment the population is given in brackets, and if an additional 50,000 be added to those places for which figures are not given, it will appear that a population of over 320,000 is to be tapped. The round journey from Manchester is about 180 miles.

Sept. 10-15.—Rev. J. A. Pearson, Luddendenfoot (3,000), Hebden Bridge (7,000).

Sept. 17-22.—Rev. W. R. Shanks, *Walsden, *Littleboro (11,000).

Sept. 24-29.—*Castleton (5,000), *Rhodes.

Rev. W. C. Bowie, secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, has promised to assist in the services as he is able, and several other ministers will attend occasionally.

The men having been found and the machinery decided upon, there is still wanted another £50 to keep the Van moving. No widespread appeal has been made for funds, but it is necessary that all these voluntary services should be supplemented by a sum sufficient to pay for maintenance, horse hire, advertising, and local expenses. If the money is not forthcoming in a week or so, a printed appeal (involving expense) will have to be sent out. Is it too much to hope that the money may be obtained without a canvass. Donations will be acknowledged by T. P. Spedding, treasurer, 91, Tweedale-street, Rochdale.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

SIR,—Most of the services in connection with the Conference will be held in the large hall of the Oxford City Buildings; it is very spacious, and contains a powerful organ. Hence it is very necessary to strengthen our local resources in the matter of singing. I would earnestly beg members of congregational choirs, and other ladies and gentlemen possessing any vocal ability, who may be attending the Conference, and who will help us to form a choir, to send in their names at once to the local secretary Mr. J. W. Cock, 37, Beechcroft-road, Oxford, who will inform them as to arrangements.

J. EDWIN ODGERS,
Chairman, Local Committee.

SOCIAL QUESTIONS.

SIR,—I have been requested to forward for publication in your columns the following resolution, which has been sent in to the National Conference Committee, and, if approved by them, will be moved on Wednesday, April 18, by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, M.A., and seconded by the Rev. Henry Gow, B.A. Its terms are as follows:—"That this Conference approves the formation of a Union the object of which shall be to develop the consciousness of social responsibility among the members of our churches, and to impress upon them the urgent need of (1) careful study of the social problems of modern civilisation, and (2) the undertaking of definite practical work towards their solution."

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

SOUTH-EASTERN COUNTIES.

LIKE all other Assemblies, that of London and the South-Eastern Counties seeks to bring the churches in the district into closer communion with each other, and by practical help and sympathy to strengthen those which are struggling with difficulties arising from financial and other causes. The tendency of many churches is to become absorbed in their own particular interests, and to forget the relation in which they stand to other churches. Each individual church is the centre of a limited circumference in which its first and its most immediate action operates; but it has also relations with a larger outside circle. It is the duty and privilege of each separate community to realise its relationship to other communities outside its own enclosure. In words we readily avow a oneness and sympathy, but how little of real communion is there among our churches, or of exchange among our ministers. Our habits are loose and selfish on these points. More sympathetic and frequent intercourse would be a wise policy. The larger churches should feel such interest in the smaller ones as not merely to acquiesce in the minister visiting them, but urge it upon him, if he requires the stimulus. The more favoured congregations should exercise a little of the grace of self-denial. If they are constantly fed with "the finest of the wheat," they should be willing that others should share to a certain extent in the banquet, who have ordinarily to content themselves with "barley loaves"; though these are good and nourishing diet, under which a healthy, sturdy race has grown up, standing firm to their principles amid persecution and social ostracism.

The various churches in the South-Eastern Counties are steadily and faithfully doing their work amid circumstances which require the exercise of a large amount of faith and patience. Standing as they do for a religion unfettered by creeds and articles of faith, they are thereby isolated from all other religious communities, and excluded from their fellowship. The great religious movements of the age simply take no account of them. The majority of people do not understand what our principles are. They have no conception whatever of the spiritual faith we cherish. They have a vague impression that we believe in nothing, and seek to destroy the faith of others. We have to combat these notions, and by lip and life to prove to the world that ours is a religion which gives freedom to every soul to worship and serve God without the interference of any human authority, and allow nothing to come between the soul of man and the living God.

Several changes have taken place in the Province by the resignation and settlement of ministers. The church at Dover has been fortunate in securing a successor to the Rev. S. Burrows, who had held the pastorate with so much acceptance for twelve years. The present minister, the Rev. C. A. Ginever, received a very enthusiastic reception, and has entered upon his work with every prospect of success. Plans are already under consideration for the erection of a much-needed room in which the various societies can hold their meetings. The church at Southend, which had been supplied by the Assembly since the resignation of Mr. Dear, is now under the care of Mr. Delta Evans (the Editor of the Christian Life). Under his ministry the attendances at the services has been very encouraging. New members have been enrolled, the Sunday-school has received several accessions. At Maidstone the Rev. A. Farquharson has just been welcomed as minister. During his recent temporary charge of the pulpit the congregations have considerably increased, the church being well filled on the Sunday evening. Guildford has, during the past six months, been supplied by the Rev. Clement E. Pike. This temporary arrangement has been very much appreciated by the congregation. Orthodox Nonconformity of the evangelical type is exceedingly strong in the town, so that our Liberal Religion has to contend with prejudices which are deep rooted. Since the settlement of the Rev. Felix Taylor at Richmond, the congregations have steadily grown. Many strangers have been attracted to the services by the special subjects that have been announced from time to time. With the hearty co-operation of the people with the minister, there is every prospect that their beautiful church will have a congregation worthy of the building. The church at Brighton is also doing well under the ministry of the Rev. Priestley Prime. Reading is in a healthy condition, and the ministry of the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor is much appreciated. Tenterden has been deprived of its pastor during the past six months, and has had to depend upon the help of various ministers, the Rev. Harold Rylett having to fulfil an engagement in America, but it is hoped he will shortly resume his pastoral duties. Hastings has a good congregation. A new organ has lately been purchased, the chief part of the cost being borne by Mr. T. Kenward, one of the founders of the church. Horsa-ham has sustained several losses by death. Lewes has suffered from a similar cause. In these country towns it is difficult to fill the vacant places which have thus been created. Chatham, under the vigorous ministry of the Rev. Tyssul Davis has made decided progress. The churches at Newbury, Godalming, Saffron Walden, and Billingshurst are doing a steady, unobtrusive work. The churches at Canterbury and Deal are under the care of the Rev. J. H. Smith. Tunbridge Wells undertakes its own arrangements for the supply of its pulpit, and continues to hold services in the Mechanics' Institute. Halstead, Chelmsford, and Northiam depend upon the Assembly for regular ministerial help.

At the beginning of the year some special Sunday evening services were held at the Central Hall, Seven Kings. The district is a rapidly growing one, close to Ilford. It was felt that, as there were a few Unitarians residing in the neighbourhood, an effort should be made to establish a fresh congregation. The effort met with that measure of success which justified a lengthened series of services. A good deal of enthusiasm has been excited, and several friends have expressed their willingness to co-operate in this movement. A committee has been formed which undertakes the local arrangements. The attendance at the services has averaged from 40 to 50. This is fairly good, considering that the weather has been most unfavourable. Various ministers are rendering help. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association has substantially assisted this movement, which it is hoped, will result in the foundation of a permanent church.

Our work is surrounded with difficulties, but at the same time it is full of grand opportunities which we need to cultivate wisely. What I feel is so much needed in our church is a deeper conviction of the truths we profess to hold. Our religious position in many cases is too undefined. That, some would say, is our glory. Well, it may be; but it is, I believe, a glorying in our weakness. A church that has no certain well-defined beliefs can never be a strong church. It may throw discredit on certain theological problems; but what is needed is something more clear, a well-reasoned, strongly grounded conviction; and when this rules the mind, there will be enthusiastic devotion, and consecrated effort to spread those principles which are dear to our hearts. Men are weary of much that has usurped the name of Christianity; it is our privilege and duty to present to them a religion which will commend itself to the thoughtful mind and the earnest heart.

MINISTERS' PENSION AND INSURANCE FUND.

THE half-yearly meeting of managers was held on Tuesday last. Sympathetic reference was made to the death of Mr. David Ainsworth, one of the trustees of the fund. The lamented early death of the Rev. Richard Lyttle had removed a name from the list of beneficiary members. Mr. Lyttle was insured, not only for a pension, but for £250 at death, which had been promptly paid to his representative. Only three premiums had been paid in this case, which may well be an object-lesson for our younger ministers to avail themselves of the advantages offered by the Fund.

The number of policies running was 83, and three more applications were granted. One pension was being paid to an aged minister, in supplement to a fund raised by his friends to enable him to retire; and another had been promised.

The annual report and balance-sheet were adopted, and ordered to be printed and circulated among the subscribers and members.

The total value of the Fund is now £24,585 10s. 10d. The annual subscription list has fallen rather below the £300 per annum which formed the basis of calculation, and steps will have to be taken to increase the subscription list, especially in view of the unexpected number of ministers over 40 years of age who have joined the Fund, necessitating heavier proportionate payments.

Arrangements were made for the triennial meeting of donors, subscribers, and members, which will be held at Oxford on Wednesday, April 18, at 2.30 p.m. At that meeting all the managers will retire, though they are eligible for re-election. Nominations should be sent in to the hon. secretary, Rev. C. J. Street, 64, Crescent-road, Sheffield.

By A MINISTER.

XXXVIII.

THE Brotherhood of Man is a phrase which runs easily from the tongue, as long as we do not think of particular men. Then it falters and hangs. And no wonder; for brotherhood in this high sense is a spiritual relationship, realised only by those who have climbed above the natural levels of envy and rivalry, aversion and contempt—if such men there be. Hence it is, I suppose, that in practice we never get much beyond "fraternity," the sense of brotherhood which, even when spiritual, is particular and exclusive.

Much light has been thrown of late years on the sodalities and collegia, the fraternities of ancient Rome. Sometimes suppressed, and at all times strictly regulated, these guilds and associations of the common people left little record of themselves, beyond the inscriptions, now recovered, which marked the graves of their members honoured only in death. They were formed for the most part by craftsmen, partly through pride in their particular craft, and partly through craving for sympathy and support. "When the brotherhood," says Professor Dill, "many of them of servile grade, passed through the streets and the forum with banners flying, and all the emblems of their guild, the meanest member felt himself lifted for the moment above the dim, hopeless obscurity of plebeian life." Nor can there be any doubt that in these fraternities may be found the ready soil in which Christian brotherliness afterwards took root. But brotherliness soon fell again into divided brotherhoods. The fraternising instinct is strong in us, but it is an instinct by which like seeks like, and the object is rather to express agreement than to harmonise difference. We are brothers in arms, or, it may be, in letters, in art, in science, in social effort, in political endeavour, in religious faith, but all-embracing brotherhood is not much in our minds, or is thought of as an impossible ideal. Birds of a feather flock together, and that is nearly all that we can say.

Fraternity, it is true, is one of the rallying cries of socialism, but I always regard it in this connection as an ardent expression of hope rather than as a reasoned statement of belief. Demetrius, our labour candidate at the last election, was always assuring us that social affection would come with economic change. We were not convinced. I could not myself see the connection between collective capital and universal charity. That between socialists banded together for the attainment of socialism there would be fraternal feeling, is likely enough, but the question is, whether feeling inspired by a particular object can outlive the attainment of that object. There is unity in combination, but, for permanent unity, there must be some lasting motive to combine upon. Ecce, quam bonum habitare fratres una. It is the dwelling together, not the acting together, that tests the unity of brotherhood.

In the Christian scheme the unifying power is called love. It was first thought of as a commandment, and was then recognised as a law. It is the law of filial affection. By this law brotherhood is involved in sonship worthy to be so called. "That ye may be the children of your Father" is the appeal to men to realise divine sonship; "All ye are brethren" is the appeal to them as sons to realise human brotherhood.

That is why I often beg Demophilus, our Radical curate, not to speak of Christian socialism. I tell him he might as well speak of Christian bimetalism. The two ideas move independently on separate planes, and the terms which represent them cannot, I think, be combined without violence to both. I do indeed believe with him that Christianity, fully and honestly applied, would cure our social evils, and solve our social problems, and that the common good might even in time be thought infinitely more desirable, and more enjoyable, than private wealth, but all this could come about through the socialism which is inherent in Christianity itself, and does not need alliance with any extraneous socialistic system. Socialism, as generally understood, if I am not mistaken, is a theory of property, and on questions of mere ownership Christianity can only say, as at the beginning, "Who made me a judge or a divider over you?" Socialism begins and ends with the plain necessities of social life; Christianity gives these a secondary place, and makes provision for them a secondary care: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God; and all these things shall be added unto you." The meaning of this must be that, in proportion as spiritual order is recognised, right order in material things will follow. Demetrius, I know, is also fond of saying that, in the social order that is to be, justice, if not fraternity, will be the social bond. I would like to ask him whether justice is not a virtue that must itself be set in motion—whether delicate regard for the rights and claims of others is not itself the effect and application of some strong principle behind it. But this is a question that I suppose I must keep until the next election.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Bradford.—At Chapel-lane Chapel last Sunday evening the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones preached on "The Special Mission of a Free Church," taking for text 1 Thess. v. 5. He told the story of the ejection of the Vicar of Bradford in 1662, and traced the subsequent history of the Nonconformist movement, speaking afterwards of the need for a new Reformation, in which intellectual veracity must have free course.

Coalville.—A brief series of popular services has just been concluded in the Exchange Hall. The small band of local Unitarians worked hard to make the services well known, and their efforts were successful. The first service was taken by the Rev. John Page Hopps, who had a large audience. His address on "Salvation by Character" was well reported in the local press. The Rev. Jas. Harwood followed on the next Sunday, and made a deep impression by his address on "Christ our Leader." The Rev. W. H. Burgess was the preacher on March 11; for the next Sunday, March 18, the congregation went back to their small meeting-room, and were visited by Mr. Reuben Briggs, of Nottingham, and the series was brought to a close by a large gathering in the Exchange Hall on Monday night to listen to the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold, of Leicester. At this service Miss Pratt, of the Narborough-road choir, sang two solos, and at the close of Miss von Petzold's address Mr. Burgess took the chair, and, questions being invited, an earnest little discussion ensued. It is felt that the services have been helpful in removing misapprehensions, and giving Coalville some idea of the attitude of Unitarians towards the religious problems of our time.

Colne.—On March 1, 2, and 3 a series of successful "At Homes" were held at the Unitarian Church, Stanley-street. On the 1st Alderman E. Carr, J.P., Mayor of Colne (Churchman), officiated as opener, the Rev. T. Leyland (former minister of the church) presiding. His worship spoke of the great need for closer unity of the churches, and urged that the ideals of Christ would never be realised unless Christians ceased to accentuate their differences and agreed to tolerate and be more willing to help each other. On the 2nd Mr. J. L. Wildman, J.P. (Wesleyan), officiated as opener, Councillor J. Wilkinson presiding. Mr. Wildman expressed his pleasure in being present and his appreciation of the good work the church and school were doing. He wished every success to the efforts that were being put forth. On the 3rd the opener was Dr. Dickey, J.P. (Churchman), Mr. R. Proctor presiding. Appreciation of the good work done by church and school was expressed by both opener and chairman. The "At Homes" have been greatly patronised by friends from other churches, and in every sense were very successful. The amount realised was £65; net proceeds over £50.

Dover.—A most interesting lecture on "The Origin of Romanesque Architecture" was given at Adrian-street Church on March 7 by Mr. Hugh Stannus, F.R.I.B.A. The lecture was illustrated by beautiful lantern slides, and was much appreciated. A hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Stannus, proposed by the chairman (Rev. C. A. Ginever), concluded a very pleasant evening.

Kirkcaldy (Appointment).—The Rev. Chas. Sneddon, who was formerly an assistant minister in the Established Church of Scotland, has accepted the unanimous invitation of the Kirkcaldy congregation to become their minister. The church has been without a regular minister since the removal of the Rev. A. E. Parry to Liscard in 1901. At the close of his sermon last Sunday evening, Mr. Sneddon spoke of the reasons which had led him to accept that call, and of his ideal of the ministry. He should not aim at drawing a crowd by sensational methods of preaching, by which nothing but a cheap notoriety was gained. He should aim at steady growth, and he gloried in the freedom of their pulpit. He should preach always a God of love, never a God of hate, and not a miraculous Christ, but one who by his bravery, beauty of character, and devotion to truth and freedom, weaves his life and example into the texture of our existence. They must seek also as a congregation to play a real part in the life of the town, and keep the flag of Progress flying. Among the means he should use were lectures, special Sunday night meetings, literature, and a public elocution class, which he should himself conduct.

Lancaster.—The annual congregational business meeting of St. Nicholas-street Chapel was held in the schoolroom on Wednesday evening, March 14. The treasurer, Mr. R. Hall, in presenting his financial statement, said the year 1905 was a most satisfactory one from a treasurer's point of view. By means of a sale of work held in June, they had more than wiped off the adverse balance of two years' standing, and there had been an increase in the membership-subscriptions, and a considerable increase in the amount realised by the Sunday evening collections. He was left with a substantial balance in hand, but he would remind the members that this balance and more would be required to meet the expense of the recent structural alterations to the choir seats. The secretary, Mr. R. Roberts, reported that the late Mr. J. Territt had left to the chapel incidental fund a legacy of £200; and, referring to the increase in the Sunday evening collections, said it was due to the popularity of their minister's Sunday evening lectures, the last course of which was on "The religious opinions of some modern poets." The Rev. J. Channing Pollard, in responding to a hearty vote of thanks, said it was very gratifying to him, after a ministry amongst them of nearly eighteen years, to hear of this increase in the subscriptions and Sunday collections, and that their last year's work together had been so successful. After the election of committee and officers, votes of thanks concluded a harmonious meeting.

Leeds: Holbeck.—The services on Sunday, March 11, were conducted by the Rev. W.

Rosling, of Bradford, in the absence of the Rev. W. R. Shanks, who was preaching at the new mission station, Barnsley.

London: Laymen's Club.—On Friday, March 16, the club was "at home" to the Sunday-school teachers and mission workers, and there was a large gathering at Essex Hall. After tea and coffee, Mr. H. Wade read a letter from the president, Mr. H. B. Lawford, regretting that he had to be absent from a club function for the first time during his year of office, and a musical programme occupied the rest of the evening, in which Miss H. Lawford, Miss Epps, Miss Stanley, Mr. Besant and Mr. Coltart took part. Mr. S. T. Lock gave readings in the Devonshire dialect, which were greatly enjoyed. The thanks of the club are especially due to the ladies who gave their help, both as regards the music and the organisation of the party.

Manchester: Pendleton.—The annual business meeting of the church was held in the schoolroom on Saturday, March 17, and was largely attended. Tea was generously provided by Mr. and Mrs. J. Wigley. After tea Mr. Wigley took the chair, and in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, spoke of the splendid work accomplished during the past year by the minister, Rev. N. Anderton, the improved condition of all the institutions connected with the church, also of the increased attendance at the Sunday services. The treasurer's statements were presented by Mr. W. Dennis Hull and Mr. T. Fletcher Robinson. Rev. N. Anderton, speaking of the satisfactory report received, urged upon all the members to realise that their presence and the interest showed was of great importance to the work they had to accomplish.

Oldbury.—The annual meeting of the Unitarian congregation and Sunday school was held on Wednesday evening, March 14, the Rev. W. G. Topping in the chair. The annual report of the secretary and treasurer (Mr. Alfred Burgess) showed that a most satisfactory year's work had been accomplished. The treasurer reported that the general income had just covered expenses. A newly-formed Band of Hope and Mercy has done good work. In moving the adoption of the report and statements of accounts, the chairman reviewed the work of his first year's ministry at Oldbury, and thanked all who had assisted in the various departments to achieve the success that had attended their united efforts. Councillor J. W. Growcott and Messrs. W. Morgan and J. Baker also addressed the meeting, and votes of thanks were tendered to the honorary organists, choir, teachers, &c., for their services. A musical programme added to the pleasure of the evening.

Park-lane, Wigan.—A successful entertainment was given in the Shaw Memorial Schools, on Monday evening. The programme was furnished by the young people, the object being to raise money for a piano. Mr. Peter Gorton, who presided, said they had been pleased to have the Rev. W. Roger Smyth in temporary charge, and were looking forward to the coming of their new minister, the Rev. J. Bellamy Higham, early in April.

Pudsey.—At a large and enthusiastic gathering of the congregation on Monday evening, a welcome was given to Mr. and Mrs. Barker and family (from Leeds) and Mr. and Mrs. Wright and family (from Northampton).

West Kirby.—The morning services, which have now been held for nine Sundays, having proved as successful as could be hoped for, evening services were inaugurated on the 18th inst., when Rev. H. W. Hawkes, who is at present in charge of this movement, gave an address on "The New Reformation that is Coming" to a congregation numbering thirty-one. It is believed that before long more will be found who cannot attend in the morning. Three further special addresses will be given by Mr. James Samuelson and the Revs. A. E. Parry and J. Morley Mills.

ONE of the grandest truths of religion is the supreme importance of character, of virtue, of that divine spirit which shone out in Christ. The grand heresy is to substitute anything for this, whether creed, or form, or church. One of the greatest wrongs to Christ is to despise his character, his virtue, in a disciple who happens to wear a different name from our own:—Channing.

A SHORT HISTORY OF UNITARIANISM

By FREDERICK BLOUNT MOTT

Cr. 8vo. 98 pp. Cloth, 1s. Net; postage, 2d.

Contents.—Chapter I.—THE PURSUIT OF TRUTH. II.—BERNARDINO OCHINO. III.—SERVETUS THE MARTYR. IV.—FAUSTO SOZZINI. V.—THE STRANGERS' CHURCH. VI.—JOHN BIDLE. VII.—THEOPHILUS LINDSEY. VIII.—JOSEPH PRIESTLEY. IX.—BEGINNINGS IN AMERICA. X.—WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING. XI.—EMERSON'S NEW SEED. XII.—THEODORE PARKER. XIII.—JAMES MARTINEAU. XIV.—THE UNITARIAN FAITH.

The purpose of this little book is to give in a series of brief chapters an account of the historical development of Unitarianism.

The story centres round the names of a few great leaders and thinkers, such as Erasmus, Ochino, Servetus, Sozzini, Bidle, Lindsey, Priestley, Channing, Emerson, Parker, and Martineau.

In the last chapter an attempt is made to sketch the principles and faith of modern Unitarianism.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE publish this week, with great pleasure, a first letter from the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, posted at Athens. We have since heard of him and Mr. Pritchard at Constantinople, and hope for further letters, telling of that city and Smyrna, and of their visit to the Holy Land.

At the annual meeting of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, held in London on March 20, the following letter from the Queen to the Duchess of Portland was read:—"The Queen desires me to say, in answer to your letter, that she gives you, as president, full permission to use her name in any way you think best to conduce to the protection of birds. You know well how kind and humane the Queen is to all living creatures, and I am desired to add that Her Majesty never wears osprey feathers herself, and will certainly do all in her power to discourage the cruelty practised on these beautiful birds."

In this connection we may quote the following passage from a sermon in a recently published volume by the Rev. F. F. Carmichael, LL.D., chaplain of the Magdalen, Dublin:—"Apart from indulgence in cruel sports, many women (of fashion especially) are answerable for certain deliberate and extensive acts of cruelty—committed to gratify female vanity and love of adornment and display. Millions of sensitive creatures are yearly slaughtered, or suffer lingering and painful deaths, that women may have birds' wings and feathers to put in their bonnets. Whole species of lovely birds are vanishing off the face of the earth from the gratification of this cruel vanity. The heron, the osprey, the egret, the crane, the ibis, will soon be as extinct as the dodo if this shocking work goes on. Nor is it the bird only that suffers from these merciless fashions. Many a woman has on her hands gloves made of the skin stripped from a living kid, and wears a fur taken from a lamb by a process too horrible and revolting to put in print."

Of the difficulties which oppose the churches in the discharge of their mission, some are inherent. The evangelical Christian cannot forget that "the natural man is enmity against God." This conviction is still strongly held by many good people, although there has been a far-reaching modification of doctrine in the direction of finding in the religious life a perfecting rather than a reversal of the natural process of human growth. But, though the conception of faith be brought into never so close connection with the reality of nature, yet the propulsive force of the spirit has to combat with difficulties which may indeed be regarded as adventurous, but which certainly are serious. Some of these hard conditions depend on the distribution of the population, and they present themselves in one form or another alike in the scattered village groups and in the dense crowds of the city. Reference is found to both of these in a recent number of the Examiner, the organ of the Congregational Union.

THE village is dull. It should not be so. Many of us who live in the cities long for a village home. Truly, the charm might fade away, as Wordsworth has warned us, from the day when the cottage with its climbing roses and narrow spaces became ours. Be that as it may, village life is, in fact, not stimulating. Amongst others who feel the tedium and do not think about it is that reflective race of men, the clergy and ministers. The conditions of a remote and lonely charge, "far from the madding crowd," is regarded as apt to take the edge off the average man's enthusiasm. But after all, why should the village pastor be isolated? For what are county unions, if they cannot amend this? Arrange then, it is urged, for a regular exchange of pulpits. Let each church retain its own minister, to guide its affairs and to visit its members. But let him not preach at home more than two Sundays a month. Let him for the rest visit other churches. "The country people like change, and they get so little that it would not be difficult to accomplish this." We can imagine all kinds of objections to such a scheme, but any proposal for supplementing the settled pastorate by an itinerant ministry is interesting and worth thinking about. It would give rope to valuable vagrant impulses, and might appeal to those instincts of vagabondage which are said to lurk in all men, even those who are members of churches. Possibly, if ministers wandered more, congregations would wander less on Sunday mornings.

FROM the sparsely peopled country side to the overcrowded area of Manchester hard by the docks of the great Ship Canal. A quarter of a century ago a chapel building society acquired a site for a church. But the neighbourhood seemed unsuitable for the Congregationalism of that day, and was sold. The problem was given up. Since then the conditions have not improved, but Congregationalism has changed. It is not now left to an individual church to undertake work of this kind. The influence of collectivism has made itself felt in the most sturdily individualistic of the great religious bodies. The work is in the hands of a church board. What an isolated group could not do, that, it is held, the combined force of Cottonopolis must achieve. An institutional church then. Congregationalism indeed has changed. For chapel there is to be a church-hall, for vestry, a church parlour. Beyond these, a crush space, ticket office, men's club [with billiard-room for five tables, a bar, skittle alley, five court, besides reading and class-room. The list would read strangely to the men of the old generation. The record, however, is a valuable one, as showing the various experiments which men are making in their attempt to apply faith to a larger range of the interests of the lives of men.

AN extra number of the Theologisch Tijdschrift is to be published in April, which will contain Professor Meyboom's promised study of the late Professor van Manen, of Leiden. There will therefore be seven numbers issued this year, the fourth appearing in May, but the extra van Manen number may be had separately from the publisher, Mr. S. C. van Doesburgh, Leiden, for 1s. 6d., post free. In the January number of the Tijdschrift there is an article by Mr. F. C. Conybeare (in English) on "Recent French and English Criticism of the Fourth Gospel."

TOWARDS SOCIAL REFORM.

SOCIAL PROBLEMS.

PROBABLY we all realise the limitations to what we can hope to do by our papers in THE INQUIRER. Those who wish really to study social questions must read books, and, if possible, take part in discussions where mind can quickly influence mind. But one thing we can show here, viz., that social questions deserve our best attention, and an attention given under the stimulus of religious faith and aspiration. We can show that we have a right to expect our members of Parliament to consider these questions, and to consider them in a hopeful spirit, believing that the evils from which we suffer are largely of human creation and can be remedied by human action. We can ask them to consider what is being done for the people in a country far less democratic than our own, Germany, and to study, perhaps, with still greater profit what has been done in our self-governing Colonies. There are facts to show us that many of the social troubles with which we are afflicted are due to human arrangements which human beings have made and can alter, not to inevitable laws of Nature. For instance, Society has been compared to a caravan marching across a hot sandy desert. At length palm-trees are seen in the distance, indicating an oasis where there is a spring of water. The strongest, or the best mounted, in the caravan hurry forward, quench their own thirst, and then take possession of the well, establish a monopoly of the supply of water, and let others drink only for a payment which may reduce them to destitution. The evil of such a monopoly might be met in two ways. Religion might preach Christian charity, and might threaten the hard-hearted with penalties in another world. Or the whole caravan might insist on having a government which would take possession of the well and distribute the water fairly among all comers. Of course, in the case of a caravan crossing a desert some such arrangement would be made, something like military discipline would be enforced. There would be restraint on individual liberty, and distribution according to need. And the aim of modern government, persistently and avowedly pursued, should be to secure for the benefit of the public all monopolies, doing no injustice to their temporary holders where rights have been allowed to grow up, but safeguarding the permanent interest of the State. This illustration is suggested in the opening words of Michael Flurscheim's "Clue to the Economic Labyrinth." It gives no hint of the complexities and difficulties of the problem, and he next supposes that his caravan continues its march and arrives at length in sight of a beautiful country, a land flowing with milk and honey, a land of corn and grapes, of mines and quarries, of flocks and herds, of fish and fowl, and all things needful for a happy life. But between the caravan and that happy land there rushes a deep and rapid river, and there is no bridge, no boat, no ford. A few strong swimmers succeed in getting safe across, but the majority of those who make the attempt are carried away and drowned, and the great multitude, including all the weaker members, do not even try to cross. They remain half-starved on the desert side, living on what they can with difficulty procure from its barren plain. Those who have crossed find abundant fruit, much more than they want for their own use, so they try to fling some of it back across the stream to their less fortunate companions. But much of what is thrown falls short and is washed away, and what does arrive on the bank is in a damaged condition. One man who has safely swum the torrent, when he finds that others cannot follow, returns to share their harder fate (his name is Leo Tolstoy). But his return does not help them. What is wanted is a Joshua who will divide the stream to right and left by a mighty miracle, and let the people pass into the Promised Land. Or, rather, since we have abandoned the expectation of miracles, let us say what is wanted is an engineer who can build a bridge over the torrent so that the people can pass safely to the plenty that lies before them. Can religion build such a bridge? Only lately has it begun even to try. It has been content to say that the river is death, and the Promised Land, Heaven. There are abundance of hymns to show that. Now, however, we have begun to realise that these hymns tell the truth, but not the whole truth, and that it is a religious duty to make the best we can of this life and this world, and to do this not only by way of Christian charity but by way of building a bridge which will afford safe access to numerous advantages which may be shared by all alike, so as to secure to everyone the satisfaction of real needs.

Before we can accept this illustration as sufficiently accurate for our purpose, we must be satisfied that the fault lies with ourselves, that Nature is not niggardly, but has provided abundance for all. Here Prince Kropotkin is a good authority, and he gives us some significant figures. In the cornfields of the West 100 men can in a few months provide all the bread wanted for 10,000 men during a whole year. Another 100 men can in one year produce all the clothing required by 20,000 people during the same period, and in a coal-mine 100 men can extract the fuel to supply the wants of 10,000 families. Such are some of the results of the modern application of science to industry and the development of machinery. Of course, people want more than bread, clothing, and fuel, so increase the number of labourers, and still it will remain true that one-tenth of the population could supply all the necessities of life. Or, suppose all the men over sixteen years of age were employed, then it is calculated that each man need work only one hour and two and a half minutes a day for 300 days in the year to supply all the necessities; and by working another two hours and twelve minutes for two months in the year, all the additional luxuries could be supplied. Such is the calculation of an eminent Austrian Socialist, Dr. Hertzka. Or the matter may be looked at in another way. We can compare the productiveness of modern machinery with the results of hand-labour. A locomotive can pull as much as 8,000 men, say, those who dragged the stones to build the Egyptian Pyramids. Forty boys with the aid of knitting machines can make 5,000 dozen of socks a day. To knit them by hand would take 50,000 women. And so we might go on through a long series of statistics; but, instead of reaping the benefit of this industrial development in the shape of shorter hours of labour and the universal enjoyment of the good things of the world, the cry is that the markets are overstocked with goods and the labourers can find no work. We have the terrible spectacle of warehouses crammed with clothing which cannot be sold, while thousands of families are insufficiently clad, and without money to buy clothes, because men cannot find employment and earn wages. This is the situation which demands the building of the bridge. The Promised Land is here, in this world. It is just over the stream which the strong swimmers have crossed. Can a bridge be built which shall take over the whole people? Of one thing we may be sure, the bridge will not be built without faith. We must have faith that it can be done, and that God means us to do it, and such faith runs counter to a good deal of old religious sentiment.

But if we are convinced that this is a good and right work, the next thing to recognise is that it needs our best intellect and skill. The real bridges which modern engineers have flung across the gulf are marvellous in their wise planning and careful execution. We want economic leaders as wise and skilful as our engineers. The work is equally complicated and elaborate. Jesus told the rich young man to give away all his possessions and then to follow him. That was right for the circumstances of those times. But now, for the altered needs of our times, we might as well tell a soldier to fling away his weapons, and then go to war. The only chance of solving our social problems is to use, wisely and lovingly, the resources of civilisation placed in our hands.

But we also ask for bolder action than has hitherto been taken in our own country. The great land monopoly may be the first to be called on to render up its monopoly profit for the benefit of the State, but it need not be the last or only one. The Americans have given a new meaning to the word "Trust." We should fight their "Trusts" with trusts in our old meaning of the word. Why should not our coal-mines and our railways be managed by corporations like the Mersey Dock and Harbour Board? That has given the Port of Liverpool a great advantage over the Port of London. Why should we not seek a similar advantage for the State in all industries which must necessarily be monopolies? Either by a system of taxation, or a method of management, the State should secure all profits which are due to the absence of competition. Not only would this be just in itself, but it may be truly said that not doing so is unjust to the community at large. Only by some such action can we hope to ward off the invasion of American methods of doing business which result in the greatest contrasts between wealth and poverty ever known. This week brings us word that Mr. Rockefeller, with his income of £8,000,000 a year, is in a state bordering on mental collapse, perhaps the most miserable man on the continent! The facts of another monopoly, not, I believe published, have recently been told me by one who had good opportunity for learning them: All the best type-writers are owned by a "Trust," and are sold here for about £22, the agents being strictly forbidden to allow more than 5 per cent. discount. But the cost of making such a type-writer, say the Remington, is £5, all the rest of the price is the reward of distribution. The machines are sent over here for about £13, and the English agents have the £9. The Americans say this is the best way of doing business they have discovered; if we can show them a better, they will be glad to adopt it. Well, we should like to show them a way which will secure a greater reward to the maker and waste less on methods of distribution, and so do more to secure the greatest good of the greatest number.

H. S. SOLLY.

(To be concluded.)

ON THE IONIAN SEA:

It seems hard to believe in the remembered scene of less than a week ago. We left London in sleet and snow. The North Downs were mantled white, and the Surrey banks and copses, where we had expected to see primroses, were draped in winter festoons. The South Downs were green, indeed, but sad-looking through the mist of rain. Newhaven was a cheerless spot, and the Channel, after Monday's storm, was in an unpromising mood. As the boat got out from land we found the sea rude and wintry, and before Dieppe was reached a thick snowstorm came on to complete the picture. Not many of the passengers were able to enjoy the wild spectacle, and to watch the easy flight of the seagulls in our wake. Two poor tiny travellers there were that rough March day—a pair of finches, who, being apparently lost in the storm, flew gallantly on and on with us, now and again lighting on the stern for a rest. Let me hope they found a home on the French shore.

That shore was sleety when we landed, but soon we were speeding south, through many a primrosed wood, and we found Paris dry, if also cold. Twenty-four hours later found us rushing south again, past Dijon, past Lyons, through the mistral-swept valley of the Rhone, past gold-crested Avignon, past wide stretches of barren flats and stony moor, with patches of poor olive gardens and bleached planetrees and sturdier cypresses. But the sun shone at dawn, and Marseilles was bright and warm to us Northerners, though the native citizens wore their topcoats still, being afraid (said our good Marseillaise hosts, the B.'s) of that Alp-born mistral. We boarded our steamer for departure in the afternoon, the full light of the sunshine gleaming on the crowded city with its great cathedral in the midst behind the masted harbour, and the lofty gilded figure of Notre Dame de la Garde high over all.

As the boat rode easily out upon a slightly heaving sea, we observed a group of priests and others on board taking up an attitude of reverent address to this good patron of those who piously leave the harbour, and they sang to her a long hymn of invocation, followed by a brief litany. They belonged to a party of sixty pilgrims, including ten priests of different degrees, and representing Belgium and Canada, as well as several parts of France, who (I learn from a kindly little Abbé prominent in the group) are to land at Beyrout and proceed by way of Damascus southward through Galilee and Samaria till they reach Jerusalem for Passion Week and Easter. These pilgrims are a "feature" of the boat. They have little services periodically each day, sometimes with singing which is not, to our ears, very musical. Men and women, young and old, are represented in the pilgrimage, and they mostly appear to be homely, decent folk, devout without excessive emotion, and capable of much human fun together. We shall know each other pretty well, I daresay, before we part at Beyrout, where Mr. Pritchard and I are to take another steamer to Jaffa, for Jerusalem direct.

Since we left Marseilles the days have been sunny, at times hot, the seas blue, the sunsets superb. We threaded the straits of Bonifacio in glorious morning, and had a vision of silver-pointed peaks and dreamy lawns of white high in Corsica, beyond the light sea mists. Garibaldi's Caprera lay dark against the sunlit sky to our right. Next dawn we saw from far the crater-peaks of Vesuvius silhouetted upon a glory of golden light, and the curling vapour of the volcano mixed with purple-shadowed cloudlets.

A long walk and a short drive showed us more of Naples than we shall soon forget—the few wider thoroughfares, crowded, noisy, bright coloured, full of life, of a gaiety that defied the obvious poverty of many of the people. Did not the sun shine for them also? The narrower streets—alleys, one might call them—stretching across the city, were especially interesting to our English eyes. After glancing down and up a score or two of them, we took our fate in our hands and ventured up one of them leading towards the foot of St. Elmo. Literally, every step was attended with novelty, if not always with charm and sweetness—the dress, the gestures, the tones (not always pleasant) of the men, women, and children; the animals that shared equally with us the paved ten feet or so of roadway, horses, cows with calves, goats in little herds (and showing a goat-like instinct in climbing at each opportunity heaps of paving-stones), dogs neatly washed and combed, had we the money to buy one, fowl radiant in feather, parrots still more gorgeous, baskets of flowers advertised in stentor tones by swarthy porters, open-fronted shops (as at Pompeii long ago), where in the cool shade the vendor watched or the artificer worked in sight of all and sundry, interiors of dwellings dark and awesome, with glimpses of active housewives at their ironing and cooking, and, alas! sights of invalids in their lowly sick beds. High up stretched the houses on each side, with here and there some bright-coloured fabric hanging at the windows, above all the clear blue of heaven looked down into the slots and crevices of the city—a heaven benign and gentle in these spring days to the just and the unjust on earth below. The prettiest sight, to our judgment, was not the milking of the cows or goats into the customer's own vessel, nor even the toddling children at play here and there at the doorways. It was a group of three wee lambs—a dark one between two snowy white—who followed a wee shepherd boy up the Via, nibbling at a bundle of tender grass which he bore for that purpose slung behind him. We shall think of that group, I feel sure, when memories of the palms (our first seen on this journey), and the touches of antiquity still remaining in the much modernised city, and the ornate splendour of the Duomo are faint or altogether lost.

Then to the harbour again, where hundreds of strong and capable-looking young men and women were seeing to their bundles and putting off to the White Star steamer which should take them off that day bound for the United States. This is not the page for philosophising, else the theme invites. So came, millenniums ago, Greeks and Phœnicians, to colonise at Marsilia and Carthago and Cumæ. Now it is from old ports like these that the formative elements of the New World's great new nation are pouring forth. And from Ireland, too! But this is not the page:

We put out slowly, not without laughter, from the famous Bay—laughter at the frolics if not the little frauds of the Neapolitans (one rogue of a dirty boy, with a smile three inches broad by two deep, and a perfect twin-rank of pearly teeth, pleased me particularly)—not without deeper thoughts of that city's history and associations—Virgil's tomb, Pompeii, Hadrian, Augustulus, the last of the Emperors of the West; fighters, from Belisarius to Masaniello and Victor Emmanuel, Cicero, Boccaccio, Giotto—where shall I stop! There to the north, beyond the hill of Posilipo, lies a little bay with Pozzuoli on its shores, the Puteoli where St. Paul landed on his way to Rome. We turn southward by the passage past Capri, through which he, too, must have sailed, brave still after his many buffetings, and so we fare onward on brighter seas than his—were it only with equal courage! At midnight we passed between Scylla and Charybdis, untossed, unafraid. Messina's sickle crescent of lamps gleamed from the westward against the dark shores of Sicily; Reggio's (Rhegium's) clustered lights lay under the hilly Calabrian outline. We slipped quietly round into the wide Ionian Sea, where now we gently roll, on our course to the Piræus. It is Sunday. To-morrow, if the breezes about Cape Matapan permit, we shall see Athens. W. G. TARRANT.

THERE are but three things in human existence which are really inexhaustible—knowledge, duty, love. And these run up heaven-wards, as it were, into God, the wise, the holy, and the tender.—Charles Beard.

If the results of a special form of religion, tried on a large scale, prove that it fails to develop human nature on all sides healthily; but on the contrary warps and contracts it in many important particulars, then surely it is impossible that that form of religion can be the one intended by God for the acceptance of mankind.—Frances Power Cobbe.

ONLY make the fellowship of Divine love intense and conscious by acts of prayer, by habits of Divine communion, by simplicity and sincerity of life, and then the things that are impossible to men, when men are alone with themselves, become possible to men when God is in them and with them.—John Hamilton Thom.

BOOKS NEW AND OLD:

THERE are standards of critical orthodoxy about books as about other things, and it requires some courage to treat them with indifference. We bow before the classics, and are inclined to accept them, like the law of gravitation, as among the inevitable things which we cannot alter. It is almost a breach of good manners to express disapproval or personal dislike of the writings which the world has agreed to praise, and if we do not read them it seems wise to keep our failing to ourselves. Possibly there are few virtues which the reading public is more in danger of losing than candour of appreciation.

Some of the classics, however, continue to escape this lip-service, and there seems to be no difficulty in proclaiming to the world our inability to read them. It is with no sense of shame that we confess our complete ignorance of "Paradise Lost," and with some books ignorance does not stop short of frank hostility. Perhaps this is the case especially with books which are religious in their thought and colouring, for there is nothing like religious emotion, which we do not share, for justifying dislike and changing it into a virtue to be proclaimed at the street corners. Few of the world's great books have suffered more in this way than the "Confessions" of St. Augustine. It has a reputation for being morbid, over-wrought both in feeling and self-analysis, passionate and outspoken where our Northern blood prescribes reticence; and I have known people turn away from it with insuperable prejudice. Without reading a line of it they are sure that it is not the kind of book for them, and possibly they are right. It is not for all tastes, and if it cannot be read with sympathy it is profitless to read it at all.

I think, however, that a little scrutiny and effort may be wise before we dismiss St. Augustine and his book into the limbo of useless and forgotten things. If he has the disadvantage, to our secular taste, to be one of the great doctors of the Church, and to trouble himself about his sins beyond the limits of strict decorum, we can hardly refuse an unwilling tribute to his commanding influence and genius, or deny the fascination of the period of social and intellectual struggle of which he is the chief type and representative. Standing on the watershed between the old and the new, he focussed in his personality the ancient thought and culture, and sent them forth to the unborn world of the Middle Ages. His writings are the source from which thinkers and theologians drew their arguments for the controversies of a thousand years.

But it is his religious experience which is chiefly memorable. In the sincerity of the revelation of himself, in the power with which he realised the depth of the soul's tragedy and its peace in Christ, he is the greatest figure between St. Paul and Luther. It was in his writings that the Reformation found its doctrines of sin and grace, as it was through its study of St. Paul, interpreted and intensified by St. Augustine, that it recovered the worth of the inner life and the watchword of conversion. There was, perhaps, something symbolical of his influence over the new world that was rising out of the ashes of the Roman Empire in his death as Bishop of Hippo, while the Huns were laying siege to the town.

The "Confessions" is often classed among books of devotion, but its interest is much wider than that term would imply. Its appeal is the same as that of the Memoirs of Gibbon or Newman's "Apologia." It is an autobiography, the first as it is also one of the greatest of autobiographies. Here we touch upon its inexhaustible human appeal, and half the prejudice against it is gone. No sane reader will refuse the effort, which Plato and Virgil, and many parts of the Bible demand equally with St. Augustine, to place himself at the right point of view. The intellectual atmosphere is that of the fourth and fifth Christian centuries. Perhaps, however, the form of the "Confessions" will be found to present even greater difficulties than that of mental accommodation. The whole book is addressed to God. It is the personal confession of a deep life experience made by the soul to its Maker. If this gives it a certain elevation of tone, it also imparts a quality of aloofness, as of something remote from the clashing interests of the world. The author is not speaking to us; we seem continually to be overhearing him at his prayers.

If the reader has the elementary patience needed to overcome these difficulties, he will find himself in presence of a document of rare fascination, rich in close observation and deep knowledge of human nature. It is full of vivid descriptions of contemporary life. The ancient world lives for us in these pages, just before it was submerged by the barbarian invasions, in the innumerable allusions and touches of local colour possible only to a contemporary. The civilisation of the prosperous towns on the African seaboard, the school-boy at his games, the crowd of students at the universities, the ambitious young barrister, the successful professor, the fashionable Christian preacher, the strife of rival parties and creeds, the veneer of religious indifference which overspread polite society, the stately survivals of paganism, all these form the background against which St. Augustine himself stands out in bold relief.

Here and there a figure more important than the rest detaches itself from the crowd. The "Confessions" contain many literary portraits sketched with a firm hand. There is Faustus, the heretical bishop, who had a great reputation for wisdom because he had charming manners and a pleasant address, who contrived to say just what other people said, only in a much more agreeable way. There is Victorinus, the famous Roman professor of rhetoric, who became secretly a Christian, but refrained prudently from going to church, saying that walls do not make a Christian, till at last he decided to throw away all reserve, to risk everything, and make public profession of his faith, while Rome wondered and the Church rejoiced. Nor must we forget Alypius, St. Augustine's first pupil, whom he saved from the passion of racing and the games, afterwards his intimate friend and the sharer of his conversion, a man of strict integrity and a scorner of bribes at a time when most men in the public service were expected to have their price. Above all there is Monnica, his mother, in whose memory St. Augustine has raised one of the noblest memorials in literature of saintly motherhood.

But, of course, the chief interest lies in the self-revelation of the author himself. He is no ænæmic saint as he comes before us in these pages, wearied by the fatigue of living a full life in the world. He is a man of strong nature, sensuous and passionate, with an eager and restless intellect, and insatiable spiritual needs. His story is that of a soul, great in its errors and sins, no less than in its final victory, coming through much tribulation to harmony with itself and harmony with God. With him the intellectual and moral problems are never distinct. They are fixed into a single problem of life, and when he reaches faith it is with his whole manhood that he grasps it. But more and more the struggle, as it grows in intensity, concentrates itself upon the moral side. He discovers that the source of evil, of his own sin, is not in the nature of things, but in his own will. His desire becomes not to be more certain of God, but to be more steadfast in Him. But still he holds back, and with what strange analytic power he has described his indecision: "On all sides Thou didst show me that Thy words are true, and the truth confounded me, so that I could make no reply but slow and drowsy words: 'Presently, O presently; let me be a little while.' But my 'presently, presently' had no present, and the little while proved a long while." For the final scene in the garden at Milan, as for all the descriptions which precede it, of schoolboy and student days, of his speculative adventures, his migrations from Carthage to Rome, and finally to Milan, where he falls under the influence of the preaching of St. Ambrose, of the growing mastery of Jesus Christ over his life, for whose Name through all the darkness of his wanderings he had kept the reverence of an unspoiled memory of childhood, the reader must search the book for himself. If it does not lay its spell upon him, let him at least be sorry that one of the world's great books is not for him.

St. Augustine has added as a fragrant appendix to this story of struggle and victory the noble tribute to his mother which has been mentioned already. He tells of her girlhood, of her conquest over some of the faults of youth, of her patient faithfulness to her husband, of her peaceable nature making all to be at peace around her, of her affection for himself. Then in fuller detail he describes the last precious days of their life together. They were at Ostia, resting before the voyage that was to take them back to Africa. There they had much holy converse; and there she died, happy in the faith that "nothing is far from God."

The "Confessions" is a book of experience; and while experience cannot be copied, it is always full of revelation for those who are human enough to understand. "Thou hast created us for Thyself, nor can these hearts find rest until they rest in Thee," that is its burden haunting and profound. Few of us make our own failure and sorrow yield us such excellent fruit. It is the merit of St. Augustine that he lived less on the surface of things than most of us are content to do, and for this grace he has rank among the saints. But he belongs also to the small company of literary artists who by their writing confer immortality upon a fugitive individual experience.

A DELIGHTFUL ESSAYIST.*

MANY of our readers will still have a vivid memory of Dr. S. M. Crothers, of Cambridge, Mass., who was in London five years ago as one of the American delegates to the first meeting of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers. They will remember the charm of his presence and the rare power of the addresses he gave, and will have heard with the utmost satisfaction that he is this year to deliver the Essex Hall Lecture, and to preach during May and June at the Old Meeting Church, in Birmingham, and during September and October at Essex Church, Kensington.

Since Dr. Crothers was here he has given us more than one delightful surprise in the unfolding of his manifold gifts. At Christmas, 1902, he published that charming fairy-tale, "Miss Muffet's Christmas Party," at which she and the spider entertained a company of the story-book children we all know, from Sandford and Merton to Mowgli and Alice, while Æsop and Uncle Remus were also there. And now, for those who do not already know the books, it is a pleasure such as one cannot often enjoy to call their attention to the two volumes of essays noted below. Here Dr. Crothers comes to us as a friend, and amid all the uncompromising conditions of twentieth century life, as a not unworthy successor to Elia.

"Were I appointed by the School Board," says Dr. Crothers, "to consider the applicants for teachers' certificates, after they had passed the examination in the arts and sciences I should subject them to a more rigid test. I should hand each candidate Lamb's Essays on the Old and the New Schoolmaster and on Imperfect Sympathies. I should make him read them to himself, while I sat by and watched. If his countenance never relaxed, as if he were inwardly saying, 'That's so,' I should withhold the certificate. I should not consider him a fit person to have charge of innocent youth."

And in another place he refers to Erasmus, who, in the dedication of his "Praise of Folly," described a kind of humour consistent with seriousness of purpose:—

"The characteristics he notes are good temper, insight into human nature, a certain reserve, and withal a gentle irony that makes the praise of folly not unpleasing to the wise. It is a way of looking at things characteristic of men like Chaucer and Cervantes, and Montaigne and Shakespeare, and Bunyan and Fielding, and Addison, Goldsmith, Charles Lamb, and Walter Scott. In America we have seen it in Irving and Dr. Holmes and James Russell Lowell.

"I have left out of the list one whom nature endowed for the supreme man of humour among Englishmen—Jonathan Swift. Charles Lamb argues against the common notion that it is a misfortune to a man to have a surly disposition. He says it is not his misfortune, it is the misfortune of his neighbours. It is our misfortune that the man who might have been the English Cervantes had a surly disposition; Dean Swift's humour would have been irresistible if it had only been good humour."

In Dr. Crothers himself we always have good humour and a genuine love of humanity. There is in these essays not only wholesome laughter and sound common-sense, but fine literary insight and a noble faith in the earnestness of life. Lightness of touch and the voice of genial companionship do not conceal from us the fact that our friend is also a strong preacher, for whom the ideal is ever the most certain truth.

There is humour in the very aspect and title of his books. The Gentle Reader recalls the leisurely habits of old-world writers. He and the author are constant companions throughout the essays, while the type and cloth binding recall the books of more than one generation ago. Then, in the later volume, The Pardoner's Wallet, from the starting-point of Chaucer's "Gentil Pardoner," with his wallet "brctful of pardoun," we have the happy conceit of one who throughout these essays looks with kindly humour and wise moderation on human failings, but always so as to encourage hope and energy to strive for better things.

"If I were a duly licensed pardoner," says Dr. Crothers, "I should have a number of nicely engraved indulgencies for what are called sins of omission. Not that I should attempt to extenuate the graver sort. I should not hold out false hopes to thankless sons or indifferent husbands. To be followed by such ruff-raff would spoil my trade with the better classes. I should not have anything in my wallet for the acrimonious critic, who brings a railing accusation against his neighbour, and omits to sign his name. Some omissions are unpardonable.

"I should, at the beginning, confine my traffic to those sins which easily beset conscientious persons about half-past two in the morning. We have warrant for thinking that the sleep of the just is refreshing. This is doubtless true of the completely just, but with the just man in the making it is frequently otherwise." Then he goes on to give one instance after another, and in a second essay deals with "Unseasonable Virtues." One of the most striking of the essays in this second volume is on "The Difficulties of the Peacemakers," in which full weight is given to the cynic's criticism of the present conduct of Christian nations, but with the powerful retort that Christians in the making, however far short their conduct as yet falls of their professions, are nevertheless on the true line of progress, and better than those who simply scoff and do not even try to be Christians. We in this country shall do well to note especially the essay on "The Land of the Large and Charitable Air," in which one has a glimpse of the ideal America, and that on "A Community of Humorists," in which Dr. Crothers doubtless recalls much of his own experience when, as a young man fresh from college, he went to minister among the mining camps of Nevada, and got a knowledge of human nature such as has served him well in other fields of work.

One other passage from The Pardoner's Wallet we must quote, from the essay on "A Saint Recanonised"—i.e., Francis of Assisi, the fascination of whose life holds Protestant and Catholic alike:—

"St. Francis found joy in the sacrifices and austerities which to others were so painful. The predominant note is that of gladness. In the midst of his penances he is light-hearted. He interpreted more literally than we do the words, 'Take no thought for the morrow.' Some things are possible in Umbria and Galilee that seem wildly impracticable under the fickle skies of New England. The sober prose of religion may be translated into all languages and verified by all human experience, but there is an idyllic poetry of religion that belongs only to the climate where that poetry had birth. 'The Little Flowers of St. Francis' grew out of the same kindly soil and under the same friendly skies that nourished the lilies that Jesus loved.

"St. Francis always wore his halo with an easy grace. In spite of his scourgings and fastings he was blithe and debonair. He was saint-errant, as full of romance as any knight-errant of them all. He was a lover of spiritual adventure, and delighted to attempt the impossible.

"To St. Francis voluntary poverty meant spiritual freedom. The preacher was no longer dependent on powerful patrons or rich parishioners, or even on the fickle multitudes. The missionary did not need a missionary board. He did not have to wait for a church building to be erected and a pulpit to be prepared. Even a hermitage was a superfluity. 'The true hermit,' said St. Francis, 'carries his cell about with him.' And so he and his disciples preached and asked no man's leave. Through all the by-ways of Italy they wandered, proclaiming that God was in the fields as well as in the churches. : : : And if there were no people to preach to, there were always our sisters, the birds, and now and then there was a wicked wolf who would yield to moral suasion. We smile at this way of preaching to every creature, but it is as we smile at the idiosyncrasies of one we love."

We have already quoted from the essay on "The Mission of Humor" in The Gentle Reader. Here also we find Dr. Crothers in his happiest mood as he discourses on "The Honourable Points of Ignorance," "The Gentle Reader's Friends Among the Clergy," and "The Evolution of the Gentleman." This last foreshadows an ideal democracy in which good manners will be universal. "There is no arrogance and no cringing, but social intercourse is based on mutual respect. This ideal democracy has not been perfected, but the type of men who are creating it has already been evolved. Among all the crude and sordid elements of modern life we see the stirring of a new chivalry: It is based on a recognition of the worth and dignity of the common man.²²

There is in these essays, we have said, not only delightful humour, but fine literary insight, and we shall conclude this notice with some passages from the end of the essay on "The Enjoyment of Poetry" in The Gentle Reader. We make no excuse for these long quotations. We cannot better give our readers the opportunity of feeling the rare charm of Dr. Crother's essays:

"We have a right," he says, "to ask our poets to be pleasant companions, even when they discourse on the highest themes. Even when they have theories of their own about what we should enjoy, let us not allow them to foist upon us 'wordish descriptions' of excellent things instead of poetry. When the poet invites me to go with him I first ask, 'Let me taste your grapes.'"

"You remember Mr. By-Ends in The Pilgrim's Progress, how he said of Christian and Hopeful, 'They are headstrong men who think it their duty to rush on in their journey in all weathers, while I am for waiting for wind or tide. I am for Religion when he walks in his silver slippers in the sunshine.' That was very reprehensible of Mr. By-Ends, and he richly deserved the rebuke which was afterwards administered to him. But when we change the subject and speak, not of religion, but of poetry, I confess that I am very much of Mr. By-Ends' way of thinking. There are literary Puritans who, when they take up the study of a poet, make it a point of conscience to go on to the bitter end of his poetical works. If they start with Wordsworth on his 'Excursion,' they trudge on in all weathers. They do the poem as, when going abroad, they do Europe in six weeks. As the revival hymn says, 'doing is a deadly thing.' Let me say, good Christian and Hopeful, that, though I admire your persistence, I cannot accompany you. I am for a poet only when he puts on his singing robes and walks in the sunshine. As for those times when he goes on prosing in rhyme from force of habit, I think it is more respectful as well as more pleasurable to allow him to walk alone."

"Shelley's definition of poetry as the record of the best and happiest moments of the happiest and best minds suggests the whole duty of the reader. All that is required of him is to obey the Golden Rule: There must be perfect reciprocity and fraternal sympathy. The poet, being human, has his unhappy hours, when all things are full of labor. Upon such hours the Gentle Reader does not intrude. In their happiest moments they meet as if by chance. In this encounter they are pleased with one another and with the world they live in. How can it be otherwise? It is indeed a wonderful world, transfigured in the light of thought. Familiar objects lose their sharp outlines and become symbols of universal realities. Likenesses, before unthought of, appear. Nature becomes a mirror of the soul and answers instantly to each passing mood. Words are no longer chosen; they come unbidden as the poet and his reader

'Mount to Paradise
By the stairway of surprise.'²³

BOUSSET'S "JESUS."

IN January, 1904, Dr. Wilhelm Bousset, Professor of Theology in the University of Göttingen, published a striking address which he had given on the 6th of that month at a meeting of the Protestantenverein at Bremen, "Was Wissen wir von Jesus?"—What do we know concerning Jesus? The address (published by Gebauer-Schwetschke, of Halle, price 1 mark) was an admirable vindication in reply to Kalthoff's negative position, of the historical reality of the Founder of Christianity, and the supreme significance of his life and teaching.

Later in the same year Professor Bousset published another little book, with the simple title "Jesus." It was issued in the series of Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher, edited by Lic. F. M. Schiele, of Marburg, and published by Gebauer-Schwetschke, of Halle, to some of the earliest numbers of which we have already called attention. Bousset's "Jesus" forms a double number in the series, and is sold, in paper covers, for 60 pf., or, bound in cloth, 1 mark. An edition of 10,000 was quickly sold out, and 20,000 have now been issued. (A translation into English, by Mrs. G. M. Trevelyan, is now included in Messrs. Williams & Norgate's Crown Library. 4s.)

It is a remarkable little book, the work of a distinguished scholar, a thorough master of his subject, fearless in criticism, and at the same time imbued with sincere religious earnestness and an ardent spirit of discipleship. It is a popular book in the best sense of the term, written for the people, for earnest religious people of these latter days, who want to know the truth. There is no pedantic display of learning, and the style is clear and forcible, in a German most refreshing to read.

The book is not a life of Jesus. For that, Professor Bousset says at the outset, we have not material enough. It is a picture of the great Teacher set in its historical surroundings, showing the manner of his life, the people among whom he lived and worked, his character as a teacher, the method and contents of that teaching; and then there is a concluding section on "The Secret of his Person," touching upon the question of the Messiahship, his own consciousness and attitude toward that high claim, and a final word as to the actual place of Jesus in the religious life of the world.

It is a purely human Jesus that Professor Bousset pictures for us, yet with depths of character and spiritual experience, which we cannot wholly fathom. He felt that he had the ultimate word to speak to his people, as to the relation of man to God, and therefore accepted the idea of his own Messiahship, though it was a trouble to him, and his ideal was something very different from that which occupied the popular mind. The claim that he should return to judge the world, Professor Bousset holds to belong clearly not to Jesus himself, but to the afterthought of the disciples. It was the profound impression of his personality, in closest communion with God, made perfect through suffering, which became the master force in their lives. What actually happened after the death of Jesus cannot be certainly known. It belongs, says Professor Bousset, not to the life of Jesus, but to the history of the first Christian community. The fundamental fact is the conviction of the disciples that Jesus was not dead, that he had risen beyond the power of death, and that he, the Master Spirit, would be with them always.

And that, his modern interpreter declares, has been the judgment of history. In spite of all uncertainties in the tradition, we, after all these centuries of Christian history, can still realise the power of his life, his trust in God and sense of the Divine nearness, his inflexible moral earnestness, his victory over suffering, his sure conviction of the forgiveness of sin, and immortal hope. Surrendered to the impression of his life and personality, we feel a veritable exultation of spirit. In him we recognise what are the true foundations of our own personal spiritual life.

The picture Professor Bousset presents has many winning features, but does not neglect the sterner side of the life of Jesus, and touches with perfect frankness on the limitations of his teaching, when viewed in relation to the universal needs of man. The section of the second chapter, on the preaching of Jesus, which deals with his ethics, is of the highest value. It shows how he went to the root of the matter, in regard to personal character, in man's individual relation to God, and the claims of the highest ideal; but at the same time recognises that the teaching, given in the midst of a decaying civilisation, with the expectation of the immediate end of that whole order of society, does not touch, as we might hope it would, upon the duties of a progressive social life, in the family, the city, and the state. The true inward principle is there, the inspiration of a living faith in the present God, but his disciples cannot now take all the injunctions of his teaching literally for application to modern social conditions. They must enter into his spirit, and see for themselves how it is to be made effective for the duties of the world as it now is.

It was as a true successor to the prophets of old that Jesus came, and yet how different, how much more simply human in the midst of the life of his own people, he appears to us when compared with them. "Where," asks Professor Bousset, "do we find among those powerful, sombre personalities, such sunny, purely human features as in the life of Jesus? Where do we find it related of a prophet that he called the children to him in the street and took them to his heart? The heart of Jesus beat for the children, the sunshine in their eyes, the magic of the spring-tide in their hearts, for the birds of heaven, and the flowers of the field. He gladly gave himself up on occasion to the joys and the quietness of the household, suffered Martha to be busy seeing to his wants, and Mary to sit listening at his feet, and shared in the rejoicings of festivals and weddings. The prophets walked upon the heights of life, amid the great events of history, the conflicts of the great, the intrigues of Courts, counsellors of kings far removed from the masses; while his life was spent among the people of every day, in the midst of the crowd, in intercourse with the humbler ranks of the people, among simple, common folk, in all the relations of their daily life. And for that very reason we see in him the magic of a manifold brightness and endless riches of personal grace.²

Other touches of the picture are no less charming, and, at the same time, as we have said, the sterner side of the Master's character is also faithfully depicted. The central feature is his absolute trust in God as indeed the Father of all, perfect in love, a trust which brought a great calmness and the light of a great gladness into the life of Jesus, and in the last days of bitter trial, through complete surrender to the Father's will, gave him the victory even in death. Professor Bousset says truly that in the Lord's Prayer Jesus has given us the holiest and most abiding symbol of religion, in which his true disciples will always realise their unity; while the parables, in which he celebrated the fatherly love of God, remain for us, untouched by the passing centuries in their original freshness, genuine and of the finest gold.

There are other points in this study on which we should have been glad to dwell, such as the contrast between Jesus and other teachers of his day, his attitude towards the Law, and the clear separation of the true meaning of his suffering and death from the later doctrine of atonement; but we must be content to leave the matter here, with the hope that Professor Bousset may find many readers in this country, as he has already to so remarkable a degree in Germany.

For the sake of interested friends we may add here a brief biographical note. Wilhelm Bousset was born at Lübeck, Sept. 3, 1865, the son of a Lutheran clergyman. After the school years at the gymnasium of his native town, he studied at the Universities of Erlangen, Leipzig, and Göttingen, and passed from the strict orthodoxy of his father's house, by way of the School of Ritschl, to the position of greater independence which he has since occupied. In 1891, he began to teach as Privat-docent at Göttingen, on the New Testament, and among other works brought out a new edition (1896) of Meyer's Commentary on the Book of Revelation. That work was influenced in a remarkable degree by his studies in comparative religion, and a further very fruitful result of those studies was the volume of popular lectures on "Das Wesen der Religion," published in 1903, a book which has had a great circulation and brought down orthodox anathemas upon its author. For the last ten years Bousset has been Professor at Göttingen, and in 1899 he received from Heidelberg the honorary degree of Doctor of Theology. Since 1897 he has been one of the editors of the Theologische Rundschau, published by J. C. B. Mohr (Paul Siebeck), at Tübingen.

WE are so easily affected by the smallest things that are unpleasant, that we ought to train ourselves to be influenced by their opposites. We should cultivate the friendship of little things, the quiet unobtrusive beauties that lie around our way, offering their gentle healing.—George Macdonald.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A LITTLE boy had a penny in his pocket, and wanted to do something very special with it. But that afternoon a poor woman came to his mother who was going to give her the money to buy a loaf. It so happened that she was short of coppers, and she asked the boy whether he would not give his penny to help the poor woman to buy the bread she needed for her hungry children.

He did not at all like giving up his penny. He wanted it for himself. But he felt that the woman wanted it still more. His conscience would not let him keep it; and reluctantly he produced it, and gave it to her. And then he went out of the house without his penny.

But before he had gone many yards there came over him a strange new feeling of delight. He had done a really generous thing, though it was but a single penny.

And the pleasure was so great and delightful, so much more than he had expected to get from whatever it was that he had intended to buy, that he determined on the spot to have another pennyworth of it.

He waited for the next opportunity. And when his mother wanted to give something to a poor woman again he produced his penny without being asked for it. And, poor boy! he was so disappointed. He did not get any pleasure at all, not a hap'orth; not the least little mite in the world. Can you understand why? The boy, being so much interested, soon found it quite clear.

His conscience did not approve, for there was nothing to approve of. He did not have the delight of generosity, for he had not been generous.

The first time he had made a real sacrifice of his own desires, a small one, truly, but one that he had felt. The second time it was no sacrifice but only an attempted bargain; trying to buy pleasure for himself, not giving it up for the sake of someone else.

He was a sadder and a wiser boy. He felt as if he had been cheated, though he soon saw that he had only cheated himself. But though he did not know it at the time, he had after all made a good bargain. He had learnt a lesson worth a great deal more than the cost.

Years afterwards, when he began to study philosophy, he found it very useful. Some learned men argued that we only and always act for the sake of the pleasure we hope to get, and that there is no such thing as "disinterested action," as it is called. Then he remembered this childish incident, and the question that was puzzling wiser heads, and might have puzzled him, was no difficulty at all. He knew, for he had tried; He had acted against his own wishes for the sake of someone else, when he gave the first penny. The second had only been spent to purchase the pleasure of virtue; which he did not receive after all, for there had been no virtue. And, though only a little boy, he was philosopher enough to understand the reason of the difference he had so keenly felt.

It is no use trying to cheat your conscience. If you do generous actions for the sake of praise you may get the praise from other people, but not from yourself. You will know in your conscience that you were not generous. And you will know also that the praise of others was gained by false pretences. And if you have any sense of honour that will be painful, not pleasant.

God has so made us that, if we are really generous and kind and self-sacrificing, we shall have a deep inward satisfaction. But if we act, not from pity or love, but for the sake of the pleasure, there will be no real kindness or generosity in the act; and we shall have no pleasure from it.

Do your duty without thinking of the reward, and the reward will come. But if you act for the reward you will not get it. An outward reward may of course be gained, but not the inward peace and joy. So Jesus spoke of those who fasted and prayed and gave alms "that they might be seen by men." And then he added that they had had their reward—the only one they would get.

A boy or girl who works for a prize may get it, but, after all, it isn't much. The one who looks at the work, and tries to do it well, and takes an interest in it, will find pleasure and profit in the work itself, and very likely may get the prize into the bargain. A "prig" is one who wants to be thought good, or to have the pleasure of being better than others. The boy or girl who really honours is one who wants to do right, because it is right, or in order to please God, or his parents; not for what he can gain by it, or to get pleasure for himself.

Don't think about pleasure and enjoyment. Think about people and things. Love them and take an interest in them. Do your work without grudging or trying to shirk it, and throw yourselves into the games that you like. And then pleasure will come of itself. It is a thing to be enjoyed with thankfulness when it does come; but not to be planned and thought about. And the best is often that which comes without any seeking. C. D. B.

WE hear from Mr. W. H. Shrubsole that the Polytechnic tour in Hungary during the coming autumn is to include a visit to Kolozsvár and the surrounding district. This arrangement has been made in response to a pressing invitation from the Hungarian Minister for Agriculture, who is a native of Kolozsvár. An official and popular welcome will be accorded to the tourists, and a full programme is being prepared for several days' entertainment. Mr. Shrubsole hopes that the stay at Kolozsvár may include a Sunday, so that those who are so disposed will be able to unite in public worship with our Unitarian brethren in that city. Mr. Shrubsole lectured at the Polytechnic on Tuesday evening on the coming tour. By means of excellent lantern views the beauties of the scenery, the grandeur of the architecture, the marvels of the ice cavern and of the salt mine were vividly portrayed. A pleasing interlude was supplied by a Hungarian lady and gentleman, who gave selections of national music on the piano and violin. The audience included a number of Hungarians.

UNITARIAN WORK.

THE elaborate and most interesting report of the Committee to the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, here printed in full, gives a very fair idea of the amount and variety of the work done by the Association. The extent of the secretary's correspondence is only one of many witnesses to the widespread interest in the movements of liberal religion, and we would specially commend to the attention of our readers the section of the report on Publications, as showing what has been done in the issue of popular editions of standard works, as well as of new books and pamphlets, and suggesting what may be done by friends throughout the country, as a piece of most useful missionary activity, in bringing this literature to the notice of those who may find deliverance both of mind and spirit in its teaching. That nearly ten thousand copies of Mr. ARMSTRONG'S "God and the Soul" have been disposed of is welcome news indeed; so also is the note that five thousand of the sixpenny edition of Mr. CARPENTER'S "First Three Gospels" have been sold. The new chapter, giving a summary of positive results, should be read together with Professor BOUSSET'S "Jesus," of which a notice will be found in another column.

The section of the report on Foreign Missionary Work has also some points of great interest. Many friends will be glad of the glimpse of Dr. TUDOR JONES on his voyage to New Zealand. Of immediate interest is the reference to the separation of Church and State in France, and the opportunity which may arise for tendering help to our brethren of the Liberal Protestant churches.

In this and other connections let the passage of the report as to finance be seriously noted. Work of this magnitude demands ample support, and we must not forget that the one generous subscription of £1,000 a year depends upon the standard of the other subscriptions being maintained at least at £2,000. In the coming year there is a falling off of £300 to be made good.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

COUNCIL MEETING.

A MEETING of the Council was held at Essex Hall on Wednesday afternoon, the President, Mr. C. F. Pearson, in the chair. The other members present were Rev. F. Allen, Mrs. Aspland, Mr. Ronald Bartram, Miss Burkitt, Mr. Capleton, Mr. G. H. Clennell, Miss Clephan, Rev. V. D. Davis, Mr. J. Harrison, Mr. W. Haynes, Miss H. Brooke Herford, Miss F. Hill, Mr. I. S. Lister, Mr. D. Martineau, Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., Rev. H. W. Perris, Rev. W. C. Pope, Rev. H. Rawlings, Mrs. H. Rutt, Rev. Lawrence Scott, Miss E. Sharpe, Dr. C. Herbert Smith, Mr. W. Spiller, Rev. F. W. Stanley, Mr. H. Stanus, Miss Tayler, Mr. A. Titford, Mr. T. P. Young, and the Secretary.

The minutes of the meeting held Oct. 25, 1905, were read and confirmed, and the Secretary then read the report of the committee, as follows:—

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.

SINCE the last meeting of the Council (October 25, 1905), the executive committee have held five meetings, and the various sub-committees have held twenty-seven meetings. During these five months the secretary has received 2,989 communications at Essex Hall, and 1,962 have reached the manager of the Book-room. Correspondents as far removed as the Malay Peninsula the West Coast of Africa, Jerusalem, and Tokyo desire to learn something of the principles and faith held by Unitarians. Judging from the letters and newspaper paragraphs which reach the office, there is still great ignorance and curious misconceptions respecting Unitarianism in many parts, even of the British Isles. Doctrines which have only an antiquarian interest for Unitarians cause deep perplexity to large numbers of people, and the identification of the religious life with the good life is not yet so widely prevalent as some Unitarians imagine. The committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association are not unmindful of the great need that exists for further enlightenment in theology; although their work largely consists in rendering aid to congregations and ministers whose chief aim is to lay emphasis on worship, the good life, and practical Christianity.

FINANCE.

For the year 1905 the income of the Association was as follows:—Subscriptions, £4,535 11s.; donations, £134 17s.; collections, £622 14s.; investments, £1,215 13s. 10d.; book-room sales, £1,100 9s. 7d.; book-room grants, home and foreign, £599 15s. 7d.; special income, £50 5s., making, with a balance of £42 2s. 4d. carried over from 1904, a total of £8,301 8s. 4d. Compared with the previous year this statement shows a slight falling off in subscriptions, and a slight increase under other heads, so that the total income is almost the same as in 1904.

The expenditure for the year was as follows:—Home grants to congregations, lectures, and special services, £3,391 12s. 3d.; grants of books and tracts, £360 14s. 7d.; foreign grants to churches, students, and postal missions, £793 7s. 7d.; grants of books and tracts, £239 1s.; deputation expenses, £53 7s. 6d.; book department, for printing, binding, fees to authors, expenses of carriage, advertising, &c., £1,836 6s. 7d.; anniversary expenses, including printing and postage of annual report, £71 18s. 10d.; maintenance and office expenses, including rent, postages, &c., £200 9s. 1d.; salaries of office and book-room staff, £807 18s.; transferred to Investment account, £500; balance £46 12s. 11d. There was an increase of nearly £300 in the expenditure on the book department, and a decrease of £500 in foreign grants; the new obligations at Wellington, New Zealand, will entail a larger expenditure during the current year, under the head of foreign grants.

There have been a great many losses by death during the past twelve months, and various subscriptions promised for three years have expired, and others will expire this year. In order to make up these losses, new and increased subscriptions amounting to £300 are now required, otherwise the subscription of £1,000 by an anonymous subscriber cannot be claimed.

The 226 congregational collections received in 1905 realised £595 2s. 3d., an increase of £35 on the previous year. In the early part of this year, thirteen additional congregations contributed £21 14s. 6d. It is very gratifying to find that the missionary work of the Association at home and abroad thus received the sympathy and support of 239 churches.

The committee are greatly indebted to the local treasurers of the Association for the work undertaken by them, not only in collecting from old subscribers, but in procuring new subscribers. An effort is now being made largely to increase the number of local treasurers throughout the country. The ideal arrangement would be to have a local treasurer and correspondent of the Association in connection with each congregation.

PUBLICATIONS.

The new books issued by the Association since the last meeting of the Council include the Memoir and Sermons of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong; a sixpenny edition of Dr. Charles Beard's Hibbert Lectures, "The Reformation of the Sixteenth Century in its Relation to Modern Thought and Knowledge"; "A Short History of Unitarianism," by Rev. F. B. Mott; a new edition of "The Bible, What It Is, and is Not," by Rev. Joseph Wood; a second edition of the Essex Hall Lecture by Prof. Henry Jones; also the following pamphlets:—"A Few Thoughts on the Miraculous in Christianity," by Dr. Drummond; "James Martineau and F. W. Newman as Religious Teachers," by Dr. S. H. Mellone; "Distinctive Principles of Liberal Free Churches," by Rev. H. S. Perris. The Essex Hall Year Book for 1906 contains under the list of congregations the names of the ministers from about the year 1875 to the present time, with the dates of their ministry. The value and usefulness of the Year Book are widely acknowledged.

Many of the best known Unitarian Tracts having run out of print, opportunity was taken to prepare a new series in larger type, and more convenient size. Twenty-four numbers of the series have already been issued, and others will follow as occasion requires. The first twelve have been bound in a volume under the title "What do Unitarians Believe and Teach." The sermons by Unitarian ministers now number fifteen, and seven others are in the press, and will be published shortly. The first twelve have also been issued in a bound volume.

Circulars were addressed to ministers, secretaries of congregations, and superintendents of schools calling their attention to the 6d. editions of the books by R. A. Armstrong, Charles Beard, J. E. Carpenter, F. W. Newman, and M. J. Savage; in response, a considerable number of copies were sold, but the committee would rejoice to have such admirable books circulated in tens of thousands. It is gratifying to know that nearly 10,000 copies of "God and the Soul" have been disposed of since it was first published in 1896; also 5,000 copies of the sixpenny edition of "The First Three Gospels," issued in October, 1904. A little personal interest on the part of ministers and others soon increases the sales. The other day Archdeacon Wilberforce recommended his congregation to procure a tract on the "Atonement," by Mr. Hopps, published at Essex Hall, and nearly 200 copies were purchased almost immediately.

There has been a wide-spread demand of late for information about Unitarianism. Evidence of this is seen in the fact that during the last few months 43,606 tracts have been circulated in response to British applications, and 6,526 in foreign lands. Grants of books have recently been made to 39 ministers of "orthodox" churches, and copies of Dr. Channing's "Select Essays and Discourses" to a number of students in theological colleges—all in response to personal applications.

A fourth edition of the new Essex Hall Hymnal is in the press; the hymnal in its older or revised form is now used by 180 congregations. A new edition of the little book of hymns for "Special Services," with music, has recently been issued.

HOME MISSION WORK.

Before making grants the committee require a statement of the income and expenditure from each congregation applying for aid, and the local association is invited to submit recommendations or suggestions. The following grants for the year 1906 have been voted; special conditions were attached in some cases; the grant is only paid from the date of the settlement of the minister, and ceases should he remove during the year:—Ashton, £70; Barnard Castle, £25; Bedford, £30; Birmingham, Small Heath, £50; Blackburn, £25; Boston, £20; Bournemouth, £25; Bridgend, £50; Burnley, £50; Canterbury and Deal, £20; Cardiff, £30; Carlisle, £50; Clydach Vale, £15; Congleton, £20; Crewe, £40; Crewkerne, £25; Devonport and Plymouth, £35; Flagg, £10; Framlingham, £10; Gateshead, £50; Hastings, £35; Huddersfield, £35; Leicester (Narborough Road), £20; Llwynrhwydwen, £5; London: Acton, £35; Bermondsey, £20; Forest Gate, £35; Kentish Town, £50; Lewisham, £45; Mansford Street, £15; Plumstead, £45; Walthamstow, £10; Loughborough and Ilkeston, £60; Lydgate, £10; Manchester: Bradford, £35; Broughton, £60; Chorlton, £30; Pendleton, £30; Middlesbrough, £30; Mottram, £30; Nelson, £10; Newark, £15; Newbury, £15; Newton Abbot, £10; Nottage, £15; Nottingham (Christ Church), £25; Panteg, £5; Penrhiw, £5; Pontypridd, £40; Poole, £30; Reading, £20; Ringwood, £25; Southampton, £25; Stockton, £10; Sychbant, £5; Torquay, £30; Tylorstown, £15; Wick, £5; Wolverhampton, £70; Yarmouth, £20.

Special grants towards buildings have been voted as follows:—Acton, £25; Culmpton, £20; Lampeter, £25; Newark, £5; Rhydygwin, £15; Stalybridge, £25; Sychbant, £25; also £10 for special services and lectures arranged by the committee of the Eastern Union, £10 for expenses of services at Ilford, and £50 to Richmond.

The Unitarian services organised at Blackburn by Rev. Charles Travers; at Bradford, by Rev. William Rosling, formerly a Congregational minister; at Newport (Mon.), by Rev. George Critchley; at Seven Kings (Ilford) and Wimbledon, by Rev. T. E. M. Edwards have been liberally supported by the committee, and the services in every case have created deep interest and been well attended. With energetic, sustained work, a Unitarian church could probably be established at each of these places. At Newport (Mon.) a congregation has already been formed with 45 enrolled members, who hope, if a minister is appointed, to raise among themselves in subscriptions and offertories about £150 during the first year. A convenient building has been hired, and the evening congregations average 70. The success attained at Newport should help to arouse the missionary spirit in other parts of the country, and make Unitarians more eager to share the privileges and blessings of their faith with those who are at present strangers to it.

Six lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience," by Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, were delivered at Liverpool and Sheffield, when the weekly attendance averaged 300 at the former place, and 140 at the latter. Two lectures on "The Gospels and How to Read Them" were delivered at Bradford, Bury, and Preston, when the attendances were 160, 150, and 250 respectively. The committee desire to place on record their high appreciation of the services rendered to liberal religion by these lectures by Mr. Carpenter. They have been the means of quickening interest in Biblical and theological study among large numbers of people in many parts of the country. The committee trust that his new duties as Principal of Manchester College will not entirely withdraw him from continuing this important work, at least occasionally.

Four lectures on "The Old Testament Prophets and the Problems of Social Life Then and Now," were delivered by Rev. W. G. Tarrant, under the auspices of the Manchester District Association, at the Memorial Hall: the lectures were much appreciated, though the attendance was not so large as had been anticipated.

The services by Unitarian ministers at Cambridge were continued from October, 1905, to March, 1906, when the average attendance of undergraduates and others remained about the same as during the previous year. Arrangements are now being made with preachers for the next University term beginning after Easter.

Sunday religious services or week-night theological lectures have been held at the following places, when the preachers and lecturers were sent by the committee:—Aberdare, Birkenhead, Blackburn, Blackpool, Boston, Bridgend, Burton, Chorley, Coalville, Congleton, Kendal, King's Lynn, Lancaster, Manchester (Broughton and Chorlton), Merthyr, Newport (Mon.), Oldham, Pentre, Preston, St. Helens, Seven Kings, Warrington, Wimbledon.

There are district ministers connected with the Liverpool association, the London and S. E. Counties Provincial Assembly, and the Yorkshire Union; a grant of £100 has been voted towards the salary of each of these ministers for the current year; to the Western Union, £75 has been voted: the smaller amount is accounted for by the fact that an endowment at Bridgewater is devoted to the payment of the district minister's salary. It is understood that missionary and propagandist work shall be undertaken, whenever fitting opportunity offers, by all district ministers toward whose salaries contributions are made by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

FOREIGN MISSION WORK.

For the year 1906 the following grants have been made:—Brussels, £10; Budapest and its affiliated churches, £50; Christiania, £50; Khasi Hills Unitarian Mission Stations, £75; Wellington, New Zealand, £175. Towards the expenses of carrying on Postal Mission work, the following grants have been voted:—Allahabad, £12; Banda, £12; Bombay, £12; Calcutta, £12; Madras, £12; also £12 for work in Denmark. The grants voted to students for the ministry in foreign lands are as follows:—India, £100; Japan, £75; Hungary, £50; New Zealand, £50. The committee of Manchester College, Oxford, in the case of the last three give additional grants, so that each of the students from abroad receives £100. At the present time there are only two students at Oxford, Mr. C. Raffay from Hungary, and Mr. F. Sinclair from New Zealand. Mr. R. Nagai, from Japan, will enter the College next October, and a new student from India is also expected then.

The Rev. W. Tudor Jones and Mrs. Jones left England for Wellington, New Zealand, on February 9, carrying with them the best wishes of the committee and of a large circle of friends in Swansea. In a letter received from him the other day, written on board the ship, he reports that he had organised religious services twice a Sunday for the 200 third-class passengers, with a short address for the children. He adds that a liberal-minded Wesleyan made all the arrangements for the services, and that the people listened most attentively to his expositions of the Christianity of Jesus. The newly-formed congregation at Wellington will find in Dr. Tudor Jones and his wife, devoted and zealous Unitarian missionaries.

The demand for literature explanatory of the religious principles and faith of Unitarians in all parts of the world shows no signs of abatement. Grants have been voted towards the publication of literature in Denmark, Holland, Hungary, and India in the languages spoken by the people, with the result that widespread interest has been aroused among many thoughtful, inquiring men and women in these countries. A grant of books by Unitarian writers was recently forwarded to the Imperial University of Tokyo; the letter acknowledging the gift concluded with these words:—"The most advanced section of Christians being Unitarians in Japan, these books will be highly valued by the readers." Mr. V. Tchertkoff reports that the Russian translation of Rev. J. T. Sunderland's book on the Bible has been very much appreciated, and as the difficulties of circulation in Russia are overcome it will receive a wider welcome among educated people interested in reasonable views of religion.

The separation of Church and State in France has placed the Liberal Protestants in a very difficult position, and they will for a time require the sympathy and aid of friends in other countries. Professor Chantre, of the University of Geneva, has taken an active part in organising a society whose chief work at present will be to provide a channel through which assistance may be given to congregations and ministers in need of help. Owing to the operation of the laws respecting religious associations in France, it was necessary to make Geneva the headquarters of the new society. Mr. C. F. Pearson, the president, and Mr. G. W. Brown, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Mr. W. Arthur Sharpe, members of the executive committee, have personally contributed to the expenses incurred in the formation of this society. In a short time a public statement will be issued, and it is hoped that the Liberal Protestants of France will not appeal in vain to the Unitarians of America and England for sympathy and support in their hour of trial and need.

MCQUAKER TRUST.

The committee as trustees of the Mc Quaker fund are strictly enjoined that they are only to supplement the salaries of ministers of non-self-supporting congregations who can show such an amount of congregational income as shall attest to the satisfaction of the committee a living interest in the work. The committee, in order to give the congregations at Kilmarnock and Kircaldy a fresh start and a further chance of life and development, have stretched this injunction to its extreme limit, by making a grant at the rate of £150 towards the minister's salary at each of these places for the current year. The committee are confident that Rev. William Wilson will do his utmost at Kilmarnock, and Rev. Charles Sneddon is equally desirous of devoting himself to the work at Kircaldy. It is hoped that the congregations will support the efforts of their ministers with all the sympathy, zeal, and generosity in their power.

Other grants to supplement the salaries of ministers were voted as follows:—Aberdeen, £95; Dundee, £85; Glasgow (Ross Street), £90. Aid, has also been given towards the advertising expenses of special services at Dundee and Glasgow, and £5 to the Scottish Unitarian Sunday School Union.

Lectures expository of Unitarian Christianity were delivered by Rev. E. T. Russell at Govan and Shettleston, and by Rev. Alex. Webster at Culter, Torry, and Woodside. The travelling expenses of ministers in Scotland have been paid by the Mc Quaker trustees to enable them to exchange with each other for special lectures or services. At Aberdeen, Dundee, Edinburgh, Glasgow (Ross Street), Kilmarnock exchanges have taken place. Rev. W. G. Cadman visited Dundee, and conducted special services in commemoration of Rev. Henry Williamson's ministry of forty years.

In response to an offer of a selection of Unitarian books, nine public libraries in Scotland applied for a grant, and 115 volumes were forwarded to them. There will shortly be published for circulation in Scotland two tracts by Rev. Alex. Webster, entitled "The Revolt against Calvinism in Scottish Literature," and "Robert Falconer's plan for emptying Hell."

The new Unitarian church building at Aberdeen is approaching completion, but the public opening will not take place until September 16, when Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter will preach, and also deliver a lecture on the Monday evening following.

DECEASED MEMBERS.

In the death of Mr. David Ainsworth the association has lost a former president, a man beloved for his personal courtesy and uprightness, and his high sense of public duty. Inheriting from his father a strong attachment to Unitarianism, he upheld the family tradition by a life-long interest in many of the institutions and societies connected with the denomination; his presence at the conversation and anniversary meetings of the Association will be missed by a wide circle of friends.

Within the last few days Miss Teschemacher, a member of the council, who was seldom absent from its meetings, passed away after a brief illness. She was for many years an earnest Sunday School and Postal Mission worker; her interest in India, and in all matters relating to the progress and welfare of that great land, was keen and well-informed. The Unitarian body has always numbered among its adherents many women of intelligence and high character, unselfish, devoted to good works—Miss Teschemacher was one of these honoured and faithful women, and it is with deep regret that the committee report her decease.

The PRESIDENT referred with great regret to the loss they had sustained through the death of Mr. David Ainsworth, a past President of the Association, and Miss Teschemacher, a member of the Council.

Mr. DAVID MARTINEAU moved a resolution expressing the Council's regret for the death of Mr. David Ainsworth, and sympathy with Mrs. Ainsworth and his brother, Mr. J. S. Ainsworth, M.P. It was quite true, Mr. Martineau said, that latterly, owing to failing health, they had not seen Mr. Ainsworth so often amongst them, but he had been a pillar of strength and a great help, as his father was before him, in all Unitarian work. He had helped them in many matters, especially when in Parliament, and was united to them in cordial friendship. They remembered his brother, the late William Ainsworth, who had been for some years minister at Brixton, through whom they felt drawn even more closely to the other members of the family, and now they felt the deepest sympathy with Mrs. Ainsworth and Mr. John Ainsworth in their great loss.

The Rev. LAWRENCE SCOTT seconded the resolution, and said that he had received much of Mr. Ainsworth's generosity. He recalled his special interest in their small chapels, such as those at Great Hucklow and Bradwell. He was a man whose spirit had been an example to them.

Mr. T. P. YOUNG said that he and Lindsey Aspland and Stanley Jevons, and others, had been fellow students with Mr. Ainsworth at University College, and he well remembered how in those days he was already distinguished by that spirit of helpfulness and energetic kindness to which reference had been made.

Mr. STANNUS also added a word of appreciation, and the resolution was silently passed.

A similar resolution in memory of Miss Teschemacher was also passed, on the motion of the Rev. F. W. Stanley, seconded by Miss Florence Hill. Mr. Stanley spoke of his early memories of Miss Teschemacher in his college days. She was always helpful to young people, one of the most sympathetic of friends. Miss Hill spoke of her as one of the founders of the Postal Mission, who had also done valuable work with Miss Manning for the Indian Association.

Questions on the report being invited, Miss Sharpe asked whether more could not be done to make people feel that the Association belonged to them, and Mr. Capleton asked whether more could not be done for the small churches in East London and elsewhere. He did not think that the Association was working as it might for practical religion. Other questions were asked by Mr. R. Bartram and the Rev. Lawrence Scott, and the report was adopted.

The secretary announced the nominations for the Council and Committee which had been received, and particulars as to the anniversary meetings in Whit-week.

ANNIVERSARY MEETINGS.

The committee have pleasure in reporting that the Essex Hall Lecture on Tuesday evening, June 4, will be delivered by Rev. S. M. Crothers, D.D., of Cambridge, U.S.A. Those who remember Dr. Crothers' presence at the International Meetings in London in 1901 will be eager to listen to his words in Whit-week; he will receive a warm welcome on his own account, and as the representative of the Unitarians of America. The preacher of the annual sermon on Wednesday morning, June 5, will be Rev. Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College. It is hoped that on his retirement from his arduous duties at Oxford, Dr. Drummond may be able occasionally to speak to our churches and societies out of his deep knowledge and long experience as a teacher of Christianity in its simplest and most intelligible form. The arrangements for the business meeting are not yet completed. At the public meeting on Wednesday evening, speeches will be delivered by Rev. J. Worsley Austin, of Birmingham; Dr. John Campbell, of Belfast; Rev. H. D. Roberts of Liverpool, and others. Papers will be read at the Confer.

Once on Thursday morning by Rev. Gertrud von Petzold and Rev. J. J. Wright; the subject of Mr. Wright's paper will be "Education in Relation to the State, the Church, and the Home," followed by discussion. The always popular conversation on Thursday evening will probably be held at the Portman Rooms. On Friday morning, June 7, a Conference of representatives of district associations will be held to consider ways and means of strengthening and extending our common Unitarian work all over the country. In former years these conferences have proved very helpful and suggestive, and there are at the present time several questions in connection with missionary and propagandist work that require careful consideration.

The Sunday School Association, the Central Postal Mission, the Temperance Association, the Ministers' Meeting, and other Societies are busy arranging for interesting and profitable gatherings in Whit-week.

A vote of thanks to the President, moved by Mr. Stannus, brought the meeting to a close.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETINGS:

THE annual meetings were held in Manchester last week.

The annual report, which had been previously circulated, states that although there have been no new developments during the year there has been a considerable expansion of activities in several directions. The Social Questions Committee has been full of initiative and enterprise, and the increase of the work of the Lay Preachers' Union is noted as a happy augury. Thirty-five meetings have been held of the Governing Body and its several committees. A public service followed by a conference on social questions has been held, Sunday afternoon addresses delivered in Cross-street Chapel, and literature on social questions circulated. The removal of the Rev. Charles Roper is noted as a great loss to the work of the Association. Five of the assisted churches are at present without ministers, and this constitutes a serious problem for the new committee. Bradford, one of the Association's chief centres of work is, happily, full of life and promise. Unfortunately the finances of the Association are far from sound, and there is now an accumulated deficit of nearly £600. To meet this and to provide for the carrying out of the work in the immediate future it is proposed to hold a great united bazaar next year. The report concludes with a protest against the mistaken individualism which often characterises our churches, and an appeal for interest in the wider fellowship of the associated life of the churches.

Housing Reform.

The meetings began with a conference on social questions, held on Friday evening. The President, the Rev. Dendy Agate, was in the chair, and the subject of Housing Reform was introduced by two special speakers. Mr. T. C. HORSFALL, as founder and president of the Citizens' Association, devoted his address to an able and eloquent protest against the way in which slums are allowed to grow up in our midst, together with the destruction of all vegetation and natural beauty. Ignorance of nature was, he declared, one of the things that prevented the attainment of strong religious feeling and of the highest kind of civilisation. The great importance of city planning was illustrated from the careful regulations of several other countries. But here there was no large conception of the possibilities of the city as a whole, and until some authority could control and regulate the growth of our towns, slums would recur on their fringe faster than they were destroyed at the centre. Mrs. ALDRIDGE, the secretary of the Women's Trades Council, declared that the housing problem was the most pressing of all present social questions. If we wanted to develop health and beauty among the people we must provide them with proper homes. This could be done, as some authorities or private associations had shown, and Mrs. Aldridge proceeded to give an account of successful experiments made in various places and of our powers under existing Parliamentary statutes.

Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON, chairman of the Social Questions Committee, proposed, and the Rev. CHARLES PEACH seconded, a resolution commending the work of the Citizens' Association to the associated churches, and after the chairman and the Revs. A. Leslie Smith and W. E. Atack had supported it, the resolution was unanimously adopted.

Service and Public Meeting.

The religious service was held in Cross-street Chapel on Saturday afternoon. There was a large united choir from the associated churches under the direction of Mr. Oliver Heys, who also presided at the organ. The service was conducted by the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, and the congregation was above the average.

After tea in the Lower Mosley-street schools a public meeting was held in the Memorial Hall. The President, the Rev. DENDY AGATE, took the chair, and there was a good attendance. After the singing of a hymn, the report and balance-sheet were taken as read. Their adoption was moved by the Rev. J. E. MANNING, who said they were not very cheering, but that they contained some good things, such as the record of the lay preachers. Mr. NOEL JOHNSON, who seconded, took a more hopeful view of the report, but he was very critical in regard to the ordinary conduct of worship in our churches. He wanted something more distinctive. He did not like the orthodox atmosphere which pervaded them, and referring to a recent correspondence in THE INQUIRER he urged the importance of an extended lectionary. But, above all, he would have our churches prove the reality of their belief in the brotherhood of man by more earnest service in the cause of social reform. Mr. R. C. LAW thought both of the speakers were too pessimistic. The Association and the churches also were doing good work, and would overcome all their difficulties. The treasurer, Mr. G. W. R. WOOD, lent his sanction to the more gloomy view, so far as the finances went, but the PRESIDENT, in a very rousing speech, refused to admit that he was downhearted. He believed in the Association and its cause. There was still life and initiative among us. Friend Spedding was preparing to set out on his new van crusade. He did not know if he would follow the old advice and hitch it to a star, but he, for his part, meant to hitch on the Association to the stars of faith and hope, and under the spell of this robust faith all further criticism was hushed, and the report and balance-sheet unanimously adopted. After the report came the adoption of some amendments to the constitution, which were explained by the Rev. J. A. PEARSON, a word of hearty greeting and thanks to Mr. Odgers, and a very breezy reply, and then the way was clear for the advertised speakers.

Dr. HERBERT-SMITH, who was present on behalf of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, conveyed the cordial greetings of that body, and then quickly passed to matters which, for the moment, are nearer his heart. He introduced himself as a missionary of Empire, and, as with others similarly named, he soon showed the trail of finance. But it was a very benevolent finance, concerned entirely with the good of the churches and the welfare of their ministers—in fact, it was his well-known scheme for sending one hundred ministers to the Boston Conference. His eloquent and racy speech, lit up with flashes of wit and humour, afforded huge delight to the audience, and if the fund he is so generously working for is not a success it will not be the fault of its able and enthusiastic missionary.

Mr. HARRY ISON captured the hearts of his audience at once as he told the fascinating story of the new movement at Coalville. It was all the outcome of the Postal Mission. Its correspondence had come as rays of light to lonely thinkers at Coalville, and these correspondents had at last taken heart of grace to come out and speak of the new light they had found. First they formed a reading circle, which met at different houses, followed by the curiosity of Coalville, which wondered what the new conspiracy was, and suspected them of all kinds of dark purposes. They started off this public work with an anniversary service, which left Coalville vainly struggling with the problem of the difference between a vegetarian and a Unitarian. But they had settled all such doubts now. The Rev. J. Page Hopps, Miss von Petzold, and others had been down, and Coalville now knew what it was they stood for and what they had given their hearts to. He did not know if they would succeed in planting a church there, but he could assure the meeting of the loyalty and gratitude of himself and some others. They had put their hands to the work, and, if it was possible, they would see it through.

The local speakers were the Rev. W. E. George and Mr. Richard Robinson. Mr. GEORGE pleaded for more care for the young people of our churches, and Mr. ROBINSON recalled the proposals widely discussed in THE INQUIRER some time since of joint pastorates as a solution of the problem of the empty pulpits. From that he passed to some earnest words on the social questions of our time, and the duty of our churches in regard to them.

A comprehensive vote of thanks, a hymn, and the benediction then brought a highly successful series of meetings to a close.

BLACKFRIARS MISSION AND STAMFORD STREET CHAPEL.

THE annual meeting was held in Stamford-street Chapel on Tuesday evening, Mr. H. B. Lawford, President of the Laymen's Club, in the chair. There was a social half-hour before the meeting began, during which tea and coffee were served.

After an opening hymn, the committee's report was read by Mr. A. A. Tayler, and the minister's report by the Rev. W. L. Tucker.

The committee reported a year of steady effort, but the need of more space for the growing work, and more workers. Much regret was expressed that Mr. A. H. Biggs had been obliged by the state of his health to relinquish the work he had so enthusiastically carried on for years at the mission. The annual rummage sale had produced £26 19s. 2d., and the contribution of £37 15s. 7d., the proceeds of an entertainment, organised by Mr. H. B. Lawford, was gratefully acknowledged. The committee recorded with much regret the retirement of Mr. C. F. Pearson from the office of treasurer after 25 years of service.

Mr. Tucker, in his report, recorded a large amount of useful work carried on in the schools and various clubs and classes connected with the mission. The Sunday-school had 222 children on the books, the Provident Bank had 1,227 depositors, and during the year had collected £844 12s. 4d. Particulars were also given of the Carter-lane Mutual Benefit Society, the country cottage at Mitcham, the Flower Show and Industrial Exhibition, and other matters. In the printed reports are also added accounts of the Band of Hope and Mercy, Boys' Own Brigade, "Do Good Club," "Unity Club," Temperance Society, Mothers' Meeting, Monday Popular Concerts, Young Women's Club, and the Children's Happy Evenings.

Mr. W. S. TAYLER presented the accounts, which on a total of £442 16s. 5½d. showed a balance in hand of £6 3s. 6d., but this was only due to the receipt of special donations amounting to £51 2s. 6d., and the proceeds of Mr. Lawford's entertainment £37 15s. 7d.; otherwise there would have been an adverse balance of over £80. A larger list of annual subscribers was essential. The year's list of £247 19s. 6d. showed an increase of £2 on the previous year, and there had been really new subscriptions of £12, for £10 had been lost through the death of old members.

THE CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the reports and accounts, said that it was a long time since he had first been led to take an interest in the work of that mission, through being asked by the late William Ainsworth to come and help them at a concert; he had never ceased to be interested in their work, and had been very glad to help through the performance to which reference had been made.

They were greatly indebted not only to the performers, but to those who had done so much in selling tickets. While it was natural for workers in such a district as that sometimes to be discouraged, he thought the reports showed they had much reason for thankfulness. It was admirable to see how many constant workers they had, and he would gladly induce others to take part in it. It was a work which deserved all encouragement both from those who subscribed to the funds and those who gave personal help.

The Rev. V. D. DAVIS, who seconded, spoke in the same sense, and the resolution was unanimously adopted.

Mr. PERCY PRESTON then moved a resolution of regret at the resignation by Mr. C. F. Pearson of the office of treasurer, which he had held for a quarter of a century, and grateful recognition of his services, with thanks to him and Mrs. Pearson for the generous help they had always accorded to the mission; also of satisfaction that they would still have his help and advice in the committee. It was fitting, Mr. Preston said, that he should move that resolution, because, with the exception of Mr. Lister, he was the oldest member of the committee present, and of the old Carter-lane Mission, on which Mr. F. Nettlefold and Mr. S. S. Tayler had also served. He joined the committee in 1874, and Mr. Pearson joined in 1877, succeeding the late Richard Bartram as secretary. When in 1880 the Mission was moved to the south side of the river Mr. Pearson took the treasurership, and he himself became secretary. For twenty years they had worked together, and the happiest relations always subsisted between them. Mr. and Mrs. Pearson's gifts to the mission must have amounted to something like £1,000 altogether, and as treasurer, though he may sometimes have put the drag on, wherever he was convinced that good work was to be done, he was ready to support it, even when the funds did not seem to allow it. They had been extremely fortunate in their treasurer, and deeply regretted his retirement.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE, who seconded, said that he had known Mr. Pearson during nearly the whole time he had been in office, for in about four months it would be twenty-six years since he came into that district. He had seldom met a more unassuming man than Mr. Pearson, one who kept quietly and steadily on at the good work in which he took part, a man of large-minded sympathies. It was one of the glories of the Unitarian denomination that it produced such men, and it was only right to bear testimony to their work.

The resolution was very cordially passed.

On the motion of the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, seconded by Mr. Leslie Harwood, the committee and officers were elected, with Mr. W. S. Tayler as treasurer, and Mr. A. A. Tayler, secretary.

Mr. DAVID MARTINEAU proposed a vote of thanks to the Rev. W. L. Tucker and all helpers at the Mission. He felt sure they found their reward in the work itself, and for the encouragement of those who might sometimes doubt whether they were doing any good, he recalled an experience of his own. Years ago he had taught a class of rough boys in the Effra-road Sunday-school, and it often seemed as if he could make no impression on them. But one day long afterward, as he was crossing London-bridge a great rough man stopped him, and recognised him as his old teacher in the school, and then told him how he had been for years out in Canada among the lumber-men, and remembering what he had been taught in school had taken to conducting Sunday services for the men. It was an instance how in quite unexpected ways their efforts might bear fruit, and he recalled it for the encouragement of those who were now engaged in the work.

The Rev. E. S. HICKS seconded in a cheery speech, and referred to the close relation which subsisted between Unity Church and that Mission.

The Rev. W. L. TUCKER, in acknowledging the vote, spoke warmly of the splendid band of helpers he had at the Mission, and of the inspiration he found in the constant presence on Sunday mornings of their honoured veteran, Mr. S. S. Tayler. He called the attention of friends to the new tube railway, with a station at Waterloo, which made it easy for them to come from other parts of London to Stamford-street. He felt it a privilege and honour to be allowed to engage in that work.

A vote of thanks to the chair, moved by Mr. A. A. Tayler, and seconded by Mr. Welch, was followed by the closing hymn, and the meeting terminated.

THEORIES OF FELLOWSHIP.

II.

OUR sense of fellowship with one another is perhaps as deeply felt in strictness of conscience as it is in freedom of thought. It is not a fellowship in theory only but in practice also. The right conduct of life is felt to be of more importance amongst us than a common creed. A chief bond of union among our churches lies in this sense of moral and ethical fellowship. But, as morals express themselves most naturally in the conduct of the daily life, this moral bond, considered by itself, might have a curious result upon our church fellowship, perhaps rather tending to dissolve than to cement it. For it is in the six working days of the week rather than on the Sunday that we feel this sense of comradeship the most. It is in the home, in the office, in the business world, in the city, and amid the throng of its affairs and the stress of its temptations, that we most stand shoulder to shoulder waging together this moral warfare for uplifting the customary ways and practices of mankind. We are fellow citizens, our object is to uplift the world around us, and it is in the city rather than in the churches; in the busy week rather than in the quiet sabbath hours, that we most desire to meet one another. On the Sunday the sense of useful comradeship slackens somewhat. Perhaps we wish that there were no Sunday. Like Jesus we would be doing the work of our Father every day, and not spend even one day in only thinking about doing it.

Were our moral nature our only one, we might even desire to work all night as well as all day. So much work needs doing that when once the spirit of the workman of God has seized hold upon us, all time that is not spent in the actual doing of things seems like time wasted. In such mood we feel it a matter of very secondary importance that a day should be set apart for meditation, for meeting one another in the idle act (for what doeth it?) of worshipping with words and thought only the God whom we ought to be serving by actual deeds. So, then, the moral bond that unites us in active labours during the week may actually tend to disperse us and keep us far apart on the Sunday.

For if common custom prohibit us from working together as usual in the city on that day, we are yet left free, individually, to work at home. We can be active on Sunday in solitude, if not in company. And is not this the very feeling which animates some of our hardest workers, when they grudge to spend precious hours in the church listening to familiar lessons, repeating familiar prayers and singing over again hymns that they have already sung once, if not twice before? Does not the very strength of the moral and energetic life tend to staying at home and being industrious on the quiet?

If we have here a real cause of non-attendance at church, it is well for us to face it. And let us do so fairly and squarely. It would help us a great deal to know just where we stand in this matter. The earnest worker is an earnest religious man. How did he become so? Now that his strength of character has been attained, he steps forth openly enough to unite with others in the noble fellowship of heroic workers. But has he shared with anyone the hardly fought battles of thought and of will, by which he overcame within himself the lower ideals of life, and the besetting temptations of it? Does he realise that the right guidance of his neighbour's inward thoughts and meditations upon all the deep questions of life may be as powerful a factor in uplifting the world, as the straightening of his city outwardly?

If in any way we can help one another in the hours of serious contemplation of life's great questions, if we can be together when we face the problems of the being of God, and of the great mysteries of the soul's search for spiritual good: if we can make all the deep places to be places of companionship; and if we can profit by one another's failures, as well as by one another's successes; if we can meet in frequent communion in that realm of life where prayers and thanksgivings, confessions, and resolves are the chief energies of the soul, and the springs of man's higher or lower life are forming the channels of conviction which his outward conduct will hereafter follow; then, surely we meet one another on the plane of religious and spiritual communion. And this meeting of soul and fellow soul is of infinite worth, a communion in hours of thought as well as in hours of work. The range of human imagination is ever wider than the range of human action; and a thousand ideals may present themselves to the mind, whilst the decision to adopt one or other of them bars all the rest from coming into deed. If we would have fellowship with the heights and depths of the human soul we must needs meet one another in the world of the soul's longings as well as of its doings.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me to say, in reply to many inquiries, that the vouchers, which will secure reduced railway fares to Oxford, will be issued by the time originally fixed, viz., early next week. After then, also, I shall be happy to forward them to those who have not yet applied.

JAMES HARWOOD, Secretary.
105, Palace-road, London, S.W.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

SIR,—I should be glad if you would kindly give me a little of your space to say, that all ministers, delegates, and visitors who have written the Rev. James Harwood notifying their intention to be present at the forthcoming Conference to be held at Oxford, should have received from me by the 1st of April the following:—

(1) All visitors: an invitation to the Conversazione.

(2) All ministers and delegates: tickets for tea and luncheon, and invitation to the Conversazione.

(3) All who wished me to secure lodging or hotel accommodation—the address where they are to stay.

If by any clerical error or mischance anyone has not received the above, I should be glad if they would write to me at once and I will rectify it.

Vegetarians: Will you please send in your names at once to me, so that the caterers may know how many to provide for.

Singers: We want a large choir. Do send in your names in answer to Dr. Odgers' appeal last week, and let Oxford know that Unitarians can sing.

J. WALTER COCK,
Hon. Sec. Local Committee.
37, Beechcroft-road, Oxford.

IRISH MINISTERS, DELEGATES, AND OTHERS TO NATIONAL CONFERENCE, OXFORD.

SIR,—At the February Meeting of Ministers in Belfast, I was asked to make such inquiries and arrangements as would facilitate travel from Belfast to and from the Conference, and perhaps you will allow me space to give the following particulars for the convenience of brother ministers, also delegates and others intending to be at the Conference:—

Passengers may travel by any one of three routes, viz. (a) Via Belfast Steamship Co.'s steamer to Liverpool; (b) via Fleetwood steamer; (c) from Great Northern Railway, Great Victoria-street, Belfast, to Greenore and Holyhead.

For all these routes tickets will be issued at a single fare and a quarter, which for third class and saloon is 25s. 4d., plus 6s. 4d., total 31s. 8d. These tickets are available for departure from Belfast on the evening of April 16, and return from Oxford April 20 (Friday afternoon). The return journey must be made by the same route as the outward journey.

A.—Passengers via Liverpool leave Belfast at 8 p.m., reaching Liverpool about 7.30 a.m., and proceed from Liverpool by either of three railways:—(1) Great Central (through carriage; leaves Great Central Station 8.20 a.m., reaching Oxford at 1.33 p.m.; (2) Great Western; train leaves Birkenhead (Woodside Station) 9.25 a.m., due at Oxford 1.48 p.m., with a possible change of carriage at Wolverhampton; (3) L. and N.W. Railway; train leaves Lime-street at 8 a.m., due Oxford at 12.10 p.m., with change of carriage at Bletchley.

B.—Passengers leave Belfast at 9.15 p.m., reaching Fleetwood about 4.30 a.m. Train leaves Fleetwood at 6.5 a.m., reaching Oxford at 12.10 p.m., with probable changes of carriage at Nuneaton and Bletchley.

C.—Passengers leave Belfast (Great Victoria-street) at 7 p.m. for Greenore, departing thence by steamer at 8.30 p.m., reaching Holyhead 1.30 a.m., and leaving Holyhead by train at 2 a.m., reaching Oxford at 9.30 a.m. Dining car to Greenore on this train.

RETURN JOURNEY.

Route A.—(1) Via Great Central. Leave Oxford 2.55 p.m., arrive Liverpool 8.15 p.m.; steamer leaves Liverpool 10 p.m.; (2) Via Great Western. Leave Oxford 3.55 p.m., arrive Birkenhead (Woodside) 9.10 p.m.; cross ferry to Liverpool; steamer leaves Liverpool 10 p.m.; (3) L. and N.W. Railway; leave Oxford 2.25 p.m., arrive Liverpool 8.50 p.m.

Route B.—L. and N.W. Railway and Fleetwood; leave Oxford 2.25 p.m., arrive Stafford, 7.15 p.m., depart Stafford 7.57 p.m., arrive Fleetwood 10.15 p.m. (steamer waiting) for Belfast.

Route C.—Via Holyhead and Greenore. Leave Oxford 5.40 p.m., arrive Holyhead 1.15 a.m., whence steamer leaves for Greenore at 1.40 a.m.; train leaves Greenore 6 a.m., reaching Belfast (Great Victoria-street) 7.40 a.m.

No ticket will be issued at the reduced fare (which saves 8s. 7d.) unless a specially printed voucher be presented at the booking office on the outward journey (with blanks properly filled). Mr. Harwood has provided me with a limited number of such vouchers for use by friends on this side the Channel, whose application for the same must reach me not later than Friday morning, April 13.

MISSIONARY IDEALS.

SIR,—A Van Mission is a very laudable thing, and I wish the Manchester Van every success, but there is a passage in the article on the subject which strikes me as somewhat incongruous. The writer says: "With a fine instinct, Mr. T. is taking lessons in the preparation of plain meals, and for the rest he would be a poor parson who couldn't cook a chop."

On another page of THE INQUIRER I read: "These vegetarian dinners were so good and popular that the children everywhere preferred them to the meat dinners provided at greater cost."

Thus we have two modes of life contrasted. With one, the minimum Christian virtue is to cook a chop. With the other, even school children are capable of abstaining from chops altogether, and, on the whole, prefer a more inoffensive diet.

Now, I do not wish in any way to reflect on the writer of your article. He probably is one of the kindest of men, and stands high in his profession. But surely we are here face to face with a most serious question, and that is whether we are receiving that guidance from our ministers which we ought to expect. Is cooking a chop (and what it entails) practising the law of love towards all creatures? Surely that is a more important question than that of the authorship of the Fourth Gospel? Ought not our training colleges to have something to say to the students about the art of living, and the relation of meat, tobacco, alcohol, &c., to the higher life?

THE INQUIRER recently adverted to that excellent book, "The Soul of a People," in which it is shown that the teaching of Buddha is bearing fruit to-day in the kindness towards animals shown by the Burmese people. As a contrast to that I remember reading the report of a Christian missionary who said: "By incessantly flogging the horses we succeeded in reaching the next village before nightfall, but one of the animals died" (I quote from memory).

We, however, are acquainted with a better way. Let us, then, consistently follow it, wherever it may lead, so that some day it may be said: "He would be a poor parson who couldn't do without a chop."

"THE UNITARIAN RUTS."

SIR,—The Rev. T. Rhondda Williams, who appears to have accepted an invitation to speak at the Triennial Conference of Unitarian and other similar churches, states that the invitation he received concluded with the words: "We are doing our best to get out of the old Unitarian ruts."

I think that we, as a body, are entitled to know by whom that invitation was written, and if the concluding intimation was given by the direction, or with the approval, of the Conference Committee. Many of us feel that such a statement with regard to an institution which almost entirely consists of Unitarians, and which owes its inception and successful existence to Unitarian effort and Unitarian money, is a piece of gratuitous impertinence on the part of the writer of the letter, and I repeat that we are entitled to know who wrote it and whether it represents the views of the Conference Committee as a whole.

JOHN C. WARREN.

Nottingham, March 21, 1906.

THE great thing in this world is not so much where we stand as in what direction we are moving. To reach the port of heaven, we must sail sometimes with the wind and sometimes against it; but we must sail, and not drift, nor lie at anchor.—O. W. Holmes.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Belfast: Mount Pottinger.—On Thursday, March 22, a most successful costume concert was held in aid of the Sunday-school fund, and attracted a crowded audience. Many and varied styles of costume were worn by the large mixed choir that rendered the programme, and the conductor, Mr. Alf. Brown, was conspicuous as representing Sir Roger De Coverley. With the assistance of several local artists a most enjoyable programme was rendered, and the funds of the school will benefit to an appreciable extent.

Bradford.—The Rev. E. Ceredig Jones preached at Chapel-lane Chapel last Sunday evening on "The New Thought," showing how all the teaching of science now points to unity, the absolute unity of God, in all and over all.

Chichester.—On Sunday last (25th) the twenty-third anniversary of the re-opening of the chapels was celebrated, and the attendances were very gratifying. The Rev. C. A. Hoddinott conducted the morning service; the Rev. P. Shakespeare, late of Deal, the evening.

Maidstone (Welcome Meeting).—The annual meeting of the congregation, which was also made the occasion of welcoming the Rev. Alexander Farquharson, was held under the chairmanship of Mr. F. W. Ruck, at the Old Palace, on Wednesday, March 21, and was attended by a larger number than any similar gathering for many years past. The committee's report stated that the income in respect of the year 1905 had slightly exceeded the expenditure, but that there remained a deficit of £79 16s. 10d., which it was hoped would be cleared off by special donations given for that purpose. Since Mr. Farquharson's ministry commenced in December last, the prospects of the chapel had much improved, the morning congregations having doubled in number, and those in the evening usually exceeding 220. It was announced that sixteen new subscribers had been enrolled, a number which since the meeting has increased to twenty-two. The improved income from this source, and from the increased offertories, had enabled the committee to add £25 to the stipend of the minister. The business meeting over, the chairman welcomed Mr. and Mrs. Farquharson on behalf of the congregation, and was followed by other speakers, both old and new subscribers, who spoke of the great satisfaction they had felt in attending the services, and in witnessing the new life which was being infused into the cause in Maidstone. The Rev. H. W. Perris, of Forest Gate, and the Rev. W. W. C. Pope, of Lewisham, were present, and also addressed the meeting.

Manchester: Moss Side.—A most successful bazaar was held in the school on Friday and Saturday, March 23 and 24. On Friday the proceedings were opened by Mrs. Roper, and on Saturday by Rev. Charles Roper, of Kilburn, late minister of the Moss Side Church. The object of the sale was to provide funds to pay off the balance due to the treasurer and the remaining debt on the organ. The amount realised was £220, so that the church is now absolutely free of debt. On Sunday Mr. Roper preached the anniversary sermons to large congregations.

Saffron Walden.—The services last Sunday at the General Baptist Chapel commemorated the thirty-first anniversary of the settlement of the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth as minister. "Man's Greatest Work—the Christian Ministry" was the subject of the morning sermon, and that of the evening "The Ethics of Christianity in Daily Life." Mr. Brinkworth quoted some paragraphs from the will of Robert Cosens, founder of the church in 1711, and chief steward of Audley End Royal Palace, setting forth the foundation principles of the church. The pastor was warmly congratulated during the day.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel (Presentation).—A concert was held in Channing Hall on Wednesday evening, March 21, under the auspices of the Upper Chapel Literary and Social Union, when a presentation from the congregation was made to Mr. George Wragg, I.S.M., on his retirement from the post of organist of Upper Chapel after nearly thirty years of service. Mr. G. H. Hunt presided, and the presentation consisted of an illuminated address and a cheque for fifty guineas, towards which there had been 101 subscribers. The address was read by Mr. H. R. Bramley. Mr. Wragg had previously received gifts of a silver fruit dish and grape scissors from the choir. Mr. Wragg gratefully acknowledged the presentation.

Yorkshire Ministers' Meeting.—By the kind invitation of Mr. Henry Lupton, a meeting of Yorkshire Unitarian ministers was held at his residence on Monday afternoon, March 26. There were eighteen ministers present. The object of the meeting was to consider the possibility of arranging regular meetings. The Rev. Charles Hargrove presided, and gave an interesting account of previous attempts in past years to form a Union of Yorkshire Ministers. He pointed out that the main difficulties had always been of a practical kind, such as the providing of travelling expenses and the offering of private hospitality. Much feeling utterance was given to the sense of isolation felt by ministers in lonely outposts of duty, and a strong desire was expressed for a closer bond of union to be secured by meeting together more frequently for the consideration and discussion of questions of interest and importance to ministers. After some discussion about ways and means, in which nearly all joined, it was finally decided, by resolution, to form a union of Yorkshire ministers, and to hold meetings in Leeds on the same day as the quarterly meetings of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union. Rev. J. S. Mathers was appointed secretary. At the conclusion, Mr. Hargrove referred to the termination of the ministry of Rev. John Fox at Hunslet, and expressed on behalf of all a sincere wish for his future happiness. A warm and hearty welcome to the Union was also extended to Rev. W. Rosling. Both gentlemen suitably responded. After tea a hearty vote of thanks was passed to Mr. and Miss Lupton for their kind hospitality.

WE are glad to learn that the Rev. Edgar Lockett has returned home after a six months' stay at Davos, completely restored to health. His thorough cure is an example of the good that may be done at Davos to those who go there in time. Mr. Lockett won the highest appreciation, both of his teachers at Oxford, and also of those who watched the two years' work he did at Pudsey, and we trust that he may soon find another settlement where his services as a minister will again be welcomed.

IN the March number of the Magazine of Fine Arts (Newnes, 1s. net) there is the second of Mr. Alfred Jones's articles on "Some Old Silver Communion Plate of English Nonconformity." There are pictures of communion plate belonging to Upper Chapel, Sheffield; Matthew Henry's Chapel, Chester, and to the chapels at Bridgwater, Chichester, Macclesfield, and Chorley. Belonging to the last named are a cup and porringer presented by Abraham Crompton in 1711 and 1748 respectively. There are also two seventeenth century cups belonging to Hapton, near Norwich.

WHAT DO UNITARIANS BELIEVE AND TEACH?

Fcap. 8vo, 284 pp., cloth, 2s. net, postage 3d.

Contents.—Chapter I.—BRIEF STATEMENT OF UNITARIANISM (BROOKE HERFORD). II.—UNITARIAN CHRISTIANITY EXPLAINED (R. A. ARMSTRONG). III.—PLEA FOR UNITARIAN CHRISTIANITY (W. COPELAND BOWIE). IV.—WHAT MUST I DO TO BE SAVED (C. J. STREET). V.—THE DOCTRINE OF THE ATONEMENT (JAMES HARWOOD). VI.—THE BIBLE A HUMAN BOOK (FRANK WALTERS). VII.—MODERN BIBLICAL CRITICISM (CRAWFORD H. TOY). VIII.—MIRACLES AND MODERN KNOWLEDGE (J. T. SUNDERLAND). IX.—INCARNATION (W. CHANNING GANNETT). X.—PRAYER AND MODERN THOUGHT (C. GORDON AMES). XI.—THE IMMORTAL HOPE (J. W. CHADWICK). XII.—OUR UNITARIAN GOSPEL (M. J. SAVAGE).

The outlines of Unitarian history and belief, and several of the essays in this volume dealing with theological questions, have been circulated as tracts in tens of thousands. Most of them have been revised by their authors and reprinted several times. The essays on 'Miracles,' 'Incarnation,' and 'Prayer' are recent additions to the series.

Unitarians have no authoritative creed or confession of faith. Ministers and congregations are 'free' to modify their beliefs with advancing knowledge. The method, spirit, and results of what is called 'the Higher Criticism' are accepted by Unitarians. Varieties of thought and expression will be discovered by the discerning reader among the different writers, but fundamentally they are in agreement on the great essentials of religion.

NOTICE.

Next week, on account of Easter, "The Inquirer" will be published on Thursday. Editorial Matter and Advertisements should be sent in as early as possible.

The official Report of the National Conference Meetings at Oxford, April 17—20, will be published in "The Inquirer" in two enlarged numbers, April 21 and 28. The Report will not be issued separately in book form. Orders for extra copies of these two Conference numbers should be sent in at once.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

MANY friends will hear with sorrow of the death of M. S. Cash, of Hampstead, at Milan on Tuesday, from heart failure. The Rev. Henry Gow, who was of her party in Italy, will return home on Saturday, and will preach on Sunday at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead.

THE Rev. W. G. Tarrant and Mr. Ion Pritchard were heard of at Jerusalem by telegram last week, and this week they have been in Galilee. According to their programme of travel they should reach Cairo on Tuesday next, and leaving there on the 13th inst. arrive at Marseilles on the 18th inst., on the way home. We had hoped to publish another letter from Mr. Tarrant this week, but it has not reached us in time.

We hear that the place in the programme of the triennial meetings at Oxford, rendered vacant by the lamented death of Mr. G. Carlsake Thompson, will be filled by Dr. Herbert Smith, who has kindly undertaken, at short notice, to open the discussion on the Thursday morning. Death has also removed another friend who had intended to be present—Miss Teschemacher—who had been appointed to represent the Central Postal Mission.

THROUGH the kindness of Dr. Murray, editor of the great "New English Dictionary," visitors to Oxford will have an opportunity on the Thursday afternoon at 2.30 of visiting the Scriptorium, the workshop in which that famous work is prepared. This and other visits to the sights of Oxford are arranged so as to interfere as little as possible with the meetings, but with such a full programme a certain amount of overlapping is inevitable.

At the meeting of the National Unitarian Temperance Association to be held at Oxford in connection with the National Conference meeting on Wednesday, April 18, a paper on "The Development of the Temperance Movement" will be read by Miss Clara C. Lucas, of Darlington. The Rev. Frederic Allen is to preside, and discussion is to follow. The Association will be represented at the National Conference by Mr. W. R. Marshall, the organising secretary.

WHILE the Liverpool University has not yet followed the lead of its nearest neighbour in the establishment of a Free Faculty of Theology, an important step was taken last week in the inauguration of a Board of Biblical Studies. Lord Derby, Chancellor of the University, presided, and was supported by the Bishop and several leading Churchmen, as well as by the Rev. J. Collins Odgers and Mr. Charles Jones. Mr. Odgers is a member of the Executive Committee. The Board is not to deal with the history of doctrine or apologetics, but the Biblical studies for which it is to provide will include Semitic languages in literature, Hellenistic Greek, and ecclesiastical history. The Rev. J. T. Mitchell, rector of Wavertree, is hon. secretary of the Board. The inaugural lecture is to be given by the Bishop of Birmingham next October, and among the promised lecturers are Professor Peake (of Manchester), Mr. Fiddian Moulton, and George Harford.

THE new number of the Hibbert Journal opens with a Catholic's Reflections on Auguste Sabatier's "Religion of Authority," by Dom Cuthbert Butler. The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter follows with an article on "How Japanese Buddhism Appeals to a Christian Theist." There is the third of Professor Henry Jones's articles on "The Working Faith of a Social Reformer," Sir Oliver Lodge's second article on "Christianity and Science," and much else of serious interest.

WRITING in last week's Christian World on the coming Education Bill, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie uttered a serious warning against neglect of the question of popular management and control. As to the religious difficulty he said: "Personally I am in favour of a secular system as the just and logical solution of the difficulty in a country divided as England is in its ecclesiastical and theological allegiance. I believe, however, that a large majority of the working classes, whose children attend public elementary schools, have no objection to a brief morning lesson of an ethical and broadly Christian type based on passages selected from the Bible. But if any deliberate attempt were made by ecclesiastic or priest to make converts, or to pester the children by the inculcation of dogmatic theology, working men would prefer secular schools. The endless talk about respecting the wishes of the parent deceives no one familiar with what goes on. Even among Roman Catholics I found parents were quite content that their children should imbibe 'School Board religion' until the priests insisted upon their removal to denominational schools."

THE Act of 1902 has, in Mr. Bowie's view, has proved a hopeless failure in the matter of administration. It is simply impossible for busy members of a county council to give sufficient attention to the schools. "It seems to me that there is grave danger of this side of the education question becoming overlooked. Unless it is seriously considered and some remedy provided in the new Education Bill, it will be idle to suppose that we shall have anything deserving the name of public management and control. In the large rural counties smaller districts are required; in the boroughs, without any great dislocation, an independent Education committee, on the same day and on the same register as the Councillors, might be elected; and in London an Education Authority, charged with the administrative control of elementary, secondary, and technical education, should be set up, to be elected also, if thought well, on the same day and on the same register as the county council. If it is still desired to retain the power to co-opt a few additional members on account of their special experience or gifts, this could easily be provided for. The Education Bill for Scotland, introduced by the late Government in 1904, contains several excellent provisions which might quite well be embodied in the new Education Bill."

At a meeting of the Churchmen's Union on Tuesday afternoon in St. Martin's Old Vestry Hall, Charing Cross, Dr. Rashdall read a paper, "A Plea for Undenominationalism." Churchmen, he said, ought to give up the attempt to dominate religious education, and join with Non-conformists to secure an education which would satisfy the great majority. He was opposed to the system of "facilities," and if it were tried, it would be sure to break down. Religious teaching should be given by the regular teacher, whose influence would always be greater than that of the visiting denominationalist. The fundamentals of Christianity ought to be taught, for not to teach the children that there is a God was a sure way to teach them that there is no God. For the teaching of Fundamental Christianity the New Testament was sufficient. The Founder of Christianity surely knew best how to teach his own religion, and the Apostles were as good theologians as Athanasius. The Education Authority would have to draw up a syllabus of Bible teaching such as the great majority of the people desired. The extremists, of course, would not be satisfied, and Mr. Birrell must make up his mind for the rest of his life to the relentless hostility of the Bishop of Birmingham, Dr. Clifford, and Lord Hugh Cecil. Canon Hensley Henson was in the chair, and pleaded for a sympathetic understanding of the Nonconformist position.

THE Churchmen's Union is to publish this year only two numbers of its organ, The Liberal Churchman (Williams & Norgate, 1s. 2d. post free). The January number has an article on "Disestablishment in France," by M. Victor Leuliette, and the Dean of Ripon, writing on "The So-called Representative Church Council," renews the protest which he made unavailingly at the meeting of that body last November against such an attempt to sectarianise the Church of England. "The Church," he says, "is the whole body of those who adhere to the Christian society in the whole range of their lives"; it is "the nation turned Christian," and the tendency of the Council would be to emphasise clerical dominion in a manner foreign to the genius of the English people.

MESSRS. WILLIAMS & NORGATE announce for inclusion in their Crown Theological Library Dr. Hermann's "Communion of the Christian with God." The work has been brought entirely up-to-date. All the additions and corrections recently included in the new German edition have been incorporated in the translation made by Rev. R. W. Stewart. The book will comprise nearly 400 pages, and be published at 5s.

TOWARDS SOCIAL REFORM.

II.

BUT underlying our whole system of industry there is the question of money, which reformers tell us must be faced before we can hope to build the desired bridge. Under present conditions prices are estimated in gold, they represent the value of other commodities in relation to gold. But those prices are not determined by a simple ratio between the amount of coined gold and the amount of other commodities in existence. Two other factors are concerned: (1) The rapidity with which the coins circulate, hoarded coin has no influence on prices, and (2) the extent to which goods are purchased on credit. In civilised countries a comparatively small amount of gold serves as the basis of a very much larger amount of credit. Goods are paid for with promises to pay for them in gold, and so long as people are content not to require the fulfilment of these promises, all goes well. But when credit is shaken, with or without cause, that is, when a larger demand than usual is made for these promises to be fulfilled, then come disaster and wide-spread misery, because the fall in prices, or the rise in the value of gold, may be enormous when gold alone is called upon to take the place which has previously been taken by gold plus credit. Credit, therefore, in its usual form, is by no means an ideal supplement to gold in the determination of prices. Gold plus promises to pay in gold gives us a money which cannot be trusted to maintain a stable value. Moreover when we remember the disturbance to prices caused by the discovery of fresh goldfields, and when we realise the evils inseparably connected with gold-mining, evils of which the worst and last examples are to be found in South Africa, we may well pray to be delivered from its tyranny. Gold, again, is a commodity which may be "cornered," probably more easily than wheat, and the result of a successful operation would be enormous fortunes for the few obtained by a toll levied on the rest of mankind.

Why do we want money at all, why not be content with barter? Money is required to discharge two functions: to be a medium of exchange, and to be a common measure of value. Suppose a tailor wants a table. Without money, he would not only have to find someone who wants a coat he can make, but he who wants a coat must have a table to get rid of, and the coat and table must be of the same value for a fair exchange to be made. With the aid of money the tailor sells his coat to one man, buys his table of another, and adjusts any difference in value between the two articles. But money need not be gold. It may be "coined credit," paper stamped by the State and made legal tender. Why use gold with all its attendant evils when we could use paper which costs nothing? The only answer is, I believe, that Governments have not been able to devise a sufficiently steady currency which would keep prices level, and have not proved themselves sufficiently trustworthy not to exceed the amount of a legitimate issue of paper money. The latter difficulty is undoubtedly more serious than the former. It is a moral difficulty which causes "mankind to be crucified on a cross of gold." It is by no means beyond the resources of economic science to suggest how the amount of paper money in circulation could be regulated so that contracts, salaries, &c., should have a steady value, without danger of favouring those who pay one year and those who receive another. This function is most imperfectly discharged by gold, and still more imperfectly by gold plus our present loose method of credit. But a really scientific system has been set forth which provides that the amount of paper money in circulation should be automatically regulated by the average price of commodities. The amount of money would increase as prices fell and diminish as they rose, and thus prices would be kept at a steady level exactly in the same way as a governor keeps a steady speed on a steam engine. One may readily admit that years of preparation would be required for the introduction of such a system, but if the system is worth what is claimed for it, the sooner these years of preparation begin the better.

There's no through booking to a Kingdom of Heaven established on earth, but we can take our ticket for part of the journey if we know the right direction, and then, maybe, the next stage of the journey will become plain.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

SIR,—The pointed letter of my friend Mr. Warren makes it desirable, perhaps, that in justice to the committee of the National Conference and myself, as secretary, I should explain what after all is a simple matter.

When the committee fixed upon "Outlook of Liberal Religion" as the subject for one of the sessions of the forthcoming triennial meetings, Mr. Jacks, in virtue of both his personal qualifications and his special opportunities as editor of The Hibbert Journal, was at once chosen to be invited to read a paper. But the subject is a large one, with many aspects, and it was felt that there would be great advantage in securing, if possible, papers from men of recognised position belonging to other religious communions. This happy suggestion was in keeping with our best traditions. Personally I am a Unitarian born and bred, and as such I have always understood that width of outlook and largeness of heart were what we especially admired in others, and cherished and cultivated in ourselves. And so it came about that the committee resolved with much cordiality to invite Revs. Dr. Rashdall and T. Rhondda Williams to read papers. One member of the committee knew Dr. Rashdall, another was an old friend of Mr. Williams, and each of them, with the greatest kindness, undertook to convey the respective invitations. Of course the invitations were given in the name of the committee, but, under the circumstances, the communications were naturally private and friendly, and not official. No one therefore need feel that either he himself or the conference is in any way compromised.

I venture to hope the matter may be allowed to rest here. We look forward with much interest to what Dr. Rashdall and Mr. Williams may have to say, and their kindness in coming to address us will, I feel sure, be reciprocated by a very genial and hearty welcome.

JAMES HARWOOD, Secretary.

April 2, 1906.

SIR,—Vouchers procuring return tickets to Oxford for a fare and a quarter and copies of the Conference Handbook have been sent to all who have applied to me for them. I hear that on former occasions there has sometimes been a difficulty because booking clerks had not received the necessary instructions. To prevent a recurrence of this I have secured from the managers of the following railway companies a promise that instructions shall be given:—L. & N.-Western, L. & S.-Western, Midland, Great Western, Great Eastern, S.-Eastern & Chatham, North-Eastern, Great Northern, Great Central, Caledonian, North British, London & Brighton, Lancs. & Yorks., North Stafford, Cheshire Lines.

I shall be glad to hear if there are any friends, from whose stations through tickets to Oxford are issued, who are not provided for in this list.

The Rev. Alex. Ashworth has already announced the railway and boat arrangements for Irish visitors.

Further vouchers I shall have much pleasure in forwarding on application from those who intend to be present.

IS THE FREE LENDING LIBRARY AN UNMIXED BLESSING?

SIR,—The author of the article on this subject in your last week's issue has raised a subject of considerable importance. As a member of a Borough Free Library committee for fourteen years may I be allowed a word upon it? The writer's answer is in the negative, and I agree with him. The reports of all free libraries show that the number of issues of all classes of books, except that of fiction, in proportion to the stock, is exceedingly small. There are generally conflicting opinions in the committees of such institutions. On the one hand, are those who think that it is the duty of the committee to provide the best obtainable works in science, theology, history, and the like, leaving the responsibility of reading them with the public, and hoping that there will, at least, be some serious-minded persons who will use them; the other opinion is that it is an obligation to spend money on such books only as are likely to be read. The objection to the first opinion is that it is not right to tax everybody in a community for the benefit of the infinitesimally small proportion of inquiring minds, especially as books of solid worth are, as a rule, far the most expensive. The objection to the second is that it is equally unjust to tax the community for the amusement of a number of persons relatively large indeed, but still few in proportion to the total number who pay rates.

In many free libraries on a Saturday evening will be found a crowd of women and girls getting their Sunday reading, that most in demand being the works of such writers as Marie Corelli and Hall Caine, against which I will say nothing except that it is hardly the sort of literature for the purchase of which the public should be compelled to contribute. In the magazine rooms those magazines most read are the most flashy. In the newspaper rooms journals of literary and other worth are little read, while around the stands of those which contain sporting news will be found little groups of persons, the outer ones stretching to get a peep over the others' shoulders. It may be said, of course, that no rate supported library can be established without the ratepayers' consent. That is true only if utter indifference may be counted as consent. Mr. Carnegie, no doubt, is inspired by an earnest desire to do good by his benefactions, but had he had a little experience in the actual management of free libraries he would have held his hand, and sought diligently for a less doubtful opening for his generosity. How often those who know best how to make money, know least what to do with it!

A CASE OF IGNORANCE.

[The following curious anecdote is taken from a MS. book formerly belonging to the Rev. J. J. Tayler; and, judging by the reception it has met with from several to whom I have read it, is perhaps worth bringing before the readers of THE INQUIRER.—R. T. HERFORD.]

A remarkable instance of ignorance in a man of superior rank, communicated to me by the late Mr. Seddon, of Warrington, who had it from Lord Willoughby, and he from Dr. Sæcker, then Bishop of Oxford, who was afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury.

A gentleman of considerable fortune in Oxfordshire, who had spent his whole life in gaming, hunting, drinking, &c., fell sick at the age of 34, and finding himself very ill, and being very [word illegible], he sent for the Bishop of Oxford to come and see him. As he was a man of note in the country his lordship waited on him. On coming to him, he found him in bed and much distressed. The sick gentleman told him he was very ill, believed he was going to die, knew not where he was going to, nor what should become of him, and begged he would say some good thing to him. His lordship talked to him after a proper manner. The sick gentleman then begged he would read some good thing to him, as he had never read any in his whole life. His lordship, with some difficulty, got a Bible from one of the servants, and read Matt. v. to him. When he had done, the sick gentleman asked him "who it was that wrote those good things?" His lordship, a good deal surprised, told him he had been reading the 5th chapter of St.

Matthew. "O," cried the sick gentleman, "my good old friend Sir Matthew Featherstone. Could he write such good things?" This Sir Matthew had been one of his bottle-companions. And being fully persuaded that he had written those good things, he added a codicil to his will, and left him £800.

THE Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermon in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit is on "The Rights of Man," and thus it concludes:—

"Here, then, are four indisputable Rights of Man: Life, Freedom, Ownership, Fair Play. We are all ready enough to allow them, all clamorous to insist upon them if in our own persons they are threatened or violated. But how very far are we yet from having obtained a universal recognition of them as imperative rules of private and public conduct. They were acknowledged thousands of years ago, as the earliest codes of law bear witness, but when we look round the world we are appalled to find that so little heed is paid to them even to-day. What security for life or property has the Russian Jew? What liberty has any Russian to speak otherwise than is agreeable to the authorities? What equivalent for long hours of labour does the sweated toiler get in an over-crowded trade? Or what respect even for the right of life have we when we tolerate it that children should die by thousands because of the ignorance, the neglect, the poverty of their parents?

"Very elementary these rights, yet the problems they suggest are such as have foiled the most diligent investigation. They are engaging the attention of reformers in every nation and dividing as to method those who are best agreed as to the desired end. Meanwhile it is the duty of us all to remember and to reverence the inalienable Rights of Men, of the poorest and of the rich, of the highest and of the lowest. 'Pay to all that which you owe.' The rights of your neighbour, of your fellow countrymen, of mankind at large are debts due to them, not to be disregarded in any case without sin. 'Whoso mocketh the poor,' says the Hebrew proverb, 'whoever slights his complaint or takes advantage of him because he is poor and weak and helpless,' reproacheth his Maker.' Our debts to our fellow-men God holds as due to Himself, and the just payment of them He Himself acknowledges. Therefore 'Pay to all that which you owe to them.'

"And yet there are debts which will always be owing, for Love has its Rights as well as Justice, and if these come last they are not least, in God's sight not even less, for Love is Law, and without Love there were no 'fulfilling the Law.'"

THE next Lees and Raper Lecture will be delivered in the City Temple on Thursday, October 25, by the Rev. Dawson Burns who has chosen for his subject "The Bible and Temperance Reform." The Rev. R. J. Campbell has consented to preside. The date of the lecture occurs during the week of the Jubilee Celebration of the National Temperance League, in anticipation of the visit to the Metropolis during that week of a large number of temperance friends

LITERATURE.

A MODERN RENDERING OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

WRITING of "Some German Books," in the INQUIRER of December 17, 1904, we referred to the forthcoming translation of the New Testament into modern German, with a commentary "in the light of the history of religion," by a number of well-known liberal theologians. The work was announced to be issued in parts, and completed in two large volumes, at a subscription price of 10 marks. The first volume, containing the Synoptic Gospels and the Book of Acts (pp. 612) is now completed, and a considerable part of the second volume (including the chief Pauline epistles and the Epistles of James and Peter) is also issued. The publishers hope to complete the whole work during the present year. The eager reception given to this elaborate work in Germany has far exceeded the expectations of the authors and publishers. Before the second part was issued in the spring of 1905, there were already 3,000 subscribers, and by September the number was over 5,000. Five parts were then out, and it was clear that the work could not be kept within the compass originally planned. Thus the subscription price, twice raised, is now 14 marks, which is to include a full index, not originally contemplated, for which the earlier subscribers will have to pay separately.

On this eminent success authors and publishers are to be warmly congratulated. It is a sign not only of the great excellence and living interest of their work, but of the earnest and widespread desire of educated people throughout the country for reliable information concerning the New Testament, and an interpretation, which shall bring it once more into touch with their actual religious life. This is what the new commentary achieves, as it seems to us, in a most admirable manner.

Professor Johannes Weiss, of Marburg, is the editor of the whole work, and contributes also the commentary on the Synoptics, with a masterly introduction. The general introduction on the history of the New Testament is by Professor Jülicher, of Marburg, to which there is prefixed a brief, but helpful essay by Professor Baumgarten, of Kiel, on "The Practical Value of an Historical Interpretation of the New Testament." The commentary on the Book of Acts, which concludes this first volume, is by Privatdocent Lic. R. Knopf. The commentary on the Epistles to the Galatians and Corinthians, part of the second volume already issued, is by Professor Bousset, of Göttingen, whose "Jesus" was noticed in last week's INQUIRER. These names, and that of Professor Gunkel, of Berlin, are a pledge of the high quality of the work, which, we must hope, will find many readers in this country also. It is designed for people of education, who are ready to give themselves to the serious study of the books of the New Testament. No knowledge of Greek is required. It is a book for the German people in their mother tongue; and we could wish that it might be a book for the English people also. The new translation is into vigorous modern German, and we may add that, while the commentary is in smaller type than the text (some 800 words to a page), it is all thoroughly readable.

The preface states the main purpose which the writers have had in view. The Church and the theologians, they say, have not hitherto done their duty in the matter of Bible teaching, to help the people to understand the actual historical growth of the early Christian literature, and to distinguish between what is merely temporary and what of abiding spiritual worth. Many of the conceptions natural to the writers of the New Testament are altogether alien to our present modes of thought. Not only is the atmosphere of "miracle" out of harmony with the Divine order of the universe as it now appears to us, but equally foreign are some of the forms of thought in Paul's arguments and in the imaginative pictures of the Book of Revelation. There are even words of Jesus himself which appear to us quite impracticable under the conditions of modern life.

"It is by no means due to lack of earnestness, but very often to a noble sincerity of feeling, when many people, for such reasons as these, read their Bible with a feeling of alienation and protest, or else lay it aside altogether. And yet they have themselves a distinct feeling that they are thereby losing something very precious and necessary. Often does one hear the lament among earnest thinking people that they, through no fault of their own, can no longer find the way of access to the eternal treasures of the Bible."

To give the true guidance is the purpose of this work. Those who have taken part in it, "have recognised it as their duty, by means of an historical interpretation of the earliest records of Christianity, to make it clear to their contemporaries how the religion of Jesus arose, how under the influences of the spirit of that time it took the form in which we find it in the New Testament, and how already in that primitive form the new religious and moral life, in itself so simple, appealing directly to every sensitive heart, was closely bound up with forms of thought strange to us and the culture of that age, which for us has long since been dead."

Such knowledge comes with liberating power to the earnest mind, oppressed by the want of harmony between the teaching of the Church and its own deepest thought. It leads to the abiding truth of religion, helps men to strip away the outer husk of the old forms of thought, and to feel once more its living power. Thus interpreted, in the light of modern thought, Christianity reveals more clearly and powerfully than ever its fundamental purpose, "in truthfulness and purity of thought and feeling, in self-discipline and self-devotion, without which the ideal of love to God and the brethren cannot be realised."

To this end the authors rightly say, it is not enough simply to accept a number of results of modern criticism; one must read for oneself, and follow the process of thought, to enter into the heart of the ancient literature; and so they appeal for an earnest study of their work. Whoever will be at the pains of following their guidance will find a world of very living interest opening out to him, in the field of fascinating historical research, in close contact with the abiding realities of religious life.

Professor Jülicher's general Introduction on the "History of the New Testament" tells of the rise of the literature and its gradual acceptance, side by side with the Old Testament, by the early Church, and the final determination as to what books should be included in the Canon. It was the sense of the growing Catholic Church in the second and third centuries, as to what best met the needs of its own religious life, that practically determined what books should be included, and then to secure the position their apostolic authority was assumed. The account of the fortunes of various books, particularly of the Book of Revelation, is of great interest, and then for a thousand years such questions in the Church had rest, until the Reformation brought a new freedom of judgment, if not to disturb the Canon, at least to measure the worth of the several books, as when Luther exalted the Pauline Epistles because of the doctrine he found in them, and called the Epistle of James an Epistle of straw. And then also the critical study of the text began, and the translation into modern languages. Dr. Jülicher tells of the early critical studies of the New Testament, and speaks with high honour of F. C. Baur, for the great impulse he gave to historical criticism, while showing how many of his judgments have been superseded by fuller knowledge. Some notes as to the most ancient manuscripts and versions conclude this Introduction.

Then follows Professor Weiss's Introduction to the Synoptic Gospels, which treats in a most illuminating manner of the material out of which those three Gospels were constructed, both as to the narrative of events and the words of the teaching. It is a most fascinating study, which if the whole of this work cannot be rendered into English we should plead to have separately given to our people. On a rough estimate, we should say that it contains about 25,000 words, which is more than some of the Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher. As an example of the special points of interest in this study we may refer to the manner in which Professor Weiss shows the influence of the Old Testament in the moulding of the Gospel tradition. Another point is his description of the manner in which the teaching of Jesus would be preserved, though for years never written down.

In the intimate company of the disciples there were many who could recall the words of the Master's teaching, and as they came afterwards to apply these words to their own religious life, the memory of one would correct the other. This was the regular method of teaching in the schools of the Rabbis, the scholars constantly repeating the teacher's exact words, so that a good scholar was likened to a cemented cistern from which there

* Die Schriften des Neuen Testaments, neu übersetzt und für die Gegenwart erklärt von Otto Baumgarten, Wilhelm Bousset, Herman Gunkel, Wilhelm Heitmüller, Georg Hollmann, Adolf Jülicher, Rudolf Knopf, Franz Koehler, Wilhelm Lueken, Johannes Weiss. was no leakage. The relation of Jesus to his disciples was indeed of a freer character than that which ruled in the learned schools of the Rabbis, yet their reverence for him would be sure to lead them to a constant repetition and remembrance of his words, and we may be confident that they were able to preserve the main points of his teaching for a generation or so, until they were reduced to writing.

"We must remember that those people had a far fresher and more practised memory than we children of an age of paper. Our memory is partly injured by overloading, partly enfeebled by want of practice. We very likely should not be in a position to be faithful guardians of such a tradition. But think of the almost incredibly receptive memory of our children, or of many among the people who do not read much but are the more eager listeners, and it will be quite conceivable that in the circle of the first disciples the words of the Lord were preserved with great faithfulness. And finally, consider the character of the material of this tradition. There is no question of long and complicated speeches." The Sermon on the Mount is clearly constructed by the evangelist, out of little groups of sayings, concise sentences or even single sayings, which were the actual material of the tradition. In such short sayings and vivid parables, which the memory would easily retain, Jesus spoke to the people.

"Every teacher will know from his own experience how such words of Jesus remain in the children's minds far more readily than, say, passages from the Epistle to the Hebrews or the Romans. And to this must be added the entirely popular character of the words—Jesus does not use the language of the philosophers or theologians. Compare certain passages in Paul, or, still more, in Philo or Plato, and one sees of what immense importance it was for the preservation and the spreading of the Gospel, that Jesus was not a learned Rabbi, but a man of the people."

We must not linger any longer over this Introduction, nor can we refer to any special points in the Commentary, though we would gladly have said something of Professor Weiss's exposition of the Sermon on the Mount and his analysis of its composite character, his treatment of the narratives of miracle, and particularly of the stories of the Transfiguration and the Ascension, and other features of the Gospel record. Here we must be content to express our admiration for the work as a whole, and our gratitude for the help thus placed in our hands for the true reading of the Gospels.

Of Professor Bousset's commentary on the Epistles to the Galatians and Corinthians we shall hope to say something in a further notice, when the rest of the second volume is in our hands. For this we shall look with the keenest interest, and especially for that part of it which contains the commentary on the Fourth Gospel. To all our friends who read German we would say, by all means secure a copy of this invaluable work.

THE spirit of delight comes often on small wings.—R. L. Stevenson.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Bible: What it Is and Is Not, by the Rev. Joseph Wood, a well-known volume of popular lectures, originally published in 1890, is now issued in a third edition, with a few corrections, and a fourteenth lecture added, on "The Higher Criticism." The book, which has been for some little time out of print, is frequently asked for by Postal Mission correspondents, and in this new and pleasant form will doubtless find many new readers. "Without any pretence of original research or exhaustive treatment," said Mr. Wood in his original Preface, "these lectures aim at making the ordinary reader acquainted with the new and valuable light thrown on the Bible by the scholarship of the day, in the belief that the more widely the truth about it is known, the more widely will its incomparable spiritual elements become the power of God unto salvation. While bringing the conclusions of scholars before a popular audience in a simple form, and frankly admitting to the full what is called the destructive criticism of the Rationalist, I have endeavoured to show that this criticism is really constructive, and places the use and enjoyment of the Bible on a basis that cannot be shaken." Of special interest are the lectures which deal with the changes effected in the Revised Version, and those which show how in the Bible the growth of thought may be traced, in regard both to God and man and morality. From the new lecture on the Higher Criticism we will quote one characteristic passage:—"While all scholars are agreed on the duty and advantage of applying the principles of the higher criticism to the Old Testament, there are some who, when it is proposed to apply the same principles to the New Testament, cry 'Hands off.' Even that candid critic, Dr. Driver, appears to think that the 'Higher Criticism' must be much more chary when dealing with the Evangelists than when Deuteronomy is under review. But it is impossible to fence round the New Testament from criticism when once the Old Testament has been subjected to its standards. A Bishop may see no incongruity between declaring his belief in the mythical nature of the story of the Fall and his condemnation of one of his clergy for speaking of the story of the Virgin Birth in the same manner. But men of simple common sense will say that the liberty of criticism which is claimed for the supernatural stories of the Old Testament cannot with justice be denied to men when dealing with those of the New. And if it be replied that a fundamental doctrine of Christianity is bound up with the story of the Virgin Birth, it is only necessary to point out that an equally fundamental doctrine is bound up with the story of the Fall. It appears to be thought that the New Testament can be saved from the Higher Criticism by throwing the Old to the wolves. But the higher critics are not wolves waiting to devour. They are the real friends of the Bible, withdrawing our eyes from details which we once fancied important, and fixing them upon the eternal truths and the grander elements which have been more or less obscured. Of both portions of the Bible alike it may be said, in the words of Archdeacon Wilberforce, 'intelligent criticism becomes the pathway to spiritual discovery.'" (Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. 1s. 6d. net.)

Services for Divine Worship, with Special Prayers and Thanksgivings, is the title of the new Service Book edited by the Rev. C. J. Street for his congregation of the Upper Chapel, Sheffield. The book is largely based on the "Seven Services for Public Worship," compiled by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, and published by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in 1900; but an eighth service is added, embodying some familiar passages from the original "Ten Services" and Dr. Martineau's Ninth and Tenth Services are included, making this also a Ten Services book. In adopting the "Seven Services," which had been used for some time experimentally by the congregation, and making them part of the new book, Mr. Street has introduced, with great advantage, some of the prayers and other passages from the original Ten Services, which had long been in use at Upper Chapel. The service of Praise and Thanksgiving, from the Rev. Charles Voysey's "Theistic Prayer Book," is also appended, together with special prayers and introductory services for Christmas, Easter, and a Memorial Service. (Copies of the book may be had at the Bookstall of the Upper Chapel, Sheffield. 2s. net. By post, 2s. 3d.)

Brief Literary Criticisms, by the late Richard Holt Hutton, is another very welcome volume of selections from his Spectator articles, edited by his niece, Elizabeth M. Roscoe. In the earlier volume, on "Aspects of Religious and Scientific Thought," the date (at least, the year) of each article was given, and one could have wished for the same note of added interest in this new selection. But occasionally the time is marked at once, as in the articles on the death of George Eliot, of Carlyle, and Emerson, and in literary judgments of older writers, as in the articles on "Keats," "Shelley as a Prophet," a Wordsworth group, three articles on Sir Walter Scott, and one on "The Charm of Miss Austen," it is perhaps of less consequence. Miss Roscoe says, in a brief prefatory note, that the essays, which cover a great number of years, are not chronologically arranged. The grouping of those on kindred subjects certainly adds to the interest of the book. There is in this volume also a characteristic portrait, as frontispiece, but not, to our mind, so fine as that in the "Aspects." (Macmillan & Co. Eversley Series. 4s. net.)

Piloted, by J. J. Armistead, is autobiographical in its character. The author is known as a pioneer of the fisheries industry and as a writer on fish culture. He is also, however, a "fisher of men," and has latterly devoted himself to evangelistic work among the Norwegian islands. The book contains some vivid descriptions of his experiences there. (Headley Brothers. 3s. 6d. net. Paper covers, 1s.)

The Churches and Modern Thought, by Philip Vivian, is a work of militant agnosticism. Its aim is to show that religion is inconsistent with modern science, and that the churches have therefore no raison d'être. The book does not strike us as being at all convincing, in so far as it deals with the essential and fundamental ideas of religion, but as a criticism of current conceptions of Christianity it may prove of use. The author has read widely, and makes copious quotations from authorities he has consulted. He gives Christianity and the churches little credit for any good that has been done or is being done in the world. (Watts & Co. 6s. net.)

OBITUARY.

MRS. CASH.

THE news of the death of Mrs. Cash, from heart-failure, at Milan on Tuesday, will come with a shock of painful surprise to many friends, and will bring to them a very real sorrow. Never surely was there a spirit of more beautiful unselfishness and generous kindness than that which we saw in her. It was her delight to provide happiness for others, and with her ample means she did it with a beautiful grace. For years it had been her custom every spring to go to Italy, and to gather about her a party of those who could not otherwise have had that great experience—poor ministers, tired teachers and others, who found in her the wisest and most sympathetic of friends. This year also she had gone, and although a personal sorrow had come to her and she was overtaken by illness at Como, she would not break up her party. To the last she was caring for others' happiness, and it is a beautiful thought that when the summons came to her it was in the land she loved, and in the midst of that act of loving kindness, which has meant so much for the enrichment of many lives.

Mrs. Cash was a shrewd Yorkshire woman, with a keen sense of humour, who loved a good story, and could tell it with admirable force. She was also a most helpful worker, up to the full measure of her strength. For many years she had given regular Friday evening Health Lectures to women at the Rhyll-street Mission, Kentish Town. That is but one instance out of the abundant beneficence of her life. She would never be thanked for what she did, but now the gratitude of many hearts will reverently follow her into that new life to which she has passed.

GEORGE CARSLAKE THOMPSON.

WE record with much regret the death of Mr. G. C. Thompson, of Penarth and Cardiff, which took place early in the morning of Friday, March 30. Few who knew his keen and active temperament and enthusiastic disposition can think of him as even an elderly man. He has been taken, apparently, while in the enjoyment of every power, and from interests which he pursued with unflagging zeal. He had undertaken to open the discussion on the "Outlook of Liberal Religion" on the 19th inst., in connection with the Oxford Conference, and for many friends the occasion will be saddened by the thought that they shall see his face no more.

George Carslake Thompson was born at Bridgwater in 1843. His mother was the only daughter of Captain George Browne, R.N., equally well known in the West of England as Counsellor Browne, for he went to the Bar after retiring from the navy at the end of the great war. Captain Browne was a lieutenant on the Victory at Trafalgar, and is credited with being the officer who made Nelson's immortal signal to the fleet. His father, Mr. Charles Thompson, joined his brother-in-law, Mr. S. W. Browne, in the business which had been created by the enterprise of Mr. Joel Spiller, of Bridgwater, and which became the great firm of Spiller and Browne (now Spillers and Bakers), millers and corn-factors, of Cardiff. To Cardiff, Mr. Thompson and his family removed in 1857; and George, after his school years at King James's Grammar School, Bridgwater, and University College School, London, entered the Cardiff business, of which his father was now the head. After thirteen or fourteen years of commercial life, a desire for further study induced him to enter Christ's College, Cambridge (of which his cousin, Mr. E. Seymer Thompson, was fellow and tutor). He kept terms at the Inner Temple, took honours in the Law Tripos, and was called to the Bar in 1877, at the age of thirty-four. He soon joined the South Wales Circuit, and practised in Cardiff, of late mostly in chambers and as a conveyancer. The strongest impressions made upon Mr. Thompson's mind while at Cambridge were, we should judge, those received from Professor Sir J. R. Seely; and these prompted to a close study of social and political history, which took a very definite shape in a detailed effort to estimate the reciprocal action of a statesman and a nation, of statecraft and popular sentiment, during a fixed period. The result of this was a considerable work, "Public Opinion and Lord Beaconsfield, from 1875 to 1880," (2 vols., Macmillan, 1886), originally planned in conjunction with Mr. E. S. Thompson, but entirely executed, we believe, by Mr. G. C. Thompson. Several smaller works on legal and social subjects, e.g., the land question, education, and literary copyright, appeared subsequently from his pen.

Mr. Thompson was before all things an independent thinker and an untiring debater. He believed that most peoples' errors, prejudices and misunderstandings are due to the fact that things are not "thrashed out," and that they are afraid of the process. He was a moving spirit of the Cardiff Impartial Society. But his position was never that of the mere critic and sophist. He advocated concentrating your forces upon the point you want to make, from time to time, in politics or in theology—not creating or following a party programme, but always doing your utmost "for the present distress." As he declined to follow Mr. Gladstone in the direction of Home Rule, so quite recently he declined to follow the Liberal Unionist Association with which he was connected in the direction of Protection.

Local recognition of his varied public activity and usefulness is unstinted. The Cardiff and Penarth Free Libraries, the University College of South Wales, training-ships, school-boards, and literary societies have claimed and enjoyed his faithful services. But for all such avocations, and professional duties, too—Mr. Thompson was before all things an "outdoor man." He was a keen mountaineer and a hardy climber. It was while he was playing on the Penarth golf links that the seizure attacked him, from which he never rallied. But there was more than physical exhilaration in the open air for him; he was an ardent lover of nature and an untiring observer of nature's processes and changes: He was especially interested in astronomy and meteorology. He went to the North Cape to see the solar eclipse of 1896, and to the Mediterranean to see that of last August. "Mr. Thompson," says a local expert, "took a great interest in meteors, and every shower found him at his post throughout the greater part of the night making accurate and valuable notes."

Mr. Thompson was keenly interested in the affairs of our churches, and both in South Wales and at anniversary meetings in London his was a familiar presence. That he took vigorous part in our discussions the columns of THE INQUIRER have also often borne witness. He will be greatly missed, but he leaves with his friends a memory which they will thankfully cherish.

Too late for last week's issue, we received a note from the Rev. H. D. Roberts, referring to the report in the INQUIRER of March 24, of the Liverpool District Missionary Association. The phrase in the report of his speech "spent on them" should have read "any money spent on Crewe was bearing fruit at this present time in even the visible embodiment of success." And he noted further, that Mr. Philip Holt laid pointed emphasis upon the present excellent work at Crewe. That aspect of the case was quite clear to those who were at the meeting, and had the advantage of reading the draft Report, which contained a cheering account of Mr. Short's brave enterprise in the railway town.

WE hear from the Rev. J. Tyssul Davis that last week was a period of great intellectual and spiritual awakening in the Hammond Hill Church, at Chatham, through the visit of the eminent Brahmin Pandit, J. C. Chatterji, who preached at both services on the Sunday to packed congregations with overflow in the vestry, and lectured during the week. "The three local newspapers which are very friendly to us," Mr. Davis writes, "give lengthy reports, and speak in terms of high appreciation of the deep impression left by the earnest eloquence of the Hindu teacher, who holds the distinguished office of Director of Archaeology and Oriental Research in Kashmir and is now upon a visit to England as the appointed delegate of the Hindu National Association. A large number of orthodox Christians came to hear the preacher on 'Christ as viewed in the light of Hinduism,' and the élite of intellect and character was represented in the audience that listened attentively to an hour and a half's lucid exposition of Hindu methods of attaining truth or Yoga: At the week-evening lecture on British Rule in India, a very profitable discussion followed, showing how fruitful the visit had been in helping us to understand something of the ideals of India. The Observer gives a sympathetic report under the headline 'The East's Message to the West'; the News under the title 'What India can teach Her Masters,' and the Journal in a two-column review of the utterances of the teacher." Churches that would like a visit from this native teacher would do well to communicate with Mr. Tyssul Davis.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

DAFFODILS.

"WHY do you like the daffodils so much, mummy?"

It was Tommy who asked the question. He and his mother were sitting in the summer-house by the big three-cornered daffodil bed. Tommy liked sitting in the summer-house because it had windows, and he could fancy he was in a railway carriage when he looked through them, and besides, it turned round on a pivot, and it was fun turning it round when somebody was sitting in it. When Tommy's schoolfellows came to tea they had great games in the summer-house.

But now it was Sunday afternoon, and mummy and he had been reading a chapter out of the Bible, and talking about it, as they always did on Sunday.

"Why do you like the daffodils so much, mummy?" repeated Tommy, as he fidgeted about behind his mother's chair boy fashion, and tickled her neck with the yellow blossom he held in his hand.

"Well, I think I like them, first, because they come in the spring at the end of the long, cold winter. When they begin to shoot up out of the earth you know the winter will soon be gone, and as soon as they are in blossom they tell us it is spring, and that summer sunshine will soon be here. They are the flowers of hope. I like them, too, because they are so beautiful. Look at them now the sun is shining, look at the golden glory of their heads, and the bright green colour, and the dark shadows of their graceful leaves! And now the sun has gone behind a cloud, and all the bright green leaves have changed to a soft blue-grey. And then I like them because they make me think of things. Don't they make you think of things too, sometimes, Tommy?"

"Well, yes, when I look at that three-cornered bed I often think it is just the shape of a jam puff! It must be apricot jam," added Tommy, thoughtfully, "because that's the only sort that's yellow. Is that what you think about, mummy?"

"No, dear," said his mother, laughing, and then she added, "I like to fancy the daffodils are people, like ourselves. See, they are all crowded together, and they have to live out their lives in that bed and make the best of them. If you look you'll see they are not all alike. Some are a handsome kind of daffodil, and some are only common field flowers, but they are all put together in the same bit of ground, shoulder to shoulder in the same world."

"Yes, I see what you mean, and look, they grow in clumps like families! Here are papa and mamma daffodils, with little blossoms growing round them all in bud but not yet open, and not tall like the grown up ones!"

"Yes," said his mother, "and here are others standing in twos, tall and straight. Those are like people that are very fond of each other and are going to keep always together. When you see two daffodils like that you should never pick one without the other, because the one that was left alone would grieve."

"And here," said Tommy, "are some poor bent daffies, the wind has broken them."

"No, dear, they are not broken, only bent. When the wind blows fiercely over the daffodil bed the flowers yield to it and let it toss them to and fro. So they never break as they would if they tried to stand straight and defy the storm. That's the way God means us to bear trouble. Those bent daffies are at the edge of the border where the wind has blown most fiercely, and they droop now because their strength is gone, but they are not broken; and I think by and bye they will hold up their heads again."

"I will come out to-morrow and look," said Tom.

"Go out early and look," said his mother, "and you will see every blossom in that beautiful bed turned upwards to the East, welcoming the sun. And as the day goes on they will keep their faces to the sun, and turn slowly on their slender green stems till, in the late afternoon, they will watch the sun sink to his rest, there, over the western hills."

"Yes, I see, mummy, they are all turned to the west now, and soon the sun will be gone out of sight behind that big hill. What does that make you think?"

"It makes me think that the daffodils hold fast by what is high and bright and beautiful. There is a poet who says, 'We needs must love the highest when we see it,' and that is what the daffodils do, and what they are silently showing us."

"They must feel very sad when the bright, warm sun goes away at night."

"Yes, dear, but they know it is only for a time. They will wait patiently through the dark hours, and be ready to turn their faces to greet again the brightness of the morning sun."

"Here comes father," said Tommy, "it must be tea-time!" So, hand in hand, they went into the house.

VIOLET SOLLY.

OLIVE AND PALM.

Who are these with signs of greeting
Going forth in glad array,
Loud hosanna oft repeating,
Waving palm upon the way?

Who are these to them descending
From the olive-wooded height,
Branches bearing, voices blending,
Palm with olive to unite?

Who is this of presence holy,
In their midst, yet humbly clad,
Lifted up, but meek and lowly,
Breathing words both sweet and sad?

'Tis the Prince obedience learning,
Prince of Peace in truth to be,
In his Father's will discerning
Pledge of final victory.

So may we, his train increasing,
Learn to conquer and to die,
Then his triumph share unceasing
In a kingdom won on high. Amen.

LIBERAL RELIGION IN GERMANY.

THERE has been during the past two years a remarkable activity on the part of liberal theologians in Germany in the publication of popular religious literature. It is, we believe, something of a new departure. Freedom of thought and the principles of scientific and historical criticism have long held an assured position in the Universities, and in Academic circles liberal views, whether moderate or radical, were very prevalent; but this body of opinion was regarded for the most part as the distinct property of the technical scholars, it had little influence on the religious life of the people. The teaching of the Church and the religious instruction in the schools held very largely to a traditional orthodoxy, and where among the educated laity liberal views prevailed, the result was rather an alienation from the Church, and the neglect of all religious observances, than a reformation of doctrine and a new impulse of religious life.

Now, however, there are signs of a widespread movement of advance, which aims at a directly popular appeal, and is earnestly bent on demonstrating the power of religion to meet all the needs of modern life, and in the light of the achievements of science and historical research to furnish a re-statement of Christian truth, in which its permanent controlling and inspiring elements shall be set free from the hindrances of discarded forms of thought.

One great step in that direction would be achieved if thoughtful people whose lives are permeated by the influences of modern culture could be brought back to the study of the Bible in the light of historical research, and be made to feel its permanent spiritual power. This is the aim of that new translation of the New Testament into modern German, with a commentary by some of the first of liberal theologians, of which a notice appears in our present issue; and the warmth of the welcome with which it has been received is a proof of the depth of the need it is calculated to supply.

Professor BAUMGARTEN, one of the contributors to this elaborate work, who writes an introductory essay on the practical value of an historical interpretation of the New Testament, points out how disastrous has been the ignoring of the broad results of modern scholarship by the preaching of the Church and the religious instruction in the schools of the people. It has hindered the wholesome progress of religious life, and constituted the Church authorities as, in fact, enemies of truth. To the authors of this work it has become clear that critical theology has not only the right but the duty of bridging the chasm between scientific knowledge and the general body of the intelligent laity, whether believing or unbelieving. Both for students and teachers, and for the large body of thoughtful men and women who are no longer satisfied by what they hear in the churches, they furnish the help of this commentary. The old literalism is dead, and people are hungering for truth. Here they find the best help for a new understanding of the records of the first age of Christian faith. Historical truth must prevail, and these modern interpreters will help earnest men to find the inspiration at the heart of it.

Professor JOHANNES WEISS, the general editor, and Professors BAUMGARTEN, BOUSSET, GUNKEL, and JULICHER and other contributors, all belonging to the circle of the "Freunde der Christlichen Welt," an influential group of moderate liberals (with a few more radical spirits among them,) whose organ is the weekly paper Die Christliche Welt, edited by Professor MARTIN RADE of Marburg.

From the same circle has come another remarkably successful effort to popularise liberal religious thought, in the series of Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher of which Lic. F. M. SCHIELE, of Marburg, is the editor. One of the New Testament group of this popular series of hand-books on the history of religion, Professor BOUSSET's "Jesus" we noticed last week, mentioning that of this one book twenty thousand copies had been issued. Indeed, the whole series, of which there are now some twenty volumes issued, has been taken up with an astonishing eagerness, which shows how genuine is the desire of educated people for reliable knowledge on these subjects. Besides the New Testament and Old Testament groups, there is one on the general history of religion, in which three of the numbers are on Buddhism, by Lic. HACKMANN, who is now minister of the German Church at Denmark-hill; and another group on the philosophy of religion, which includes a number by Lic. TRAUB on the Miracles in the New Testament, and another by Dr. PETERSEN on Natural Science and Faith. With this series should be also mentioned that of the "Lebensfragen," edited by Professor WEINEL, of Jena, in which his own "Jesus in the Nineteenth Century" and "Paul" have appeared.

But while there is this great activity on the part of liberal theologians, met by a genuine popular response, their position in the Church is extremely difficult. A stringent orthodoxy rules in high places, both at court and in the government of the Church. Even in academic circles the hope of promotion for a pronounced liberal is extremely slight, while in the ministry of the Church there have been recently many cases of heresy hunting. Thus, in the autumn of 1904, Dr. MAX FISCHER, of Berlin, one of the editors of the Protestantenblatt, gave an address at the meeting of the Protestantenverein which greatly shocked the orthodox party. While earnestly Christian in tone and conception it was distinctly Unitarian in its doctrinal position, and boldly asserted the modern view of revelation. There was a great outcry, and an orthodox section in his congregation demanded Dr. FISCHER's deposition. Liberals, on the other hand, rallied enthusiastically to his support, and even those who could not follow him in all his views earnestly maintained the principle of freedom. Finally, the ecclesiastical authority gave a somewhat ambiguous judgment, practically censuring his views as too extreme, but leaving him in possession of his pastorate. On the other hand, more recently in Westphalia, a young minister, Lic. RÖMER, though enthusiastically elected by a congregation at Remscheid, was refused institution by the authorities on the ground that he was not sufficiently orthodox. That is but one instance out of many of the disabilities from which the frankly liberal among the clergy suffer. It is rousing those who sympathise with them to more determined efforts to vindicate their right to an equal place in the Church. It renders the more urgent that appeal which the liberal theologians are making by means of their admirable popular literature, to rouse a new spirit of religious earnestness in the great body of educated people, who must finally make their power felt in the government of the Church, and gain the victory for freedom and the reverent faith of a progressive religious life.

THE supreme example of such intimate knowledge was that which generations of English-speaking men had of the Bible. Apart from any religious theory, this familiarity was a wonderful fact in the history of culture. It meant that the ordinary man was not simply in his youth but throughout his life brought into direct contact with great poetry, sublime philosophy, vivid history. These were not reserved for state occasions; they were the daily food of the mind.—S. M. Crothers.

"FOUR OLD HOUSES OF GOD."*

By THE REV. H. D. ROBERTS.

If anyone stays in the outskirts of the Lake Country, comprised in the districts of Cartmel and Furness, he may find, if he so choose, food for reflection in four striking contrasts. They are all within a comparatively small area, and not far distant from one another; and they are four characteristic memorials of those attempts which man has perpetually made to answer the grand questions, always pressing on his soul, of God, and Being, and Life, and Death, and Immortality.

Two of these memorials are standing in the sight of all, and are the end of many tourist pilgrimages. The relics, beautiful in ruin in their green vale, of Furness Abbey, and the majestic old Priory Church at Cartmel, are the most prominent objects of the countryside.

The other two memorials must be diligently sought for, in the loving way which seems to make them ever after the possession of the seeker. The popular handbooks, devoting much space to the Abbey and the Church, do not include these among the show-places. If you would find these Houses of God—the old Baptist Chapel, founded 1669, in the Coniston valley, and the little old Friends' Meeting House, founded 1677, at The Height, in Cartmel—neither guide-book nor sign post is likely to help you. They are still hiding themselves away, and seeming to shun all notice, as they did in the hard old days when they were built.

Our way of regarding these ruins or survivals differs according to our temperament. In some the antiquarian interest, as such, predominates. Let only the architecture be old enough, without much regard to its beauty, or its history, or its suggestion, and it is interesting. I have often noticed that the antiquarian interest, depending, as it does, on a certain amount of technical knowledge, exists at times side by side with a marked lack of the imaginative faculty. "Antiquarianism" makes so much of the letter that the spirit of which religious architecture is the expression, that which is apprehended by the historic sense, is lost sight of. Others, again, are æsthetically thrilled by the beauty of the architecture. The storied or traceried window, the soaring arch, the vaulted roof, the noble column, the cunning moulding and carving, the delicate arcade, the rhythm and proportion of the majestic whole, make to some minds as strong an appeal as Nature's own artistry, or a fine painting, or a splendid symphony does to others. Some of these will tell you, perhaps, that "the function of art is—to be beautiful," and that art for art's sake, and not for any significance behind it, and within it, is all that should be in your mind as you look at the mass and form, and line, and tone, and texture, of a noble church. Yet I think the subtlest glamour of the old buildings is lost for us, unless, as we pause within the hush of the old walls, we feel in our soul that "something that was divine" of which it is the expression. You may be gazing on the huge pre-historic monolith—the dolmen or the cromlech, pregnant with a meaning for ever a mystery; or on the megalithic remoteness of the stupendous Egyptian relic; or you may be under the spell of clear-cut and definite perfection of form in the Doric temple; or you may be catching the mystic suggestion and allurements of the great Gothic cathedral. In any and all of them you are face to face, not only with the elusive secret of beauty, but with something greater, of which the beauty is but a veil. This temple, this cathedral, is the crystallisation of a spiritual conception—a deep idea which demanded embodiment—in the minds of its creators, and which they fondly hoped they had expressed finally and permanently. Wonderful as the monument may be, the idea which it symbolises and sums up is more wonderful still.

Truly may Robert Louis Stevenson say: "I find I never weary of great churches. I could never fathom how a man dares to lift up his voice to preach in a cathedral. What has he to say that will not be an anti-climax? I have heard a variety of sermons, but I never yet heard one that was so expressive as the Cathedral itself."

I sat there in Cartmel Church, while the choir intoned their part of the service, and the preacher descanted on the wonders in the miracle of the healing of the deaf man. It was all significant of a stereotyped form of things from which the spirit had departed. And, all the while, the silent voices of the Church, with their undertones of "the still, sad music of humanity," were whispering greater things than echoed from the pulpit.

How solemnising is the consciousness, awakened in an old House of God, of the long human experience forming its very atmosphere! The hopes, the prayers, the fears, the sighs, the questionings of generation after generation, cling about its stones. You pass in, perhaps, as I did, for the first time into Cartmel Priory Church, under the old Norman portal into the great, grey, ancient House of God—stepping from the sunlight and country sights and sounds, and busy nature, and the pre-occupations of to-day's life, into a sort of kinship with the life of seven by-gone centuries. The thought falls around you like a pall—the thought of the seven centuries it has stood there. Seven centuries of English history working itself out in its strenuous roll; seven centuries of little lives like yours and mine woven about it and within it! Subtle suggestions and haunting memories begin to cast their spell about you. The great empty church is suddenly peopled for you. The old Norman doorway is alive with those unknown craftsmen who settled its arch so securely, and moulded it so richly—and passed; but left their work to endure. There is a multitudinous passing in and out; and many quiet processions ever recurring, where one, borne through for the last time, goes in and out no more. The generations are crowding the great nave, who paid there the duties of custom, or sought there for light, or hope, or peace. Many by-gone bridal days are framed by the chancel arch—some days of fear and woe in those old days, perhaps; and many joyful days when earth was transfigured. The old font whispers of that ever-renewing love which is fain to bring the young life into relation with that "something divine" of which the church is telling. You lay your hand upon the font—it has outlived them all, those babes who were brought there, and who grew old, and in their turn brought others. And the vaults; the nameless stones echoing your pacing feet—what secrets they hold; what long stories of sorrow and separation; what dark suggestions; what trembling hopes of consummation and reunion!

Strangely solemn becomes the old church as it rises there, still stable in its witness of what endures in the midst of instability; the monument of dim volumes of human experience, of unquiet change amid much dust of strife; the link between the past and the present and the future; and always the symbol of what men thought the most real, and most noble, and most abiding, amid the shifting phantasmagoria of being and life.

There is a strange contrast between the Priory Church, with all its dignity, and the lordly ruins of Furness Abbey, and the little Meeting House at The Height. Picture to yourself, behind an almost concealing wall, at the summit of a lonely fell road, a small, quite unbeautiful building, squat, whitewashed. You discover an old custodian in the adjoining cottage. She lets you through the outer wall, the little grass-grown yard, and the low, narrow porch into the entrance passage. It is panelled with worm-eaten oak, warped and bulging in places. You mark the "sentinel's seat" behind the door, and your thoughts bound back to the days when he watched and listened there, on behalf of the quiet worshippers within. You enter the old meeting-room. What a contrast, indeed, this House of God, to the great Cistercian Abbey, to the majestic Priory Church! There is no æsthetic thrill here. There are no splendid arches, nor resounding nave, nor Gothic tombs, nor noble chancel. You will experience none of the half-intoxication of "height and space, and gloom and glory," which church and abbey give. There is no reminiscent magnificence of Lord Abbot or Prior. There are no echoes of choirs of monks, each in his carved stall, and of anthem and invocation, and ritual. You see just a square, bare room; and it is as devoid now as it ever was of any ornament—structural, plastic, or chromatic. A raised dais balustraded at one end, rows of wooden seats on the floor, and that is literally all.

Across the road is a little walled field. This is the graveyard, where lie the quiet people whose spiritual home was here. Following their humble custom, no stone or name marks the older graves. Scarcely even "heaves the turf" above the sleepers. It seems a veritable God's acre, this little sleeping-place; set in the same fair scenes of fell and field, and distant hills, and gleaming sea, which had known the faithful lives. Surely the unrecorded names are written in another book.

The old custodian, glad of an unwonted hearer, tells of endowment by a yeoman with the revenue of certain "lot-lands" (fell-lands) in George Fox's time; of George Fox himself, and his denunciations of neighbouring "steeple-houses," and subsequent duckings in the horse-pond; of Margaret Fell, his wife; of Quaker names and doings; of the monthly service held in the meeting-house; of how things "used to be" in her own younger days, and in her mother's time; and of much voluble personal history. You hear her vaguely, as your eyes wander over the bare interior. Not very stimulating to the imagination, do you say, after the glories of the Abbey and the Church?

And yet, as I passed out again into the road, I had been touched in a way which was deeper than the emotion born in the grander edifice. For here I was face to face, not only with a symbol of what is abiding in the mind of man, appealing to all, and finding a response in every age, and with the fascinating drama of human history. All that had indeed written itself here too. But here there was also something else—there was that splendid scene in the drama which shows the actors counting all things but loss for conscience sake and for God. And the very bareness, the lack of all external aids, seemed to emphasise the riches of that fulness of the spirit which dare not limit its vision by expressing itself in outward form.

They worshipped the Lord in the sanctuary, the founders of this little House of God. But their sanctuary was no consecrated place merely. And I saw the unhindered crowds of the generations entering Cartmel Church, lip-service, conformity, the only condition of entry. And then I saw a few quiet, serious, upright men and women, who were all priests unto God their Father. To them life itself was a sacrament, needing no mediation of priestly ministration. In their plain room they hushed their own voices, and sat often in silence, that they might hear the Spirit whispering in their souls. They followed not the multitudes; they were ridiculed and imprisoned and abused; and they brought their bodies into subjection and their souls into quietude; they checked the unruly tongue, and bore all things without murmurings and disputings. Surely they were sons of God, and their unbeautiful little meeting-house, standing for grand things like these, was the very gate of heaven.

One more contrast. On the fells above the Coniston valley is yet another old House of God. It is to be found by crossing a field, and it is not a Quaker meeting-house, but a Baptist. It is a Five Mile Act Conventicle, founded in 1669. Its first pastor was a deprived vicar of Staveley Church, ejected by the Clarendon Code. Tottlewell Baptist Church is a home, then, of that sturdy body of English Christians who were the first to raise the cry of toleration in religion for all who would be true to their conscience, and to the principle of the Reformation. A strange, unexpected little place it is, among the heather and the bracken, unenclosed in the open field, in this district rich in Anglican churches, old and new. The old walls look down on new seats, replacing the old oaken benches, rudely carved with their owners' initials. An air of neatness and Nonconformist respectability pervades the place. In an adjoining meadow is the spot where, in a pool formed by a spring, those sturdy believers used to testify by public immersion to their faith in "one Lord, one faith, one baptism." In these softer days the place for baptism is in a lean-to, used also as schoolroom; and it still boasts as table the old board, round which the faithful in other times gathered for Communion. The revenues of a farm (another yeomanly gift) keep up the old place, and the services are regular. There is a Baptist minister at the manse, and from various parts of the district a few gather, Sunday by Sunday, to worship God in the way of their fathers.

So one ponders over the four monuments of the Religious Idea—the great Cistercian organisation, receiving its death-blow at the dissolution of the monasteries; the great Priory, whose church, unroofed for years, yet escaped destruction as being, not only the Priory, but the parish church; the little worshipping place of a few spiritual men, whom the world persecuted and ridiculed, and then, perforce, respected; the chapel of the pioneers in toleration, who acted up to what they conceived to be the literal command of God. Such contrasts do indeed meet our eyes at every turn. But here, in this lovely land, where the dust of living no longer blurs the vision and chokes the spirit, they seem to draw the soul out from the parochialism into which it tends to fall. They mark the grand underlying unity which in men's surface differences they forget. Amid all the strife and evil motives and evil deeds which helped to build these monuments, they remain alike the monuments of Man, with his thoughts reaching to heaven, and his soul ever yearning beyond the stars. Their stones are precious and wonderful to us, for into them is built his wistful longing, and restless looking beyond the limits of his life. We, their brothers of a later day, join hands with that monk of Furness, striving to realise God and his soul in his solemn church; with that grave Friend, sitting silent and absorbed in his bare room; with that Baptist, sealing his lively faith by his sacrament. As we step out from the places they built into the same wide spaces they dwelt in, gazing on the autumn glories of the heather and the bracken and wood and hill which they gazed on in their little lives, we thank the Author of all being in that He unceasingly draws the generations unto Himself. Now He has given it unto us to seek His face, and to express in our way the sense of righteousness and the hope of the better, which they in their day perpetuated.

And if He has taught us that there must needs be pain and strife marking every step of the way—pain in emerging from ignorance, in progressive enlightenment, in increasing insight, in increasing holiness, something painfully to be acquired, something painfully to be given up—let us lose not a "jot of heart and hope," knowing that this is His appointed path, which in the end "leads up to light." And all along the way are the splendid monuments of the march of the ages towards Himself.

WE sometimes speak of stubborn facts. Nonsense! A fact is a mere babe when compared with a stubborn theory. Let the theory, however extravagant in its origin, choose its own ground, and intrench itself in the mind of a well-meaning lady or gentleman of an argumentative turn, and I'll warrant you, it can hold its own against a whole regiment of facts.—S. M. Crothers.

THEORIES OF FELLOWSHIP.

III.

THERE is, then, another bond of fellowship which we may call that of spiritual communion. This finds its meeting-place in unison of spirit rather than in outward comradeship. There are times when we feel ourselves to be in close spiritual fellowship with people whom we have never seen. There are poets, prophets, philosophers, dreamers, artists, musicians, saints, and patient sufferers, as well as active workers and doers, whose words and thoughts and experiences bring us the sense of near and dear companionship in our own hours of struggle and need. We sometimes feel that the spirit in which a man has lived—the inner soul of him—is a more lasting power in the world than the actual deeds which he accomplished. The works that Jesus did on the Sabbath day, the particular cases of suffering relieved by his tender sympathy and care, seem now of far less importance than the greater fact that the spirit in which he did them has been handed on to others.

But spiritual fellowship is, by itself, just as inadequate a bond of union among churches as is the active moral fellowship by itself. Neither represents the whole life of man. And either bond, by itself, is utterly inadequate to unite the whole life of one man in the sense of fellowship with the whole life of every other man. Obviously, my spiritual fellow may be miles away. We may dream the same dream at a distance. To meet one another in time and space is felt to be quite unnecessary. Those who would found churches upon a basis of spiritual fellowship alone will not found any visible or earthly church. We may all agree that there is a Church Invisible, spiritual, eternal. But that is God's Church. We have not founded it; and it is not in our power to fix its laws or to determine its limits. God is a Spirit; all souls are His; we are already members of the Church of God. Whether we wish it or not, as spiritual beings we live and move and have our being in God, and are fellow-members of the spiritual fellowship He has made for us. But this Church of Eternity is more ancient than Christianity, it is older than Adam, it antedates the earth and the whole material universe. The ritual of seed-time and harvest, the fireworks of sun and moon and stars, the care of human bodies, the feeding of the hungry, and the clothing of the naked are not eternal things, and are not purely spiritual. The spiritual Church of God has existed without them, for all we know, and may do so again. In the nature of the case, therefore, an appeal to unite together as purely spiritual beings is an appeal that disregards our present material bodies, our whole material surroundings, and all the visible material universe. We may all be fellow-members of the Spiritual Kingdom and of the invisible Church, and we may be so, in some spiritual way, for ever and ever. But, in addition to all that, we are, for the time being, making a brief stay in a material world also. The Kingdom of God on earth has reference to this material world. The eternal Church of God God has founded. The earthly Church we may upbuild, or else die without having accomplished the task set for us. The "earthiness" of our Church is of the very essence of it; it has to fit earth and earth's conditions. It must be adapted to earthly needs. It is to be a local and a temporary Church. Just for the time being. Men want it between the cradle and the grave. Before mankind was born it was not, and after he has gone it will be needed no longer. No Church that we found will ever be other than a temporary Church.

The Kingdom of God on earth has essentially to attend to our earthly and physical as well as to our heavenly and spiritual life. And its activities and requirements have regard to bodily salvation as well as to spiritual salvation. Yet, after all, our life on earth is not everything; it is immediate and pressing, but it is not eternal and everlasting. We cannot find the whole of our religious life in the sense of earthly fellowship alone. Our bodily life may be the foundation of our buildings of brick and stone, our chairs and pulpits, our meeting one another face to face, eye to eye, and week by week. Our earthly churches are founded on earthly conditions. Intercourse between soul and soul is conducted on earth through the medium of speaking tongues and hearing ears, through eyes that meet one another, through smiles, frowns, gesticulations, and handshakings, &c. It may be a clumsy sort of arrangement. A human church is a meeting-place that has direct reference to the human body. There is a door for the body to go in at, windows to light the eyes, and sounds are made to strike the ear. This bodily basis of church fellowship is a continual reminder that we are to be fellows not only in all eternity and in spirit and in unseen ways, but that while on earth for these few years, we are, in the name of religion, to meet one another. We are to be friends here and now. In God's name we are to look at each other, to speak to each other, to sing and pray together, to hear one another's voices, to know one another's earthly form, features, and appearance. In earthly ways and in earthly forms we are to have fellowship with one another's earthly life. Our love for one another is to be here and now, and at once.

Surely, then, we have many bonds of fellowship; and we are called in God's name to be comrades in many ways. Not in one way only, but in all good ways of meeting and cheering and helping one another as brothers and sisters in God. Our fellowship is spiritual and eternal, and the thought of the Church of God before all worlds and beyond them calls our spirits into fellowship of spiritual life. Our earthly abode for a few years together here, and for a few years only, is another bond of fellowship. We must be quick in making friends in this way, for the opportunity of a handshake may soon be gone. We may worship in spirit for ever and ever. But to go with wife and child to the little chapel on earth may next year be impossible—for ever and ever. Wife and child may go alone and wish we could be there once more; but no, this earthly fellowship, this shaking hands and singing hymns and kneeling to pray is the chance of a few brief years alone, in all eternity. It is a little thing, and God has not allowed much time for it.

Our active city life calls us again to energetic moral warfare side by side. Our free intellectual search for truth bands us once more as fellow-seekers of all that the Eternal Wisdom has to teach. And our common belief in one God and Father of us all makes us brothers together for evermore.

WILFRED HARRIS.

CHURCHES, CONGREGATIONS, AND CONFERENCES.

IN the column of "Good News," conducted by Dr. Edward Everett Hall in the Christian Register, the following article appeared some little time ago:—

When the National Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches (American) was established in the year 1865, now forty years ago, our poet-prophet Edmund H. Sears suggested at once the establishing local conferences in different parts of the country. He said, and he said truly, that with every well-conducted meeting of such a conference the Unitarian Church, whether made of individuals or churches, would gain mutual encouragement. Dr. Hedge had said that the first Conference revealed the Unitarian body to itself. Mr. Sears said that in the establishment of twenty or thirty local conferences the common strength of the body of men who called themselves Unitarians would be greatly enlarged. It is a good thing for a man to know that he is not alone. And, if a local conference can succeed in calling together from every town within its oversight some individual who can speak from his own point of view, or, indeed, who only listens from his own point of view, a great deal is gained for the village, for what in our fathers' time would have been called the "communion of the world."

I remember that at one of those early conference meetings the duties of the church were laid down as coming under four heads, "of worship, hospitality, charity, and education." In the forty years which have passed since, we have been testing such a classification as that, and testing it to our advantage. I cited here the other day the remark of a very distinguished man, Bishop Hamilton, of the Methodist Church, who referred to this classification some years ago when he said that, on the whole, the New England churches were well organised for worship, excellently organised for foreign missions, tolerably organised for hospitality, and hardly organised at all for charity. We of the Unitarian churches have not much to say about foreign missions. I am disposed to think that the charity work of our churches is, in general, better cared for than their organic work for hospitality. How much of education—the real spiritual work of the public schools—is due to the care and superintendence of ministers and of churches, it would be hard to say. But so far as the ministry goes, it is certainly true that the ministers of the country are careful and thoughtful in their oversight of the schools of the country.

Dear Starr King, when he was talking of such themes, as he was very fond of doing, used to say that the ministers ought to satisfy themselves if once a month the congregations permitted them to speak on what the world chose to call theological subjects, to discussing the foundations of religion, for quickening faith or teaching doctrine. He used to say, "We get together one hundred or five hundred people on Sunday, that they may know how to bring in the kingdom of God." Granting that one Sunday in a month we are able to quicken in them the motives of divine or godly living, they ought to consent for the other three Sundays to be devoutly taught as to what the kingdom of God requires at that particular place and that particular time. Thus the matter of the education of the town would be such a subject, the care which it was to take of Arabs or Bulgarians or Chinamen would be such a subject, the health of the town, drainage, pure water, adulteration of food, would be such subjects. He said that people ought to be instructed on such themes when they came to church. He said they would be so instructed when a church showed that it belonged to the time and was fairly up with the time.

I do not myself believe that we should gain much by always discussing such subjects at half-past ten Sunday morning rather than by a discussion at any other time. But it seems certainly true that, if churches are to succeed in any forms which resemble the organisations of the past, they must take care to quicken enthusiasm and instruct ignorance for social duties, and, in general, to bind men and women together for duties and purposes which may be called constant, as well as for the instruction which can be given on the morning of Sunday.

In New England, by what seems to me a great mistake, the large organisations have, generally speaking, banished one of the two Sunday services. If this abandonment were in accord with the spirit of the times, as I suppose it was, we need all the more the consecration and enlargement of all the duties which have ever belonged to the Christian Church in the new directions to which we are tempted by the resources of modern civilisation.

For instance, it is not long since I addressed a large congregation on a weekday evening on a very important subject of social order, to be told, when the address was over, that the audience was made up in nearly equal proportions of people who had come five miles or even ten to the meeting, and those who had come from the immediate neighbourhood—distance is so far abolished by the trolley. In the same proportion we are able to consecrate Tuesday evening to purposes which by King's rule would have been relegated to Sunday morning.

Here is thus new opportunity, if we are only willing to use it. In my private opinion the people who would be apt to meet for some such public purpose on Tuesday evening will in general be more apt to carry out their plan than the assembly which would come together on Sunday evening, though it were announced to be an assembly for the same purpose.

The very general organisation of Unitarian clubs, not only in large cities, but in smaller communities, points in the same way. In such a club you are able to do what it is very hard to do on Sunday. You can get Dr. Abenethy or Judge Broadhurst or Colonel Careful to speak at the Unitarian Club Wednesday evening, when neither of them would come into the pulpit on Sunday morning to say the same thing, whether on education, on health, or on hospitality. And, when the ladies of a town arrange that they can come together in the afternoon or in the evening for similar purposes, the same thing can be said. And I can conceive no better subject to be assigned for the spring or summer meeting of a county conference than that which should start a practical discussion among the directors of different clubs and alliances in answer to the question, "How can clubs and alliances best occupy their time?" When in a New England village I am called to a meeting of the people who want to preserve the birds or improve the sidewalks, I do not like to find that the subject has received no attention from the local officials of the Unitarian Club or the Alliance. We are in the habit of saying in the Lend-a-Hand movement that, unless a club at every meeting takes care of somebody or something outside its immediate comfort or pleasure, it is none of ours. This rule ought to apply to every Unitarian club or alliance. True, the society exists for social purposes. Yes. But one of those social purposes is its union for bringing in the kingdom of God and His righteousness. This is certain—that it is only when we consecrate our work for drainage, for education, and hospitality, or other social purposes in the town, that we are able to render a truly acceptable service. Taking the word "church" in its broad sense, it means all the children of God who unite to live, love, and work as his children. The church is a congregation. The congregation is a church. The church is not simply a school, it is not simply a religious agency, it is not simply a club: it holds intercourse not only with men and women, but with the present God. It is not satisfied, or ought not to be satisfied, even if it knew that each one of its men, women, and children comes to God in his morning prayer at home. It ought not to be satisfied, even if it knew, as in old Puritan days, that every family in every house seeks God every day in prayer. It ought not to be satisfied unless all these children of God come together publicly whether for amusement or for comfort, with the hope and purpose of enlarging the life of that community. All of them mean to lift up that which is fallen down, and to open the eyes of the blind.

The lesson of this time seems to be this: that, even if people do not crowd the churches on Sunday as we would like to have them, all the more must they be induced to come together, under whatever form of communion, for purposes of public service, for enlarging the life of all, for improving the education of all, for extending a welcome to all. It is easy for earnest members of the congregation to quicken and enlarge the attendance at their Sunday functions. The same earnestness ought to bring them together in common mutual services as the week goes by. And every word which is said as to the more careful use of Sunday may be made to apply to our efforts for the consecration of our week-days.

EDWARD E. HALE.

It may be proved with much certainty that God intends no man to live in this world without working; but it seems to me no less evident that He intends every man to be happy in his work.—Ruskin.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

THIRTEENTH MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

ELEVEN schools entered for the choral competition at Essex Hall last Saturday afternoon, which was an improvement on the previous year, when there were only seven. In 1904, ten schools entered. On that occasion Essex Church for the first time secured the banner, and Brixton came second. Last year Brixton was the winner, George's Row second, and Highgate third. Now Highgate has the banner (as twice before, in 1898 and 1903) while Brixton and Essex Church were bracketed as second, and Stepney Green came third.

Each of the choirs sang, without accompaniment, the test piece "To Music," by Myles B. Foster, the words, by Mrs. Hemans, beginning:

"Oh thou! whose soft, bewitching lyre Can lull the sting of pain to rest."
and then a piece of their own selection. The order, which was arranged by lot, was as follows, with the names of the conductors and the pieces of their own selection:—(1) George's Row: conductor, Miss Amy Withall, "The Harvest Fields," Mendelssohn. (2) Kensington (Essex Church): conductor, Miss Agnes Oakeshott, "Welcome, Fair Eventide," Roeckel. (3) Limehouse: conductor, Rev. John Toye, "Night has passed away," Battison Haynes. (4) Stratford: conductor, Miss Edith Greenhalgh, "Sweet and Low," Hugo Willemsen. (5) Newington Green: conductor, Miss Maud North, "The Happy Hunter," Kucken. (6) Brixton: conductor, Miss Hopkins, "O Beautiful Violet," Carl Reinecke. (7) Stepney Green: conductor, Miss E. Harris, "A May Song," Henry Smart. (8) Blackfriars (Stamford Street): conductor, Mr. H. H. Quarmby, "Welcome, Bright Dawn," Roeckel. (9) Islington (Unity Church): conductor, Miss E. Harris, "Spring is here," Veazie. (10) Croydon: conductor, Miss E. A. Bredall, "Welcome, Bright Dawn," Roeckel. (11) Highgate Hill: conductor, Miss Amy Withall, "The Lord is my Shepherd," Henry Smart.

Dr. H. Walsley Little was the Adjudicator, and the president of the society, the Rev. John Toye, presided.

Tea was provided for the choirs, in two detachments in the council room, and for visitors at the conclusion of the competition upstairs.

At six o'clock a concert was given by the united choirs and a few other friends. Miss Agnes Oakeshott, Mr. W. H. Clarke and Mr. Veillard were the soloists, Mr. Ivor James gave some 'cello solos, which were very warmly appreciated, as were also Mr. F. J. Nettlefold's recitations, and the choirs gave three part songs.

After an opening hymn, in which all joined, the president expressed his pleasure in being there, and in the competition of the afternoon, and called upon the adjudicator for his award.

Dr. LITTLE said he had been pleased to hear such excellent singing of so high a standard. The last time he had been there it was not nearly so high. He was also much struck by the excellent enunciation of the words, and the pure and clear voices of the children. That was a thing they did not always get, and it had not been when he was there before. Now, however, he had not noticed any nasal twang. The competition had been so keen and near that he was obliged to resort to figures, and he found that there was not a difference of more than 16 or 17 marks between the highest and lowest of the choirs. He awarded the first place to Highgate Hill, and the others as above noted; but they had all done well. He proceeded to offer some friendly criticisms on the singing of each of the choirs, and the president then presented the banner to the victorious choir, in the person of its smallest member, and to another little girl the certificate of the second place for the Essex Church choir. They had not expected two choirs to be bracketed as second, but another certificate, he said, would be provided for the Brixton choir.

Mr. ASQUITH WOODING, the hon. secretary of the society, announced that other certificates for all the children who had taken part in the competition would be handed to their conductors at the close.

The concert, which was a great success then proceeded, and concluded with the hymn, "Softly the silent night."

LEWIN'S MEAD DOMESTIC MISSION.

THE annual meeting of Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission, Bristol, was held at the Institution, near St. James's Barton, on Monday, April 2.

Mr. J. K. Champion, who presided, expressed regret at the absence of Mr. P. J. Worsley and other friends, and then alluded to the departure of their missionary, Mr. J. B. Robinson, who left them to be minister at Shepton Mallet. The work was, however, carried on, and he recognised the readiness of friends at Lewin's Mead and Oakfield-road to help them in their operations, the Rev. A. N. Blatchford among the number. At one of their gatherings, at which Mrs. Broadrick was present, the thought occurred to them, why not ask her to be their missionary? They did so, and the invitation was accepted.

In the absence of Mr. Sibree, who was fulfilling an engagement at Plymouth, the Rev. A. N. Blatchford read the report, which opened with a congratulatory allusion to the appointment of Mrs. Broadrick as missionary. Satisfactory work was recorded in various branches of the mission, but deep regret expressed at the death of Mrs. Worsley. A welcome was given to the Rev. E. I. Frupp, the new minister at Oakfield-road.

The Chairman presented the financial statement, from which it appeared that the year began with an adverse balance of £67 17s. 9d., and concluded with a debt of £71 16s. 2d. It was, however, a healthy sign that the number of subscribers had increased, and the expenditure was somewhat exceptional, as a considerable sum had been spent on renovating their premises. He thought they would all agree with him that their meeting room had a much brighter appearance, and it was that expenditure that explained their increased debt. One of the features of their work had been his sending several who had suffered from ill-health to the country, and in some cases they had come back much improved in strength.

Mrs. Broadrick gave an account of her experience in connection with the mission since December, 1905, when she became missionary. Various gatherings, she mentioned, were well attended, and good and useful work had been done. She had paid numerous visits to poor homes, and her experience endorsed the statement that one half the world did not know how the other half lived. Some of the cases were perplexing; they were not at all best met by financial help, but people needed to be taught how to make the best use of that they had, and to value air, and light, and cleanliness. Mrs. Broadrick, in conclusion, appealed to the friends of the mission to give her their fullest support if she was to remain missionary.

The Chairman moved, and the Rev. A. N. Blatchford seconded, the adoption of the reports, the latter saying that the spirit that should prevail among them was one of hope, and the hopefulness of the position was in no small measure due to the help of their evening's chairman, Mr. Champion. They had glimpses in Mrs. Broadrick's report of the difficulties her duties entailed; he was convinced that the most valuable part of their missionary's efforts was not at public meetings, but in the domestic work, which brought her into contact with the people in their homes. Mrs. Broadrick had their warm sympathy.

The report was adopted, and among subsequent resolutions was one re-appointing Mrs. Broadrick, recognising her zealous work, and wishing her God's speed in it.

ULSTER UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting of this Association took place last Monday evening in the Central Hall, Belfast. From 7 until 8 o'clock tea was provided for the members and friends, after which the chair was taken by Mr. W. T. Hamilton.

Rev. J. A. Kelly read the annual report, which stated that during the year nothing worthy of special mention had taken place in connection with the work of the association. The depository has been supplied with books and tracts to meet the demand of congregations, Sunday-schools, and inquirers generally. There was an adverse balance, and appeal was made for more support. Their agent, Miss M'Caw, who became unwell last Easter, was still unfit for business, but Miss Ferguson had discharged the duties satisfactorily. The Committee had expressed their sympathy with Miss M'Caw in her protracted illness.

Mr. H. B. Hunter presented the treasurer's report, which showed that the year had been begun with an adverse balance of £41 5s. 6d., and had been closed with a balance due the treasurer of £30 18s. 6d.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the reports, said that they did not present many encouraging features. However, he thought he was right in saying that the city and country congregations should support the association better. A little more encouragement was due to a society which had been inaugurated under such favourable auspices 31 years ago. It was their duty to see that additional numbers should join and help to forward the interests of the society.

Rev. Thomas Dunkerley, in seconding, said the society was engaged in a useful work in spreading Scriptural light; and the reports were passed.

On the motion of Mr. Cunningham, seconded by Mr. W. W. McFadden, the cordial thanks of the Association were given to the Rev. A. W. Fox, who had travelled from England to attend that meeting, and had preached the annual sermons. Mr. Fox having responded, Principal Gordon moved—"That this meeting renews its adhesion to the principles and objects of the association as set forth in the rules, and would strongly commend the association to the increased support of as well as to the thoughtful consideration of the public generally." He saw they had outrun the constable by about £30. He did not blame them. If the work was good they were right in stretching a point in its interest. It was easy to raise a sum like £30. They were not an aggressive people. They stood for what they held, and maintained what they believed.

Rev. W. G. Marsden seconded the resolution, which was adopted.

A vote of thanks to the chairman was passed, on the motion of Rev. J. H. Bibby, seconded by Rev. J. A. Kelly, and the proceedings terminated.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

NORTH AND EAST LANCASHIRE.

THE nine-and-twenty churches in this district are pursuing the even tenor of their way with not more than the usual amount of local difficulty. If there are no phenomenal successes, there are also no noticeable failures. There is plenty of hard work to be done, and plenty of faithful people to do it. Certainly there is opportunity and need for much more to be done, and the chief hindrance is the want of money. The Unitarians of this district have it in their own hands, or rather in their own pockets, to decide whether their principles shall be made known much more widely than they are at present, and new centres of religious work on their lines established. The committee of the local Association (The N. and E. Lancs. Unitarian Mission) feel their hands tied by their existing responsibilities; but they will not be slow to extend their work if their friends will find them some more money. There does not seem to be the same general interest in the collective work of the mission that there was twenty years ago, or the same sense of joint responsibility for that work. The recent annual meeting in Rochdale was, as times go, a very good one, but on the last previous occasion, in 1887, the number of persons present was, as I remember it, much larger. This lack of interest, and consequent decline of support for the collective welfare of our churches is the main feature that calls for notice in the state of this district at present. And the only remedy for it is that Unitarians shall bestir themselves, and not confine their efforts to the needs of their own chapel. Such individualism, is, no doubt, to some extent inevitable, owing to the long distances which separate some of the churches from the rest. But a larger common life is certainly possible, and highly desirable.

To bring the members of neighbouring churches into closer touch with each other the plan of visitations has been carried on with fair success. The attendance at the meetings has not been so large as it might be; but in other respects the visits have been appreciated and have done good. They will be continued as opportunity offers.

We are looking forward with great interest to the work of the Unitarian Van, which is to start on its pilgrimage in a few weeks' time. The western parts of the district are included in its range, and we may hope for an awakening of new interest in Unitarian ideas. The van will for the most part travel where there are none of our congregations, and will chiefly serve to sow seed in new ground. We wish every success to those who have undertaken this spirited adventure.

Mention should also be made of the work that has been begun at Blackburn, mainly through the energy of the Rev. C. Travers, of Preston. If this succeeds, it will remove one of the causes of reproach against the Unitarians of the district. It is too early as yet to forecast the success or failure of the Blackburn movement. But there is no doubt that if the Blackburn people mean business they can build up a strong church there. The young congregation at Nelson, founded only two or three years ago, is going quietly along, after the excitement of its first formation.

Of the older congregations, those which receive grants from the mission are making steady efforts to raise what are virtually endowment funds, so as eventually to become self-supporting. In particular, the congregation at Chesham (Bury), which has been hard hit by the Education Act of 1902, is making an heroic struggle to get free from the financial straits in which, through no fault of its own, it is entangled. The method is that of a Bazaar to be held next year. May this appeal of Chesham meet with a generous response; for the cause is a good one, and the work for years past has been exceedingly hard.

On the whole, we are getting along pretty well in this district, at least according to the modest standard which experience sets up. We are not in sight yet of that Millennium, when there shall be a Unitarian congregation in every considerable town and village in Lancashire. Neither, on the other hand, are we "going to the dogs." We are plodding on, and are by no means discouraged.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Bradford.—"Recent events, we have been told," says the Bradford Daily Telegraph, "have given quite an impetus to local Unitarianism, and the minister of Chapel-lane receives many applications for expository information from members of different religious bodies." The sermon last Sunday evening, by the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, on "What Think ye of Christ?" was listened to by a large congregation. It was an earnest plea for the simple humanity of Jesus, who taught his disciples to pray to the Father, and to Him alone, the "one God and Father of all."

Darlington.—A course of three week-evening lectures on the Bible by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, has just been concluded. The concluding lecture on the Fourth Gospel was of the greatest interest, and the congregation is greatly indebted to Mr. Hargrove for his generous help.

Dukinfield (Welcome Meeting).—On Saturday, March 24, a tea party was held in the Old Chapel Schoolroom to welcome the Rev. E. Gwilym Evans, B.A., the new minister, and his
